It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

mentioned receive innumerable smaller perennial streams, many of which are more or less snow fed at their sources. In the suggested Tooma River gravitation scheme, which in all probability would prove the cheapest and most effective, this report has dealt with only one source of supply, for, without special examination, the subject cannot be more fully enlarged on. For a like reason it is impossible to submit definite information concerning water power, although, as before mentioned, I would expect to find great possibilities in the Swampy Plain River.

If honorable members will take notice, at about fifteen or twenty miles above this proposed site, the Upper Murray is divided into two rivers, one called the Swampy Plain River, and the other the Indi River. The reference in the quotation is to the point at which the two rivers join. Mr. Chesterman says he tried to get from the Public Works Department the information as to altitude—he has got most of the information as to flow of water in certain seasons—and that he was unable to obtain it. And then at another point, to which I referred, the Murray Gates, he was unable to ascertain the altitude. All I asked was that, if it was possible, he should be instructed to get that information.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Did not the honorable member say, in regard to other sites, when we had more information about them than is given there, that there should be a Commission appointed to examine them?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Most decidedly; and if there were the opportunity there would be ample justification for appointing experts to examine this part of the country. All I asked—I thought it was a very simple request, to which no one would object—was that certain information should be obtained in regard to two particular parts where an immense volume of water comes down. The right honorable member for Swan spoke to me the other day about the altitude of various spots on the Murray.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If the right honorable member did not, other honorable members did. The information would be made much more complete by ascertaining the altitudes at those places where I believe the greatest volume of snow-fed water that it is possible to obtain in Australia can be obtained. It is scarcely fair that every moment a word is said about this site an honorable member who represents Lyndhurst, as the leader of the Opposition did, should make a vicious protest against getting any information.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I say that we want more information.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I know that it is possible to obtain this information before this debate is closed, and if it does not bear out what I anticipate, so much the worse will it be for the site. But I cannot understand honorable members objecting to the information being obtained. I have been attacked for not having submitted this site before. I said most distinctly that the originator of Tooma being submitted as a site was the honorable member for Grampians. I did not go into this matter last session as I might have done, for the one reason that if a site well within the boundaries of New South Wales was selected, I should be very pleased; but we are now considering sites a long way from Sydney.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—They were being considered before, as the honorable member knows.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Why should any honorable member object to further information being obtained?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I say that we want more information.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is not a nice thing for honorable members to try to prevent information about a place from being obtained. This place may not have a chance of being selected, but if it is proposed to go further south than this locality to look for a site—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They were all mentioned.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—This site was proposed by the honorable member for Grampians, when he sought to get the territory extended from Tumut down to the Murray. The only reason why I did not deal further with the proposal at the time was that the area came down to the Victorian border. I know that the people of Sydney—I do not know about the people of New South Wales—raised a considerable objection to the site being taken so far south. I have always felt that the spirit of section 125 of the Constitution was to have the Capital as fairly as possible in New South Wales. I thought, therefore, on the last occasion, and I believe that it influenced many honorable members, that a half-way place, in the shape of beautiful Tumut, was a very good compromise. However, that need not be discussed at the present time. I hope that honorable members will not object to the Minister of Home Affairs i structing Mr. Chesterman to go up the river to these places and obtain this information.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—The honorable member for Hume has given the best of all reasons why there should be no more paltering with regard to the Tooma site. He has told us that originally—when he was in his saner Federal moments—he believed that this site was entirely out of the running.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member said he believed that this site was entirely out of the running, because it did not fulfil the spirit of the bond into which the States had entered. He has told us the reason why he did not propose this site was that it would not be a fair fulfilment of the bond.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I said that it would be objected to by the people of Sydney, and that I did not know whether it would be objected to by the people of New South Wales.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—All through the Federal campaign the honorable member more than any other public man in New South Wales argued that the Federal Capital ought to be established in Sydney.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And I have given the reason why my opinion has changed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This is one of his great objections to the State entering into a Federal bond at all.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Nonsense.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—For a long time—indeed until now—the honorable member has held a similar view.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Why does the honorable member persist in misrepresenting me?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am representing the honorable member only too faithfully.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member is absolutely misrepresenting me.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member deny that throughout the campaign he spoke in favour of the Capital being in Sydney?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have mentioned the reason.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have nothing to do with the honorable member's reasons. I am concerned only with the fact. I know, however, that the reason was that the honorable member was endeavouring to defeat the objects of those who really made the Federation.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether the honorable member is in order in saying that the reason why I urged at one time that Sydney should be the site of the Capital was that I desired to defeat the objects of those who really made the Federation. I have denied the statement, and the honorable member must accept that denial.

The TEMPORARY CHAIRMAN (Mr. McDonald).—If the honorable member denies the statement, I am sure that the honorable member for Parramatta will withdraw it.

Mr. McCOLL.—What have we to do with these personal matters?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We have a great deal to do with them.

Mr. McCOLL.—Such proceedings are discreditable to the Commonwealth.

Mr. STORRER.—They are a disgrace to the Parliament.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am very sorry that we are apparently rousing the ire of the Tooma enthusiasts; but that cannot be avoided. Whether they like it or not, we must insist as far as we can on good faith being kept with those with whom a solemn compact was made.

Mr. STORRER.—The honorable member is raising the ire of others.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In this matter the honorable member does not count. Had he been a member of this Parliament from its inception he would have been in a better position to speak on the subject.

Mr. STORRER.—I have read all the debates that took place on it last session.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then the honorable member is all the wiser for it. It is very strange to hear the honorable member for Hume arguing that this question should be further considered, and giving the reasons which he offers in support of his contention. He tells us in one breath that the reason he did not advocate the selection of this site last session was because he thought it would be too far away from Sydney to satisfy the people of New South Wales. I replied to that statement by saying that he knew very well, in his own mind, that to select that site would be to depart from the bond. Statements by the score could be quoted in proof of my assertion. How much longer are we to wait, in order that sites may be investigated? I have not the slightest doubt that if honorable members indulged in further picnicing, and if we obtained more favorable reports, certain honorable members would be induced to go over to the side of the Toomaites. The honorable member for Macquarie has one or two sites in his district that have not yet been exploited, and he might also put in a claim for further delay. I submit that, in view of the years, and the thousands of pounds which have been spent in investigating the merits of the various sites, we should be ready now to arrive at a decision, and that any further delay would be absolutely unjustifiable.

Mr. STORRER (Bass).—I shall not take the remarks of the honorable member for Parramatta in the spirit in which they were made, because, so far as politics are concerned, I never indulge in personalities. As I interjected, while the honorable member was speaking, I have read the reports of the debates which took place on this question last year, and I think that the charges which some honorable members are continually making against each other in this Committee are not by any means creditable to the Parliament of Australia. The manner in which many honorable members attack the honorable member for Hume, whenever he addresses himself to this question, is certainly most reprehensible. We know that the honorable member for Grampians takes the whole of the responsibility for the demand that the Tooma site should be inspected. Honorable members opposite are not prepared to accept his assurance, but attribute the whole movement to secure its selection to the honorable member for Hume. I am not at present in love with the Tooma district, and I intend to hear all that is to be said on the subject before I cast my vote. I have only to add that I decline to submit to personal attacks on the part of any honorable member. I am sent here to represent my constituents, and have as much right to speak or to interject whenever I please as has the honorable member for Parramatta.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro).—I think that the honorable member for Echuca is well within his rights in asking for further information in regard to Tooma; but it is unfair to the other sites that the advocates of Tooma, who appear to be "pulling the strings" very well, should be allowed special concessions. It may seem improper to speak of honorable members "pulling the strings," but we must call a spade a spade, and we know that some persons are resorting to this practice. I have no objection to their doing so, but—

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Several sets of strings are being pulled.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—And some are rather interesting. It will be my mission after we have dealt with the matter, to draw aside the blind, and show what has been done. I object to the debate being prolonged in order that, in the meantime, a report may be obtained from a surveyor in regard to some particular feature of the Tooma site, which in the opinion of its supporters may help to secure its selection. I believe that Tooma is seriously in the running, and, that being the case, we should have the same information in regard to it that is forthcoming in reference to other sites. We should have information, not only upon the question of its water supply, but in regard to its elevation, and as to whether there is a sufficient area suitable as a site for the Capital. Let Tooma be subjected to the same scrutiny that has taken place in connexion with the other sites. We should have some information as to whether it would be possible to connect it with the railway system of New South Wales, together with an approximate estimate of the cost. I ask the Government not to allow itself to be drawn aside by the advocates of the several sites. It is all very well for the Ministry to say that they are in the hands of the House; but I hold that they should make a stand and say whether they are going to give us this information or not. We are entitled to the information for which the honorable member for Echuca has asked; but I object to any officer being sent out to telegraph information on some special feature of the site, with a view to the capturing of more votes.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Is the honorable member referring to the request made by the honorable member for Echuca?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Yes. It is a very reasonable request; but a gentle hint has been thrown out from other quarters as to the information which should be obtained. I have no desire to impute motives. Probably, if I were an advocate of Tooma, I should be anxious to obtain a report on it, and would not desire to obtain any information that might be unfavorable to its selection. Some honorable members say that they like Tooma, but I have not heard of many who are going to support it. All this talk about the honorable member for Hume taking a parliamentary party out on a picnicing excursion, and being able to persuade honorable members to vote for the site which he favours, is all nonsense. It might as well be said that I could induce honorable members to vote for the district which I favour. I resent the suggestions made by the honorable member for Macquarie. Surely honorable members have minds of their own. It is indeed a well-known fact that most of us have made up our minds on this subject. The information which we possess about Tooma is not sufficient to enable any one to come to a definite judgment upon its merits, but may be sufficient to make some honorable members desirous of obtaining further details. Therefore, it is incumbent upon the Government to say whether they wish honorable members to come to a vote in our present state of information, or to wait until we can get further reports about Tooma. In any case, a definite decision should be arrived at. If we drag this debate on for another ten days, while waiting for telegrams to be sent to us, we shall become the laughing stock of Australia. What should be done is to say that the vote shall be taken at such and such a time, and then postpone the discussion until the information we require is obtained. If necessary, Mr. Chesterman, or Mr. Scrivener, might be sent to Tooma to get for us information similar to that which has been supplied in regard to the other sites. But I say unhesitatingly, that consideration is being given to the Tooma site which is not being given to the other sites. I was desirous of getting honorable members to visit Twofold Bay, but I was not assisted in that project. The honorable member for Hume professes to regard the Tooma site as a New South Wales one, but I think that the people of the State look upon it as a Victorian site. For my own part, although I am a representative of a New South Wales constituency, I am here to consider the interests of Australia generally.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I am distinctly glad of the turn which the debate has taken, because I do not wish a decision to be come to on this momentous question before full information has been obtained regarding all the sites. Honorable members should have all necessary facts placed before them, so that they may come to a competent judgment. I feel that in urging that surveyors be sent to report further on the Tooma site I am studying the interests of Australia at large. I believe that if such a report is made it will strengthen the hands of those who are inclined to vote for Tooma. I have made an inspection of the site, and know the character of the country, but I am not a surveyor, and cannot calculate elevations, or determine the feasibility of obtaining an adequate water supply, or estimate the cost of giving railway communication to any site. Therefore, I must rely upon expert reports. But although I represent a New South Wales constituency, I shall not take a narrow, parochial view of this question. It has been inferred by some honorable members, who come from that State, that those who are not supporting a particular site are breaking the compact embodied in the Constitution; but I told my constituents that I had not formed an opinion as to which was the best site, but that if elected I would investigate all the proposed sites for myself.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — Hear, hear. Honorable members should have time to go to Twofold Bay.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I had visited Twofold Bay before my election, and I have since been to all the proposed sites, and studied their various features. Having thus satisfied my conscience, I feel in a position to do my duty to the Commonwealth. I shall not consider the interests of any section of the community, although the representatives of the Sydney press who report our proceedings are manufacturing ammunition to fire off against those who dare to give their adherence to a site which is not that chosen by the majority of the representatives of that State. To my mind, that is a very unfair position. During the Federal campaign, the conductors of the newspapers urged the public to sink the narrow, parochial view, and to take a broad view. But those who most strongly advocated the cultivation of the Federal spirit are those who are now trying to dominate honorable members by compelling them to have regard to parochial considerations. I have but one motive, and that is to do the best I can for the generations who are to follow. If that be discreditable to an honorable member, I plead guilty to being discredited. But I object to voting without sufficient information upon an important question of this kind, which affects the interests of all Australia. I would point out further that had it not been for the bargain made by the right honorable member for East Sydney in fixing the 100-miles limit, it would have been possible to select a site without the difficulty that is now presented. But as things are, we have not a great range of choice. I repeat that I am anxious to obtain the opinions of experts before we proceed to vote. I should be far more satisfied if my own view were ratified.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby—Minister of Home Affairs).—The position of the Government in regard to this matter is this: Having entered upon the consideration of the Bill, we intend to carry the discussion right on. We do not intend to allow anything to interfere with the completion of the business in hand, which is the settlement of the Federal Capital question. The request for further information about the Tooma site, is, I admit, a very natural one, and, so far as the Government may be able to comply with it between now and next Tuesday they will do so. But I am not prepared to consent to any further investigation that will involve delay. I admit, of course, that it is unfortunate that the particular site which has been mentioned has not received so close an investigation as have some of the other sites, but the fault does not lie with the Government. All I can say is that any further reasonable investigation which can be made without causing any delay shall be undertaken. The Government cannot promise more than that.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Will the Government ask the New South Wales Government to furnish an approximate estimate of the cost of connecting the site by rail?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Does the honorable member think that it is possible to get that information?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The New South Wales Government have had trial surveys made through the district, and can furnish an approximate estimate.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I have not the slightest objection to asking the Government of New South Wales for that information if they can supply it in time, but I am inclined to question their ability to do so. I presume that the honorable member means that we should obtain an approximate estimate of the cost of connecting the site with Germantown. I dare say that could be furnished.

Progress reported.

House adjourned at 11.37 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Friday, 29 July, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

LABOUR PARTY'S LOYALTY.

Mr. KNOX.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister if his attention has been drawn to a cablegram which appears in this morning's Argus, stating that Mr. H. P. Wyatt, who recently visited Australia as an envoy of the Imperial Navy League, has declared that he has no hesitation in saying that the Labour leaders in Australia are disloyal, and are separatists.

Mr. PAGE.—He is a lying scoundrel.

Mr. KNOX.—If the attention of the Prime Minister has been drawn to the report in question, I ask him whether he believes the feelings of the members of his Ministry, or of the Labour Party in the Federal Parliament, to have been correctly represented by Mr. Wyatt. If he believes that they have not been correctly represented, will he make a positive disclaimer on behalf of the Government of the Commonwealth of the opinions attributed to the Labour leaders here?

Mr. PAGE.—Does the honorable member think that the statement is true?

Mr. KNOX.—I know that it is not true.

Mr. WATSON.—My attention has been drawn to the cablegram in question. The statement therein attributed to Mr. Wyatt is absolutely ridiculous and untrue. It is certainly untrue so far as the members of this Ministry are concerned, and it does not in the slightest degree represent the feeling of the Labour leaders of Australia, so far as I have been able to ascertain it. It is certainly the fact that the Labour leaders of the various States refused to have anything to do with a faddist of Mr. Wyatt's description.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable member think that Mr. Wyatt is a faddist?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, and I think that in England, also, he is looked upon as a faddist.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He did not appear to me in that light.

Mr. WATSON.—I am expressing my own opinion only. I know that the right honorable member has somewhat exaggerated ideas on Imperial subjects. So far as the people in the Labour movement throughout Australia are concerned, although they are not of the hysterical brand of loyalists, I do not think there is the slightest evidence of their ever having shown any desire for separation from the Empire. The statement that that is desired by those connected with the political Labour movement of Australia is absolutely incorrect. I may add that I do not know what steps Mr. Wyatt took to ascertain the feelings of the Labour leaders of Australia in this matter.

ADJOURNMENT (Formal).

LYNDHURST WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I regret that I feel compelled to move the adjournment of the House this morning.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Water again?

Mr. SPEAKER.—May I take this opportunity to remind the House that honorable members when speaking are to be taken as expressing their own opinions, though not necessarily those of their fellow members; and that every honorable member is entitled to place his own views before the assembly, even though they may be views from which every other honorable member dissents. I ask honorable members to listen to the member addressing the Chair, without striving by interjection to force him to express their views instead of his own.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I should not have taken this unusual step had I not thought it important, in the interests not only of the State which I represent, but of the whole of Australia, that the true facts in connexion with certain matters should be laid before the House, so that even honorable members who may be opposed to the course—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I would remind the honorable member that he has not yet obtained leave to move the adjournment.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I wish to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of asking that Mr. Wade, Chief Engineer of Water Conservation for New South Wales, who is now in Melbourne, be called upon for a full report in regard to the water supply available at or near Lyndhurst.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have received an intimation from the honorable member for Macquarie that he desires to move the adjournment of the House, to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, viz., "The desirability of obtaining further information from Mr. Wade, Chief Engineer of Water Conservation in New South Wales, who is now in Melbourne, concerning the volume and cost of water supply at or near Lyndhurst."

Five honorable members having risen in their places,

Question proposed.

Mr. THOMAS.—Is the honorable member stone-walling the Seat of Government Bill?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I take all responsibility for my actions in this Chamber. All I ask is that the same courtesy may be extended to me in making this request for information as I should be ready to extend to any other honorable member. The question I wish to discuss is a very important one. Misleading statements have been made, both publicly and privately, by the advocates of other sites, for the purpose of damaging the chances of the Lyndhurst site, and I feel that in the interests of all concerned the Chief Engineer of Water Conservation in New South Wales, who has been sent to Melbourne by his Government to give honorable members full information in regard to the possibility of conserving water in the district, should be examined at the Bar of the House, or by a Select Committee, on his report, which I put before the House last night, so that all the facts relating to the matter may be ascertained. My action proves that I am desirous that the fullest publicity shall be given to all matters relating to the Lyndhurst site.

Mr. THOMAS.—The honorable member made a long speech on this subject last night.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes, but the accuracy of many of the statements which I then made on the authority of Mr. Wade were questioned by certain honorable members. I believe that a majority are desirous of knowing the truth, and, therefore, I wish to give the House an opportunity to examine Mr. Wade in a most public manner, both on every statement which I have made, and in regard to other matters bearing on the question at issue. Mr. Wade has submitted a report which shows that a gravitation supply capable of supplying 100,000 people with 100 gallons per day throughout the year can be obtained at Lyndhurst, the rate of consumption provided for being twice that of Melbourne and Sydney combined, and Mr. Wade has allowed for 8 per cent. to run off in the course of a dry year.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is not asking that further information shall be supplied, but is quoting statements in a report which he says is now available. I hope that he will confine himself to the terms of his motion.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Certain statements have been made, and I am anxious that Mr. Wade shall be asked to give the House full and complete information on the whole question. I wish other honorable members to have the same opportunity to examine him as I have had, so that the full light of day shall be shed on the subject. In a report which Mr. Wade has written to me, and which is now in my possession, he says that a gravitation scheme can be obtained at Lyndhurst which would supply 100,000 people at the allowance I have already named; and that if more water were required, a storage reservoir could be constructed on the Lachlan, just below the junction of Wyangala Creek. The cost of the work has been estimated at £581,200, which includes the cost of twenty-two miles of steel main, one-tenth of the cost of the dam, and the cost of buildings, pumps, boilers, engineering, and contingencies. Making provision for fuel and stores, maintenance, and interest and sinking fund at 6 per cent., the supply would cost 7½d. per 1,000 gallons. At the present time the water supplied in Sydney and in Melbourne costs 1s. per 1,000 gallons, while in some places where there are pumping schemes the cost is as high as 1s. 6d. per 1,000 gallons. A weir to supply the requirements of a Capital City, estimated at 9,000,000 gallons per day, could be constructed for £100,000.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The Standing Order prevents any discussion which anticipates debate on an item of business already appearing on the notice-paper, and, therefore, nothing can be said now which could be said in Committee on the Seat of Government Bill. The honorable member must confine himself wholly to the matter to which his notice refers, the desirability of examining Mr. Wade at the Bar, or before a Select Committee, to obtain further information from him regarding the possibilities of water supply at Lyndhurst. He will not be in order in saying now anything which could be said in Committee on the Bill. His present remarks are clearly such as could be made at that stage, and, therefore, they are not in order.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am merely endeavouring to justify my contention that Mr. Wade should be examined at the Bar of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I would point out that every word which the honorable member has uttered during the past two or three minutes could be appropriately uttered upon the Seat of Government Bill. He seems rather to be showing the want of necessity to examine Mr. Wade before the Bar of the House than the necessity to do so. I must ask the honorable member to confine his remarks to the question before the Chair.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I shall endeavour to do so. I merely desire to point out that the figures supplied by Mr. Wade in connexion with the water supply at Lyndhurst have been questioned by honorable members.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Of course, it is not my business to indicate to the honorable member what he ought to say, but I would suggest to him a line of argument which would be in order, so as to contrast it with a line of argument which is not in order. Upon a motion such as this, it would be perfectly competent for the honorable member to argue that Mr. Wade knew all about the locality in question, and that his opinion was worth having. Any such line of argument would be perfectly in order, but the line of argument which he is following is not in order.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I thoroughly realize the difficult position which I occupy. My only desire is to direct attention to the important statements which have been made by Mr. Wade, the Chief Engineer of Water Conservation in New South Wales, in connexion with the water supply at Lyndhurst. That officer has reported upon all the sites.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Did he appear before the Commissions?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes. Nearly all the information upon which the Commissioners based their report concerning the question of water supply was obtained from him.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Is not that information contained in their report?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No, because it is only recently that surveys have been made in connexion with the Lyndhurst site. Mr. Wade shows very clearly that by constructing a weir upon the Lachlan he could conserve—

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Where is Mr. Wade now?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—He is in Melbourne.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Why is he here?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I requested the Premier of New South Wales to instruct him to visit Melbourne.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Oh!

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member for Hume and the honorable member for Eden-Monaro made certain statements in connexion with the Lyndhurst water supply which I knew to be unreliable, and I wished to have Mr. Wade here so that he might be able to furnish honorable members with the fullest information. All I ask is that he should be called to the Bar of the House, and examined upon this important question. In one of his reports, Mr. Wade states that, even in the driest season upon record, the Lachlan River can be made to supply 135,000,000 gallons per day.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order; the honorable member is again anticipating the debate upon the Seat of Government Bill.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I merely mention that fact in support of my contention that honorable members should be afforded an opportunity of examining Mr. Wade at the Bar of the House.

Mr. CULPIN.—Can he give more information than he has already supplied?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No; but last night, upon the authority of Mr. Wade, I made a statement, the accuracy of which was questioned.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Who questioned it?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It was questioned by the honorable member for Hume, and the honorable member for Eden-Monaro.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—What did I say in reference to it?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member attempted to disparage the report of Mr. Wade. I say that that officer should be examined at the Bar of the House, in order that honorable members may be supplied with full and accurate information.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The more information we obtain in regard to Lyndhurst the less number of votes will be recorded in its favour.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That may be the honorable member's view, but I am satisfied to rest its claims upon the fullest possible publicity. If my statements cannot be substantiated—

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member is willing to pit Mr. Wade against the writers of anonymous letters.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am prepared to do that at any time. I feel sure that the Prime Minister does not object to the most complete information being supplied in regard to all sites. I do not ask honorable members to accept my statement—

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—But the honorable member must admit that in dry seasons the Lachlan River is merely a succession of water-holes.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Upon the basis of the driest year ever experienced, namely 1901-2, Mr. Wade declares that he could supply Lyndhurst with 135,000,000 gallons per day.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. The honorable member is again anticipating another discussion.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—In dealing with this question it is very difficult for me to keep within the strict limits prescribed by parliamentary rules. I did not accept the verbal statement of Mr. Wade in connexion with this matter, but requested him to submit his views in writing.

Mr. McLEAN.—Has he brought the Lyndhurst water supply with him in a bottle?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member will be able to examine him if he is summoned to appear at the Bar of the House. It is really wonderful to note how keen are some honorable members, who are anxious that a site shall be selected upon the Victorian border, to prevent full publicity being given to all the facts connected with this question. Mr. Wade is at present in Melbourne, with the consent of the New South Wales Government, whom I have to thank for placing his services at our disposal. He is prepared to be examined at the Bar of the House upon the statements which he has made concerning the water supply at Lyndhurst. That fact shows that I do not fear the fullest light being thrown by experts upon my contentions.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Not if the honorable member's own experts are called.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Minister has no right to say that. In advocating his own scheme, the honorable gentleman is relying upon the report of this very officer. Mr. Wade is no expert of mine.

Mr. PAGE.—Why, the honorable member admitted it just now.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I asked the Government of New South Wales to grant honorable members the assistance of that officer in dealing with this question.

Mr. PAGE.—In the interests of Lyndhurst.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Seeing that misrepresentations have been made concerning the Lyndhurst site, I was perfectly within my rights in making that request to the New South Wales Government.

Mr. PAGE.—Then why does the honorable member disown his action?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not disown it. The fact that I asked the New South Wales Government to send Mr. Wade to Melbourne does not make him an expert of mine. Because the honorable member for Hume appointed certain gentlemen as Capital Sites Commissioners, should I be justified in affirming that they were his Commissioners?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member did so.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—If I did, I was probably quite right in one or two instances. As a matter of fact, I believe that Mr. Wade was appointed by the honorable member for Hume.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think that he was.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Then upon the argument which has been advanced that officer must be the expert of the honorable member. He was appointed by the honorable member as the best officer available to make a report.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am not quite sure that I did appoint him.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I believe that the honorable member did. I know, at all events, that he has a very high opinion of Mr. Wade's ability.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is so.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That is sufficient for my case. Mr. Wade is no more a friend of mine than is any other officer in the Public Service of New South Wales. When I requested the New South Wales Government to send an expert to Melbourne, I asked, not for Mr. Wade, but for Mr. Bloomfield, who made the original report.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Why not have Mr. Pridham here?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I should like him to be called. The New South Wales Government have considered it desirable to offer us the assistance of their Chief Engineer, and I ask that he should be examined at the Bar of the House. Mr. Bloomfield has furnished us with valuable information, and has shown that by means of a gravitation scheme, an adequate water supply could be secured at Lyndhurst for a population of 87,000. Mr. Wade has been in communication, not only with myself, but with the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Home Affairs, who have had an opportunity to question him on this subject; and every honorable member should be afforded equal facilities to examine him. Damaging statements against Lyndhurst have been made by opponents of that site, and Mr. Wade, in the interests of fair play, should be examined at the Bar, in order that those statements may be proved or disproved.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—I should not have risen to address myself to this question but for the seriousness of the issue. During the debate last night some warm exchanges took place, and unless honorable members guard themselves, feeling is likely to run very high before a site is selected.

Mr. POYNTON.—I think we should have the evidence of outside experts.

Mr. WILKS.—In Mr. Wade we have an engineer who is at the head of the New South Wales Department of Water Conservation, and who holds high rank among the members of his profession in Australia. It is, therefore, very desirable that we should have an opportunity to examine him. I do not wish to suggest that the honorable member for Macquarie is not a good engineer, but his engineering skill does not relate to water conservation.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Is this professional indignation?

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member who interjects is an engineer of another type; his skill is related more particularly to underground work. Mr. Wade is not the paid emissary of any party, and he would be able to supply the House with very valuable information. So far, the debate on this question has been characterized by a broad Federal spirit, but there is a danger that the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, the honorable member for Hume, and others may, in a weak moment, be tempted to urge, from a merely provincial stand-point, the merits of the sites which they respectively favour. We must avoid partisanship, and I think that by examining Mr. Wade we shall remove many doubts that have been created in the minds of honorable members by the assertions of those who are opposed to the Lyndhurst site. The honorable member for Macquarie simply desires that Mr. Wade shall be called, in order that the allegations which have been made against the Lyndhurst water supply may be shown to be without foundation. No one would suggest that that officer would be guilty of the improper advocacy of any site. The only objection that can be urged is that if Mr. Wade were called the supporters of other sites might demand that many other experts should be examined at the Bar of the House. We have, nevertheless, to ask ourselves whether we are in possession of all the information necessary to enable us to come to a wise decision. It seems to me that we are not. The honorable member for Macquarie admits that he is at a disadvantage in dealing with the claims of Lyndhurst, in the absence of the expert evidence which Mr. Wade would be able to afford the House.

Mr. McLEAN.—Did he not supply a report to the Commissioners?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is desired to examine him on a further report.

Mr. WILKS. — The paper submitted to the House last night by the honorable member for Macquarie is merely a précis of Mr. Wade's views, in regard to the cost of providing Lyndhurst with an adequate water supply. The information which it gives is necessarily curtailed, and honorable members are not able to fully grasp the figures. If Mr. Wade were summoned to appear at the Bar of the House, we should obtain the fullest information from him, and I trust that honorable members who wish to see this matter dealt with solely from an Australian point of view will not hesitate to agree to the request.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro).—I offer no objection to the proposal made by the honorable member for Macquarie, although I think that by yielding to it we might create a rather dangerous precedent. No charge has been made against Mr. Wade, and, so far as I am aware, there is no very special reason why he should be called. I understand that the honorable member for Macquarie takes serious exception to one or two interjections, in reference to the water supply of Lyndhurst, which were made last night whilst he was speaking in Committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Something very much more serious than interjections.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Then the honorable member ought to say what it is.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member will not be in order in referring to another debate.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That was my difficulty.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I know that Mr. Wade is a first-class engineer, but I ask whether it is desirable that we should call to the Bar of the House only a gentleman who has furnished a report favorable to the selection of a certain site.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not know anything about his views in that respect. That statement is hardly fair.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The reports supplied by Mr. Wade are favorable to the selection of a certain site.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—They are fair.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—He has expressed a very favorable opinion in regard to the water supply of Lyndhurst.

Mr. KELLY.—An honest opinion.

Mr. WATSON.—That goes without saying.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I do not accept the honorable member for Wentworth as an authority on this subject.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Mr. Wade has also favorably reported on Tumut.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—He has made a favorable report on Lyndhurst, and for that reason the honorable member for Macquarie proposes that he shall be examined. I have no objection to the adoption of that course, because I am satisfied that Mr. Wade would not make a report in favour of any site unless he were convinced that it was right to do so. If we are going to question the value of the various reports which have been submitted to us, we ought to examine not only Mr. Wade, but Mr. Pridham, Mr. Bloomfield, and other gentlemen having equally high reputations. Surely we are not going to cast a slur on the high officials who have furnished us with reports? The honorable member for Macquarie telegraphed to the Government of New South Wales to secure the attendance of Mr. Wade in Melbourne, and, knowing that that gentleman is prepared to speak in favour of the selection of Lyndhurst, he desires that he shall be called. Is Mr. Wade to be singled out as the one engineer to give evidence at the Bar of the House? I should like to draw attention to the fact that the New South Wales Engineering Department has been responsible for some terrific blunders in connexion with water supply. Every one in New South Wales is aware that some one in that Department must be held responsible for serious mistakes in connexion with the water supplies of Bathurst, Orange, Goulburn, and Armidale. I do not say it was Mr. Wade, but if we are to discuss the relative merits of engineers, we should have some information as to who was responsible for those schemes.

MR. WATSON.—Mr. Wade has only recently become Chief Engineer.

MR. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is a very unfair way in which to try to damage a public officer's reputation.

MR. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—If we are to decide this question by bringing men to the Bar of the House, we should bring a number of men, because it is a well-known fact that in connexion with the schemes for water supply for the places I have mentioned, most glowing reports were issued, by the Department in New South Wales, as to what the rainfall would be, what the conservation would be, and we really had in respect to those schemes much the same story as we were told last night. The places to which I refer have had water supplies provided for them on the authority of some engineer in New South Wales, and in every case they have proved dismal failures. At Orange, where we are told there is such an enormous catchment area for a water supply, the people of the little town had to be put on half supply in the summer before last. The mistakes in these cases should be inquired into, and we should know who was responsible for them. It would be a calamity to us if we were guided by the report of engineers who are incompetent. I do not doubt the figures which were given to us last night, but we want something more than figures; we should have facts.

MR. SYDNEY SMITH.—Some honorable members do not want the facts.

MR. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I have not the slightest objection to hear them, but if we are to have an officer sent here specially by the New South Wales Government to make, at the Bar of this House, certain statements regarding a particular site, we should also have an opinion from other officers with regard to other sites, and we should saddle the responsibility for the mistakes made in New South Wales in this connexion on the right shoulders. I do not believe that Mr. Wade would make such mistakes, but I refuse to allow the honorable member for Macquarie to inferentially saddle engineers who have reported favorably of sites other than Lyndhurst with that responsibility. If Mr. Wade is to be brought to the Bar of the House, Mr. Pridham and other men with as good a reputation as his should also be heard. From Mr. Pridham's report there is grave doubt as to what can be done at Lyndhurst. There is no running water there, and the suggestions as to what can be done there in the way of water supply are all dependent on conditions and circumstances. If the intention is to pit one public officer against another, they should all be given fair play. The honorable member for Macquarie cast some reflection upon the Commission appointed by the honorable member for Hume, only because that Commission did not supply him with as good a report on Lyndhurst as he could get from Mr. Wade's figures. The last thing we should try to do in this House is to pit one public officer against another. If I do not agree that what Mr. Wade has done is right, that is no reason why I should try to cast the slightest doubt upon his ability or his honesty. No one who knows Mr. Wade would think of doing so; but he should not be brought here as a kind of special pleader for one site. That would put Mr. Wade in a very false position. The very fact that the honorable member for Macquarie telegraphed to have this officer brought here should be enough to induce honorable members to hesitate before they agree to what has been proposed. We were told by the honorable member that Mr. Wade reported that at Lyndhurst there is not only a sufficient water supply for the Federal City, but that there could be procured 135,000,000 gallons a day for irrigation purposes. All I can say is that many of us who could not get even a drink of cold water there, would be very glad to get such information from Mr. Wade. I am disposed to think that there is one good reason why that gentleman should be brought to the Bar of the House. He has just returned from America, and the honorable member for Barrier is under the impression that the report quoted must be upon the Mississippi, and not upon Lyndhurst, and I think it is well that that should be cleared up. I am quite certain that any report by Mr. Wade would be an honest one. In my opinion, he is a very competent engineer, but if he is to be brought before the Bar of the House as the special pleader for a particular site, in justice to other sites, we should also have here some of the engineers who have told us that unless we are prepared to spend millions, it will be almost a matter of impossibility to get a water supply at Lyndhurst. We might get water to the moon, if we spent enough money. If Mr. Wade is to be brought to the Bar of the House, another telegram should be sent to Sydney to some other engineer, whose reputation is just as good as is Mr. Wade's, and who will tell us that unless we go to the expenditure of millions there is a risk that at Lyndhurst we should have more whisky than water.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—The honorable member for Eden-Monaro has told us that he has not the slightest objection to Mr. Wade appearing at the Bar of the House, and he has further said that he believes that gentleman to be a competent engineer, who would give an honest opinion. If that be so, may I ask what we should gain by questioning Mr. Wade as to the engineering failures that have occurred at different places in New South Wales in connexion with small water supplies.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—He might give us some information in respect to them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He might, but what would be the advantage gained by asking Mr. Wade's opinion upon matters which did not concern him, and which are not connected with the question before us in any way? The object could only be to try to influence the minds of honorable members adversely to Mr. Wade's opinion. At one moment the honorable member says that Mr. Wade is an honest man, and in the next he says that we should have him here that we may ask him about these failures.

Mr. McLEAN.—An honest man may make a mistake.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member also suggests that Mr. Pridham should be brought here if Mr. Wade is to be consulted. I should like to point out that the figures quoted by the honorable member for Macquarie, were Mr. Pridham's figures. Mr. Wade has taken Mr. Pridham's figures, and on them he has based his report.

Mr. McLEAN.—If they are Mr. Pridham's figures, he is the engineer we should consult, and not Mr. Wade.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Mr. Pridham has said that Dalgety has a better water supply than Lyndhurst can ever have, and Mr. Wade does not agree with that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is not the question at all. I am prepared to admit that there is a better water supply at Dalgety than at Lyndhurst; but what we are concerned about is to establish the fact that an adequate water supply may be obtained at Lyndhurst for all the purposes of a Federal Capital. I am not concerned to deny that there may be better water supplies found elsewhere in New South Wales. What we say is that in this neighbourhood, which has been so much maligned by some honorable members in this particular respect, there is an abundance of water, and more than the Federal Capital will ever require. It is the more advisable that we should take advantage of Mr. Wade's engineering skill, as he is already in Melbourne, and we can secure his advice without delay to the final determination of the question before us.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—He is in Melbourne at the request of the Lyndhurst site supporters.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not know who brought him here.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for Macquarie says that he telegraphed for him.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am prepared to admit that. I hope the honorable member did; it would be but evidence of his industry and enterprise in this matter. May I remind honorable members that the Government of New South Wales are in favour of the Lyndhurst site? I submit respectfully that a site which is recommended by the Government, and is to be recommended by the Parliament of New South Wales, is entitled to their serious consideration.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The New South Wales Government are not in favour of it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—All I have to say to that is that the Premier of New South Wales announced to the country only the other day that if returned to power he would ask the Parliament of New South Wales to recommend Lyndhurst to the Federal Government.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—He said he would leave it an open question.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is quite wrong.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Why not be fair and state that Lyndhurst is in his own electorate?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not only Mr. Waddell, but all the influential members of the late Government in New South Wales hold the same opinion of Lyndhurst. I submit that a site favoured by the Government of the State which has to grant the land, and which has spent a very large sum of money in facilitating the object we have in view, should be considered. The New South Wales Government have sent over an engineer with a special report upon the water supply at Lyndhurst, and we should, in courtesy to them, hear what this engineer has to say. It is the more important that we should hear him since we had last night an expert opinion adverse to Lyndhurst as a site from the right honorable member for Swan. Nothing more damaging to the character of Lyndhurst as a suitable site for the Federal Capital could be urged than the opinion offered by the right honorable member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It was offered some time ago; the report has been on the table for some time.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am referring to the right honorable member's remarks last night. He told us that it would be absolutely dangerous in summer time if the scheme suggested by this engineer were carried out.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think I said that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The right honorable member told us that the water stored would become polluted in summer, and would be a source of danger.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I referred to the artificial lake suggested.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I could not imagine a more severe condemnation of the scheme than we had from the right honorable member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The lake need not be made.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable member for Parramatta must see that the remarks he is making now are really but a continuation of the debate upon another question. The mere fact that he is replying to some remarks made in that debate is a proof that the honorable member is transferring to this question debate which should take place in Committee. I must ask the honorable member not to anticipate the debate in Committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not quite see how I can avoid it. I quite admit what you say, Mr. Speaker, but, on the other hand, the very purpose of moving the motion for the adjournment of the House is to ask that special engineering skill shall be made available for the purpose, amongst other things, of furnishing information concerning statements made during the course of the debate in Committee. While I know the rule of Parliament that an honorable member cannot, upon a motion for the adjournment, allude to a debate proceeding at another time and place, in this instance it is almost unavoidable. However, I will not further transgress. But I do say that, in view of the very serious statements made by the right honorable member for Swan on the question of the water supply of Lyndhurst, it is of the very utmost consequence that the House should avail itself of every opportunity to test their truth. Leaving out of sight the advocates, or partisans, as they have been called, of Lyndhurst—and I do not object to the term—I urge that the fact that this site is about to be officially recommended for consideration by the Government of New South Wales—

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That is absurd; half the members of the New South Wales Government are against it. The honorable member knows that himself.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We know nothing of the kind.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Lyndhurst is in Mr. Waddell's electorate.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I know that, but what has it to do with the question? Why does not the honorable member make a similar interjection concerning sites which are in the electorates of other honorable members?

Mr. DAVID THOMSON. — The remark applies to them in just the same way.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Honorable members opposite make such interjections with regard to those who favour Lyndhurst, but not concerning the advocates of other sites, who all along have been doing their best for their electorates. More power to them; I do not criticise them on that account. I do not see what point there is in the interjection that Lyndhurst is in the electorate of the Premier of New South Wales. Of course it is. But that fact would go for nothing if the people of New South Wales were not behind the site. Since the practicability of this site has been challenged by an expert of the character of the right honorable member for Swan, who believes that to construct there artificial works for conserving water will be to menace the health of the people in the district, we ought to have the benefit of all the available engineering skill which has been devoted to the investigation of such questions. With respect to the opinions of other engineers, who would probably report adversely, I would remark that that could not be so in the case of Mr. Pridham, because he furnished the figures which, after checking, have been adopted by Mr. Wade in the preparation of the case submitted last night by the honorable member for Macquarie.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby—Minister of Home Affairs).—I do not know that the Government can complain altogether of the delay in the transaction of business which has been caused by this debate. But, on the other hand, it is certain that the Government are not getting quite as much support in their endeavour to push forward the settlement of the Capital Sites question, as, perhaps, they had a right to expect from some quarters. A request has been submitted to-day, which, it seems to me, the honorable member for Macquarie cannot reasonably think that the House is likely to grant.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not see why the House should not, if we are to have fair play.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Such a request should only be granted in the event of very serious misstatements having been made. I am expressing my individual opinion in this respect, but my view certainly is that only in the case of very serious misstatements would it be advisable to call any person to the Bar of the House. It is a most unusual procedure, and is very seldom adopted by any Parliament. I have never heard of its being adopted for the purpose of rebutting statements made by way of interjection in the course of a debate. It is a most remarkable request. All kinds of statements have been made in interjections and in speeches about each of the suggested sites.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable gentleman made a statement himself.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Does the honorable member for Macquarie suggest that I made any statement that was unfair to Mr. Wade? I can assure him that I did not for a moment mean to suggest that Mr. Wade was a partisan of any site.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not know his opinion.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not know his opinion either. I have not the slightest idea what it is. Indeed, I do not care. He is certainly an eminent engineer, and to the extent that his professional skill entitles him to receive from this House the very fullest credence, he would have that and no more. His professional skill is the main point; his personal opinion is quite another question. So far as concerns the information which the honorable member desires to obtain, I desire to say that if Mr. Wade submits a statement to the Government they will take care that it is made available to honorable members. Surely nothing more than that can be desired. Nothing more can reasonably be asked for. If the honorable member for Macquarie had put a simple question, the Government would at once have complied with his request.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I want Mr. Wade to answer questions put to him, and to meet objections raised by honorable members.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member will see that if that practice were adopted every supporter of a Capital Site might make a similar request. If we are to have experts called to the Bar of the House to be examined by honorable members, how long will it probably take to settle the matter? Instead of days or weeks being occupied, it might take months, or perhaps years, to settle it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It would be bad for Mr. Wade if it took so long as that to examine him.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—But there are other experts who might also be called with just as much reason in connexion with other sites. All that the honorable member for Macquarie can reasonably ask for is what I have already offered to do. If Mr. Wade likes to send a full statement to the Government we shall be happy to make it available to honorable members.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What we suggest would be a quicker way of securing the information.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member surely does not put that suggestion forward seriously?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do, indeed.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—What the honorable member for Macquarie really urges is that the special engineering skill of Mr. Wade should be made available to honorable members. I am quite prepared to agree to that by circulating any statement which Mr. Wade may make.

Mr. FOWLER.—Why not appoint a Select Committee to examine him?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We should certainly not appoint a Select Committee. If we did that we should have all kinds of statements made. I suggest that the honorable member should accept the undertaking now given, and let the House get on with the discussion of the sites.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—Certainly the course of procedure which the honorable member for Macquarie asks the Government to consent to is unusual, and it requires a considerable amount of reason to justify it. But in view of the treatment which the honorable member for Macquarie received last night, and also in view of the influences at work in the House —

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Underground influences.

Mr. BROWN.—There is ample justification for the action taken by him. What is the position? First of all, we had expert reports upon all the sites—the western sites, the southern sites, and the south-eastern sites. All the sites now mainly under consideration were dealt with by experts appointed by the honorable member for Hume when he was Minister of Home Affairs in the Barton Government. At the close of the debate in the last Parliament a certain movement was made by the then Minister of Home Affairs for the purpose of supplementing the information then available, and the House was given to understand that an inquiry was to be held in order to obtain some special information that had been overlooked on the previous occasion. But we find that the supplementary inquiry with regard to the Bombala and Tumut sites has been as exhaustive as, if not more exhaustive than, the inquiry entered into by the expert Commissioners. The whole question has been reviewed from every possible stand-point, and every tittle of information which it was possible to obtain has been brought to bear. I do not object to that. The House should be placed in possession of all the information bearing upon the question. But the honorable member for Macquarie—and I agree with him—asks that a similar inquiry should be extended to Lyndhurst. We were refused that by the late Government. We were informed that the information available covered all that was necessary. Whenever we asked that the same treatment as was extended to the other sites should be extended to Lyndhurst we were met by a refusal. When I got possession of the supplementary reports about a fortnight ago, I made a special visit to Sydney in order to bring the matter under the notice of the State Government. I was not successful in seeing the State Premier. But I endeavoured to get all the information I could with respect to the Lyndhurst site. I consider that the honorable member for Macquarie has done the right thing in endeavouring to bring the information up to date, and to place honorable members in a position to judge this site on the newer and wider information which is now available. Since the investigations were made by the Commission of experts—and these were mainly confined to a prescribed area—a considerable section of the people in the western districts have taken up the question of dealing with the source of water supply which has been reported upon lately by Mr. Wade, and deputations, of which I was a member, have waited on the State Government to deal with the question from a State stand-point, and not particularly from a Federal stand-point. I know that I cannot enter into full details at this stage, but I wish to indicate that there is now available more information than was available when the Commission of experts made their inquiries, and that information has been secured by the State Department for other than Federal purposes. A league has been formed to secure the erection of a weir and conservation of water for purely State purposes. I am a member of the league, which I believe includes the Prime Minister and several members of the State Parliament. That shows that since the first inquiry was made the attention of the State Parliament has been specially concentrated on this source of supply for purposes of water conservation, and it is admitted by the Ministry that it reaches the proportions of a national scheme, affecting all interests along the Lachlan River. I wish now to refer to the question of Mr. Wade's report. The honorable member for Eden-Monaro will not dare to rise here and question straight out the ability of Mr. Wade to deal with this matter. Mr. Wade is a gentleman who has risen from the ranks in the Public Service of the State until he has attained the position of chief officer of the Department of Water Conservation. But the honorable member comes to the House, and points to a number of instances of wasteful expenditure by the Department in years past, and by innuendo he tries to lead honorable members to believe that Mr. Wade had something to do with the commission of those mistakes.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Not so.

Mr. BROWN.—I am glad to have the honorable member's denial, because Mr. Wade attained his position as the result of those mistakes, and the officers who were responsible for them had to quit the service.

The present Government of New South Wales has decided to make the question of water conservation an important item in its programme. The people of the State realize the need for water conservation throughout its length and breadth, and no matter what Government may have the control of its destinies, it must be prepared to make that question one of the main planks of its platform in the near future. For the purpose of thoroughly equipping the State to deal with this great question, the See Government sent Mr. Wade on a special mission to America to make inquiry and report, and he has only recently returned. I believe that there is no man in the States to-day who is so well posted as Mr. Wade with up-to-date information on this subject. If honorable members had received his report last night in the spirit in which they are prepared to receive the reports of other officers, I should have said that this action on the part of the honorable member for Macquarie was uncalled for. But how was it received here? Every innuendo was thrown out against it, and there were circulated here, not only newspaper letters or reports, but anonymous letters condemning this site as being unsuitable from the standpoint of water supply.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! The honorable member is clearly anticipating the debate in Committee.

Mr. BROWN.—I do not wish to do that. I desire to state this fact as a reason why some official action should be taken to place before the House Mr. Wade's information, so that honorable members may be satisfied that it is reliable. I understand Mr. Wade is at present in Melbourne; I have not had an interview with him, but the honorable member for Macquarie intimates that he is available to the House. If it thinks that the information which was supplied is not correct, it has the right and opportunity of calling Mr. Wade to the Bar, and questioning him.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Who has thrown any doubt on the report?

Mr. BROWN.—Doubt has been expressed all round.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Not at all.

Mr. BROWN.—The honorable member for Macquarie was met with a running fire of interjections from all parts of the House when he was submitting the document. The main objection taken to the site was based on the question of water supply, the practicability of which has been discredited by more than one speaker.

But I cannot deal with that now. If honorable members feel that the report is not the handiwork of Mr. Wade, he is here, and may be questioned. I am not altogether favorable to the dragging of any public officer before the House to be examined by honorable members, because I do not think that is a proper way to elicit information, unless there is some very special reason for taking that course. Why should not the Government ask Mr. Wade to supply them with an official report—on which would be staked his reputation as the Engineer-in-Chief of Water Conservation in New South Wales, and which, I believe, would be accepted by the large majority of honorable members as being substantially correct. That has been done with respect to Mr. Pridham's report.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We have already agreed to that.

Mr. BROWN.—I am very pleased to hear that intimation. That, I think, pretty well clears the way. I realize that some good has been done by this discussion in reaching that position, because, so far as I could ascertain, there seemed to be a very strong desire not to allow this site to receive the same amount of inquiry and investigation as has been allowed in the case of other sites.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I find that I unwittingly did the right honorable member for Swan a wrong in my comment on some remarks which he made just now, and I ask permission to make the correction. I find that I did not read enough of his speech as reported in Hansard, and had I read the words preceding the quotation which he made from his report, the matter would have been clear. I find that his statement, suggesting grave menace and danger to the Capital Site from the water supply, relates to the construction of an artificial lake, as a beauty spot and a water frontage pure and simple, and does not relate to the water supply proper. Had I known that, I certainly should not have made the remarks I did concerning that report.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—After listening to the remarks about the water supply of Lyndhurst, I think it comes very late in the day, indeed, for the honorable member for Macquarie and the honorable member for Parramatta to say that the supply of water there is as abundant as they try to make out. I was told that during the last drought the people there had to dig wells and put in drives for the purpose of getting sufficient water, and it had to be done on half-rations, too. That is the place in which the honorable member for Macquarie wishes to establish the Federal Capital!

Mr. BROWN.—Where was that?

Mr. PAGE.—At Bathurst, Orange—everywhere in the district. A most peculiar thing is that these honorable members want to back it up—I shall not say by faked figures—by a prejudiced report and for political reasons. The present Premier of New South Wales has long represented, and is now seeking to represent, a constituency in that district. He is now fighting for his very political existence, and I think it is a prostitution of parliamentary power on the part of the Premier of New South Wales to send—

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I rise to a point of order. The honorable member has stated that I have taken this course with a view of helping the Premier of New South Wales in his contest; but it is well known that that honorable gentleman and I are strong political opponents.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is not a point of order.

Mr. PAGE.—I emphatically deny that I made such a statement.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I accept the honorable member's disclaimer; but I understood him to imply that.

Mr. PAGE.—I did not.

Mr. BROWN.—I desire to know, sir, whether the honorable member for Maranoa is in order in saying that the Premier of New South Wales has prostituted his position because he has acceded to the request made to him by the honorable member for Parramatta and myself, to have this information supplied for the convenience of honorable members?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member did not say that, and if he had I am not sure that it would have been out of order.

Mr. PAGE.—It shows that I am hitting these honorable members very hard indeed, when they have to rise and attribute to me words which I never uttered. I do not care what site is selected, though, of course, for many reasons I favour the Southern Monaro sites. The honorable member for Canobolas has referred to the past misdoings of engineers with respect to water supply in New South Wales. Does he wish to see that sort of thing perpetuated in regard to the Federal Capital? Although we have a chance of getting a water supply which we know is second to none in Australia, yet honorable members wish to bolster up their contention, and put the Commonwealth in the same unfortunate position that New South Wales is in. I do not know Mr. Wade, but I have read many of his works on hydraulic engineering and water supply, and I look upon him as one of the greatest authorities on those subjects in the Commonwealth. But apart from that, it seems a very strange thing to me that the honorable member for Macquarie should wish to bring from New South Wales a public officer to give evidence on one particular site. If the honorable member is honest, let him ask the House to bring Mr. Wade here to be questioned on every site.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am quite willing to do that. I shall ask leave to alter the motion.

Mr. PAGE.—And once we have got Mr. Wade to the Bar of the House, let us ascertain who was guilty of spending millions of money in New South Wales on water supply works.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I shall give the honorable member an opportunity of voting in that way.

Mr. PAGE.—That is right. Every time the honorable member for Parramatta rises he addresses the House in such a pedantic manner that he has assumed the position of lecturemaster-general of the Government, or whomsoever is opposed to any scheme that he brings forward.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I leave that to the honorable member, who does it every time he speaks.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member addresses the House in this style—"How dare you do such a thing? I have spoken, and that is quite enough." I shall not submit to be dictated to by the honorable member in his rôle of lecturemaster-general. I hold an equal position in the Chamber with the honorable member, and while I do I shall assert my rights every time. I should like to move that some outside expert be introduced. It seems that these brethren from New South Wales cannot agree as to the best site. A Commission, consisting of engineers from each State, has dealt with the matter, but they could not agree, and I think that the best and cheapest way to get over the difficulty, will be to import an up-to-date man from America, and ask him to choose a site, the Government abiding by his decision.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We do not want any Yankees here.

Mr. PAGE.—Honorable members opposite have been Yankeeing all the time. It is the representatives of New South Wales who are responsible for the delay which has occurred.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is as true as everything else that the honorable member has said.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member knows that it is true. Any one who reads the Hansard reports will see that all the dissension is due to the action of the representatives of New South Wales. I am willing to give my vote to-day, and I feel certain that the mind of every other honorable member is made up, so that all the talk to which we are compelled to listen will not influence any one, and will only have the effect of filling up Hansard. If New South Wales members wish for a site to be chosen, the sooner they allow us to come to a vote the better.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member would give his State away, I suppose?

Mr. PAGE.—I am no traitor, either to my State, or to the Commonwealth. I have never been a renegade. The honorable member is again assuming the part of dictator and lecturemaster-general. He knows what I mean.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I know that what the honorable member is uttering is not true.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Parramatta must withdraw that remark.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I withdraw it.

Mr. PAGE.—I do not take any notice of what the honorable member says. If honorable members opposite are so anxious that the matter shall be dealt with only on complete information, let the determination of the question be postponed to another session, and let the Government take the course I have suggested, of appointing an expert from some other country to make a recommendation on the subject. That is the easiest way out of the difficulty. I have not taken part in any of the picnics to the various sites, nor have I visited any of the places named; but I have asked unbiased engineers, to whom it does not matter which site is chosen, and I shall vote on the information I have received from them. If we agree to examine Mr.

Wade at the Bar of the House, we shall commence a course of procedure the effect of which cannot be foreseen. In the first place, Mr. Wade himself will be placed in a very unpleasant position.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Why? He will simply be asked to tell the truth.

Mr. PAGE.—I do not suppose that he will have any difficulty in telling the truth; but if he is cross-examined, he may be placed in a very difficult position in regard to other professional men.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Let them stand on their reputations.

Mr. PAGE.—That is all very well, but surely Mr. Wade cannot be asked to publicly criticise them. I think that he should not be brought to the Bar. The Government have said that they are willing to obtain a report from Mr. Wade on the Lyndhurst site, or on any other site, and I think that that is all that is necessary.

Mr. McLEAN (Gippsland).—No one can blame the honorable member for Macquarie for doing all he can to place the site of which he is such an able and earnest advocate in the most favorable light. I wish to have the fullest information on all the sites, and, therefore, I shall be prepared to support the honorable member's request if he will deal with them all alike. I am not a supporter of the Tooma site, but I know that a great many honorable members think well of it. We have had, however, no professional report upon it. If we are to examine an expert at the Bar of the House in regard to the Lyndhurst site, I am sure that the honorable member for Macquarie will admit the fairness of obtaining an official report on the Tooma site, and of examining the engineer who furnishes it, at the Bar of the House. If all sites are treated alike in this matter, I will support the honorable member's proposal; but any other arrangement would be one-sided and unfair, and, therefore, could not be supported by me.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—The speech of the honorable member for Gippsland was a very fair one, and it was to some extent on the same lines as that of the honorable member for Maranoa. If expert officials can be brought to the Bar to give us information regarding the possibility of water supply at the various sites, we shall be in a better position in choosing between those sites. A great opportunity will be lost if we do not avail ourselves of Mr. Wade's presence in Melbourne to examine him on the possibilities of the water supply at Lyndhurst. Very great discredit has been cast on certain publications respecting the possibilities of water supply there, and as the Government of New South Wales have, in the interests of the Commonwealth, sent down an expert to give us information on the subject, I think we should call him to the Bar, and elicit from him what he can tell us about the whole matter. The course proposed by the honorable member for Macquarie is, no doubt, an unusual one, but the House is on the eve of making a very momentous decision. There are instances in history of seats of government having been removed from one place to another. That has occurred even in England itself. But centuries will probably pass before any community will have before it a question such as that with which we are now asked to deal. Therefore, it is necessary to have all possible information regarding water supply and other matters of consequence before us. While the Lyndhurst site is not far from my electorate, I would not vote for it unless it could be shown that an adequate water supply could be obtained there. I have told my constituents so. If I were convinced that the supply would be inadequate, I should certainly turn my attention to some other site. What we must have is the best site available. I hope that the House will agree to examine Mr. Wade. The Government have offered to obtain a report from him, but I feel that more than that is required. We have already been supplied with a great number of reports, and many of us will not have time to study further reports. In my opinion, all the experts available should be brought before the House, so that honorable members may obtain from them the information they require, without the trouble of looking up reports which many of us have not the necessary time to read.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I cannot see any justification for the course proposed by the honorable member for Macquarie. I have every respect for Mr. Wade, but the fact that the honorable member asks that he shall be examined at the Bar, when he has already furnished us with a report on the Lyndhurst water supply, shows that the honorable member is not satisfied with that report.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am satisfied with it.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Then why examine Mr. Wade at the Bar of the House?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Because certain honorable members say that they are not satisfied with the information which I have already placed before the House.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I have as much confidence in Mr. Wade as I have in the officers who occupy similar positions in the other States. I know that it is customary to eulogize the heads of Departments upon their assumption of office to such an extent as to lead one to believe that they can be absolutely trusted to lay down perfect lines in regard to future administration. If Mr. Wade be examined at the Bar of the House, what will happen? Every honorable member will be afforded an opportunity of cross-examining him as to his qualifications. In doing so, those who are familiar with the blunders which have been committed in connexion with water conservation works in New South Wales will of necessity question him in such a way as will introduce the names of other officials—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In New South Wales there have not been nearly the same number of blunders committed as have occurred in the other States.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I admit that errors have been made in Victoria such as have not occurred elsewhere. I very much question the wisdom of summoning Mr. Wade to the Bar of the House to give evidence under such conditions. The honorable member for Gippsland has stated the condition upon which he is prepared to support the suggestion of the honorable member for Macquarie. Does he seriously contend that experts other than Mr. Wade should be examined? The Government have already indicated their willingness to obtain a report from him.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Is the honorable member afraid to allow Mr. Wade to be examined?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I have the same confidence in Mr. Wade's report that I have in the reports submitted by other experts upon various aspects of this question. Having that report before us, what more do we require? It is true that expert knowledge is of value so far as it relates to the volume of water which can be conserved at any of the sites. But I hold that the engineering blunders which have been committed in connexion with providing water supplies to various country towns in New South Wales, afford the most condemnatory evidence of expert knowledge that can possibly be supplied. Not only do we require to ascertain the volume of water which is available at each particular site, but also whether it can be conserved. Further, it is necessary for us to provide against such a result as has occurred at Tamworth, where, after an expenditure of 50 per cent. in excess of the official estimate, there is merely an apology for a water supply to-day. We require to know the character of the country constituting the water sheds of these particular areas. At Tamworth the water is conveyed to the town by gravitation, but it carries with it a certain amount of soil, the presence of which is a menace to the health of the people. I have seen that water so discoloured, when coming through the bathroom tap that persons were almost prevented from using it. It is very important that we should know something as to the quality of the water which can be conserved. Obviously any water is useless which contains deleterious matter sufficient to render it unfit for human consumption. If it be logical to summon an engineering expert to the Bar of the House to give evidence as to the quantity of water which can be conserved at any particular site, it is equally logical to summon an analytical chemist to testify to the elements which are contained in that water. Is there any honorable member who will deny the necessity which exists for making such inquiry? The honorable member for Macquarie pointed out last evening that a sample of the water supply at Orange had been subjected to an analytical test. Why was it not taken from the Lyndhurst water-shed? The very fact that it was obtained from Orange indicates a fear that the analyst's report upon a sample taken from the Lyndhurst water-shed would not be satisfactory.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The sample taken from Orange comes from a part of the Lyndhurst water-shed.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable member did not indicate that last evening.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I informed honorable members that it was taken from one side of the Canobolas.

Mr. WEBSTER. — But the honorable member also said that the Lyndhurst water supply would be situated upon the other side of the Canobolas. The proposition that the water can run from one side of the Canobolas into a dam upon the other, is a most remarkable one. Personally I am not prejudiced in favour of any site. It is obvious, however, that the most important factor in connexion with any Federal Capital is its water supply. Without a supply of pure water no capital can be a success. In company with the honorable member for Macquarie I inspected the Lyndhurst site, and endeavoured, in the limited time at my disposal, to investigate the character of the surrounding country, and the possibilities of its water-shed.

Mr. SPEAKER. — Order. The time for the discussion of this motion has expired. The Clerk will call on the Orders of the Day.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 28th July, vide page 3725):

Clause 2 (Determination of Seat of Government).

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—As we are now in Committee on the Bill, I shall not deal further with the question which was under consideration on the motion of adjournment, but shall proceed to review the various sites proposed. I took advantage of the opportunity afforded honorable members to inspect the sites, not because I desired a mere pleasure trip, but because I felt that it was my duty as a representative of the people to personally investigate the merits of the several districts. The parliamentary tours of inspection have been most unfairly referred to by the honorable member for Macquarie as mere picnicing excursions, and the right honorable member for East Sydney has also spoken in a most reprehensible way of the "drawing of corks" which, he suggests, took place on these occasions. I went to Tumut, and was convinced that it was unsuitable as a site for the Federal Capital. One does not need the assistance of an engineer to enable him to judge of the conformation of the country, and to ascertain the reason why fogs prevail or a humid atmosphere exists. Any man possessed of ordinary common-sense is able, from his experience, to determine these matters for himself. As the result of my inspection, I felt satisfied that the sites in the immediate neighbourhood of Tumut did not possess the characteristics essential to a Federal city. I recognised that Tumut would be subject to dense fogs in winter, and that in the summer months the atmosphere would be humid—climatic conditions that should not be associated with the Federal Capital. The water supply, however, would certainly be sufficient for all requirements. One could see the water for himself, and that is more than can be said in connexion with some of the other sites. I watched the stream of water flowing at my feet, and was almost able to calculate for myself what would be the volume available for the Capital if it were established there. I was convinced, however, that the climatic conditions would not be conducive to the health of a large population; the country which we traversed was difficult, and the area of suitable land available was exceedingly circumscribed. I drew a mental picture of what would be the appearance of the Federal Capital on this site, considered what facilities there would be for making such parks and gardens as should be found in a Capital, and what area of suitable land would be available for its suburbs, and arrived at the conclusion that I could not support the selection of Tumut or of any of the sites in the vicinity. We then inspected Batlow, which has already been favorably commented upon, and found that its climatic conditions were distinctly superior to those prevailing at Tumut. Batlow occupies a more elevated position, and we felt that the atmosphere was altogether different. If the Capital were established there it would be sheltered from the biting winds of winter, which are so prejudicial to health; but here again the area of undulating country available is circumscribed. There was evidence of an abundant water supply—very different from that which would be available at Lyndhurst, where a supply would have to be gathered from all parts of the district and conveyed in channels or tunnels to the Capital. At Batlow the supply would be sufficient, not merely for domestic requirements, but to provide the necessary power for heating and lighting the city and for other purposes. In three respects—namely, climatic conditions, purity of water supply, and water power available, I found that Batlow was all that could be desired; nevertheless, it does not contain all the requirements of a Federal Capital site. In the course of this pleasure trip—because it was a pleasure, notwithstanding the discomforts of travelling, to know that one was doing his duty to his country in inspecting these sites—we visited Lyndhurst. I was in no way prejudiced against that site, but went there determined to do it full justice. Although we inspected it in the month of May, the road along which we travelled for some miles was a very dusty one. I do not wish to question the veracity of those who support the selection of this site, but we know that a man who is enthusiastically in favour of a particular district is not the best person from whom to obtain reliable information in regard to it. Such men are prone, not wilfully, but unwittingly, to supply information that is not reliable. They look only at the bright side of the picture, and one must therefore discount their evidence. We have been told of the remarkable productiveness of the land in the neighbourhood of Lyndhurst, and I should like to mention that during my visit I made inquiries on the subject. I know good country when I see it. The honorable member for Macquarie thinks that because he was reared among pumpkins he should be regarded as an exceptionally good authority on farming. I was born and reared in a district in the old country where scientific farming is practised, and where the occupations of the farmers comprise something more substantial than the growing of pumpkins and the rearing of pigs, so that I should have some knowledge of agricultural matters. I therefore resent the suggestion of the honorable member for Macquarie that, because he was born in the Lyndhurst district, he should be better qualified to judge of the productive character of the country than is any other honorable member. In my youth I had an intimate experience of agriculture in a district where rotation of crops was practised, and where one saw truly scientific farming. I have represented a pastoral district for some years, and presume that I should not have been returned to represent the interests of the people there if I were incapable of properly voicing their aspirations and interests. I may also mention that I have travelled all over the western district, and should therefore have some knowledge of its characteristics. In the Lyndhurst district we find undulating country, practically rolling downs, but it is certainly not good agricultural land. I am strengthened in that view by the opinions of those who lived in this district some years ago. I sought information, not from those who were specially interested in the selection of Lyndhurst, but from a source which I knew would be untainted by personal considerations. We have been told that yields of 60 bushels of wheat to the acre are obtainable there, but men who at one time carried on agricultural operations in the district informed me that in really good seasons they had secured as much as 20 bushels to the acre, but that as a rule the return obtained by them was not sufficient to pay for the labour of ploughing, sowing, and harvesting, and to cover the cost of selling. That is good evidence of the agricultural possibilities of the district. The fact that, although it is within easy distance of Sydney, and is connected by rail with that centre of distribution, land in the district is devoted, not to agriculture, but to pastoral purposes, should be a sufficient answer to those who claim that such magnificent yields can be obtained from it. We saw paddocks which at one time had been under the plough, but had since been turned into sheep runs. As a matter of fact, the land there will carry about two sheep to five acres.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member has destroyed the Opposition; they have all left the Chamber.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I care not whether they are present or absent. I am speaking, not merely to honorable members, but to the people of Australia. I am responsible to my constituents only, and I intend to give adequate expression to my views. The Lyndhurst district consists of what is admittedly pastoral country, and it is decidedly uninteresting. We found a monotonous sameness about it—an utter want of picturesqueness. Here and there we saw little knolls, and a line of mountains was dimly visible in the distance, but we looked in vain for water. I wondered why those whose duty it might be considered to be to point out the special qualifications of the site did not take me to water, or show me some indications of water. Had it not been for the fact that a thoughtful, generous soul amongst us had provided us with something to drink, we should have been very thirsty whilst we were inspecting that site. I remained a day after the party left, and went over the Canobolas site. I had seen the Bathurst site the morning before, and I could not understand for the life of me why honorable members representing the district should go back upon those eligible sites in favour of Lyndhurst. When I inspected the Canobolas site I found that it was picturesque, that there was good rich agricultural land there, and that the Lyndhurst site could not be compared to it. The Bathurst site also is miles ahead of the Lyndhurst site in suitability for a Federal Capital. I must admit that there is some doubt about the water supply, even at Canobolas. From the information I received, I understood that the water supply at Orange was near “petering out” during the last drought, and the people were put on short rations in respect of water for domestic and other uses. That was the only doubt I had about the Canobolas site, but I did see water in its vicinity, and that redeemed it in my mind as compared to the Lyndhurst site. Some people wish to know why, as a New South Welshman, I do not advocate the site which comes nearest to the 100-miles limit from Sydney. Some politicians may be dominated by press dictation, and may not look at this question from a Commonwealth stand-point. But in this matter I shall be guided first, not by what some persons may consider to be my duty to my own State, but by what I consider to be my duty to the Commonwealth. If any man in New South Wales tells me that, as a Federal member, I should be parochial on this question, I am prepared to argue the matter with him, but I am not prepared to bend to press domination, or the commands of certain New South Wales members, in dealing with this question. I drove over the Canobolas site, and if I had to give a vote for a site in the western district, I should give my vote every time for Orange. There is no comparison between it and the other western district sites. We left the western district sites, and travelled with the honorable member for Eden-Monaro to visit the sites in his district. I may say that I was greatly impressed by the sites which we visited in the Monaro country. The land is possibly no better agricultural land than that at the Lyndhurst site; but from the evidence of my own senses, I was satisfied that with mountains, snowfalls, and adjacent rivers, there would be an ample supply of the purest water. It is quite unnecessary that any man should be called to the Bar of the House to corroborate or verify a report to that effect concerning the Monaro sites. There is obviously room for doubt about the existence of a very important factor if it is necessary that an expert should be brought to the Bar of this House to say that it is possible to provide a water supply at any given site. That, to my mind, is an indication of absolute weakness in the claims of that particular site. No expert engineers' reports are required to prove to any man visiting the Monaro sites that an ample and pure water supply is to be found there. There is, of course, a difference between the sites in the Monaro district. Some are in my opinion better than others for the purposes of a Federal Capital. Bombala is undoubtedly a pretty site. There is ample room there for a city, and the undulating country in the vicinity supplies the elements of picturesqueness and utility. It has one or two disadvantages, but its general features come very near to what is required for the purpose we have in view. It must not be forgotten that while a good water supply may be secured at Bombala, it would have to be pumped at that site, and that that would raise the cost.

MR. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That cost would not pay the interest on the cost of providing a water supply for Lyndhurst.

MR. WEBSTER.—I am prepared to admit that. If we required water power, as well as an ordinary water supply for the inhabitants of the Federal Capital, the cost at Bombala would be considerable. The first feature to be looked for in choosing a site is the water supply, and that feature requires to be analyzed. We must know the source of the supply, the volume of water, its purity, and the cost involved in providing an adequate supply. I admit that a water supply, sufficient for a city of 50,000 inhabitants could be secured at Bombala at a medium cost, but that does not meet all that I think necessary. I should like to have water power provided if it could be supplied economically. Although the honorable member for Eden-Monaro diligently explained the advantages of the sites in his electorate, I could quite realize that at Bombala we should be likely to suffer to some extent from biting winds in the winter time. Climate is, of course, one of the features which must be considered in connexion with these sites, and there are varying degrees of climate, which must be compared. We must take all the essential features of a site and ascertain the extent to which each is met by different sites, if we are to arrive at a proper decision. In the matter of eligibility, as a site for a Federal Capital, I admit that Bombala presented some elements which were not presented by sites I had previously visited. We drove out some ten miles from Bombala in order to obtain some knowledge as to whence the Capital, if established at that site, would draw its food supply. I was perfectly satisfied with the land that I saw. The area was somewhat circumscribed, but the land was really good agricultural land. It is not at present utilized to any extent, because it is too far from a market. When, in dealing with the agricultural possibilities of various sites, the honorable member for Macquarie submitted a comparison of the areas under cultivation in each district, he neglected to mention that distance from a market has prevented agricultural development at many of the suggested sites. He omitted to say that the land in the neighbourhood of the Tooma site could not be profitably used, except for the growth of fodder, to meet times of drought, the cost of carrying agricultural produce to the railway, in the first instance, being very great, and the railway freight upon that produce to the market being also prohibitive. I can say, without fear of contradiction, that if the Eden-Monaro district had a railway, by which the people there could get their produce expeditiously to market, the percentage of land under cultivation in that district would exceed the percentage which the honorable member for Macquarie quoted for the district around Lyndhurst. The character of the country adjacent to the Capital Site, in respect of its productiveness and its capabilities of providing the necessities of life economically, is an important aspect. I contend that one essential feature of any town or city is that its people shall have the necessities of life at first-hand, instead of having to purchase them through middlemen. All the products necessary for sustaining human life should be grown as near to the city as possible. In this respect I recognise that the country adjacent to Bombala has much to recommend it. It struck me as being very peculiar that when we were driving down to the locality we should have been met not only by a large number of the residents, but also by a large number of cattle which evidently had come to welcome the Federal party! Their presence was a clear indication of what the country would produce and support. As an illustration of its fattening qualifications, this herd of cattle was a revelation to me. There is one point about the Bombala site, and other sites, which has not been touched upon in a practical way, although it is an essential qualification in connexion with the Federal city, namely, the provision that can be made for sanitation. In addition to a clear and plentiful water supply, it is absolutely necessary that we should have an efficient system of sanitation. As one who has taken an active part in municipal affairs, and who has studied the question in the newer suburbs in New South Wales, where the initiatory difficulties of a sewerage system have had to be faced, I am naturally interested in this aspect of the subject. There is only one economical method of disposing of the sewage of a great city, and that is by means of a sewerage farm. Consequently, one point that has to be carefully considered in connexion with establishing the city is whether we have in its vicinity land capable of absorbing the sewage matter, and thereby converting what would otherwise be a nuisance into a beneficial factor in the administration of the city's affairs. We want to be sure that when we establish our sanitary system, we do not run any risk of polluting the very stream from which we receive our water supply. Possibly in the future engineers will discover better means of disposing of sewage matter than have been discovered in the past. Probably we shall learn to treat it by means of electricity. That will remove some of the difficulties that have presented themselves to engineers hitherto. As far as I could see at Bombala, the water supply, having to be drawn from a river adjacent to the proposed site for the Federal city, would be in danger of contamination by the establishment of a sewerage farm within the area. Under the guidance of the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, I had the pleasure of inspecting the district, and it struck me that this was one drawback which, as a practical man, I could not get over.

Mr. BAMFORD.—That objection would apply to all the proposed sites.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I hope to show that it does not apply to all of them. The success of a municipal sewerage farm is largely determined by the quality of the soil into which the sewerage matter is poured. That a well conducted sewerage farm is a source of profit is illustrated in the case of Melbourne. I saw this system worked in the old country, before I came to Australia, and worked in such a way that, instead of the sanitation of a city being a continual source of annoyance to the city corporation, by means of a properly equipped and economically managed sewerage farm, they had made it a source of revenue, which reduced the taxation of the people. From this point of view, the sewerage farm method is, I maintain, the best and most commendable that can be adopted. On the tour to which I have alluded, we visited Delegate. Delegate is one of the sites which was submitted to the last Parliament. It is in many ways a very good site. The surrounding country is rather better than at either Bombala or Dalgety. There is more agricultural land. But the formation of the country is not of such a character as to commend it as an ideal spot for a Capital city. Further than that, the water supply would have to be secured by means of the obnoxious method of dams. I do not believe in a water supply that is secured by damming. A large city requires for human consumption a supply of pure running water, and, from this point of view the damming of water in a large body, which sometimes becomes stagnant, is not wise or beneficial. Further than that, I calculate that the climate at Delegate would be rather warm in the summer time, judging by the latitude and the position of the site. Travelling further, we set out to Dalgety. It was rather a tedious journey. In fact, we did meet with some hardships on these Federal "picnics," as they have been called. The driver of the vehicle in which I travelled lost his way; and had it not been that a man came to look for us with a lantern, Heaven knows where we should have got to! I might not have been here at this moment to give my impressions as to the qualifications of the various sites. But, finally, we got to our journey's end, as determined men generally do. The following morning we were treated by the honorable and learned member for Corio to an illustration of what it is possible for a man to do in country of that description. Before we entered upon our expedition, the honorable member undertook to ford the Snowy River early in the morning with bare feet. Seeing that his garments were not wet when he returned, I concluded that his feat afforded a practical illustration as to the flow of water in the river at that particular time. I do not know whether his object was to afford such an illustration, but certainly that was the effect of his achievement. The country around Dalgety is not so good as the country at Bombala, and certainly not nearly so good as the country at Delegate. As we travelled, we encountered huge granite boulders on the surface of the soil. They reminded me of the kopjes in South Africa, behind which the Boers used to take shelter. Looking at the country from the stand-point of defence, I thought that it would be an ideal spot for the shelter of our troops if we ever had to encounter an enemy in the vicinity. But those granite outcrops indicated the character of the country. Granite country is not good country from an agricultural point of view. One did not, therefore, come to a favorable conclusion as to the possibilities of the soil, because the character of the soil is to a large extent indicated by its apparent composition. From the point of view of beauty, the surroundings at Dalgety were magnificent. There is a panorama on every side. It is a perfect beauty spot from an artist's stand-point. From every aspect a pleasant view meets the eye. The landscape makes the beholder almost long to live in the locality. With the Snowy River running close at hand, the site possesses many of the most important essentials for a Federal city. When I saw it I felt that I had at last arrived at a place where I was sure that the Federal Parliament could advantageously determine to settle. There was no stagnant dam of water there, but a constant stream, fed from the purest source, namely, the heavens and the melting snows. These are important elements in its favour. I recognise that it is necessary to establish the Federal city at a place where there will be something to attract the tourist and the visitor—a place that will be a sanatorium, a place for rest and recuperation to those who live in the arid districts—a place to which persons in other parts of the continent will be inclined to travel for purposes of health and sight-seeing. I quite agree with the right honorable member for East Sydney that we cannot live on scenery, not even on such scenery as Mount Kosciusko presents. But I would remind him that on the other hand it is not desirable that we should locate the Federal Capital at a dull place, where there is nothing whatever of interest, and nothing that would make the visitor desire to return, or long to remain. We certainly must pay regard to the element of picturesqueness. Dalgety possesses, to a very large degree, those features which would be likely to attract visitors. Means of communication is another of the important features. Much has been made of it by the honorable member for Macquarie, who urges that because the establishment of the Federal city at Lyndhurst would not involve an expenditure of more than £50,000 for railway connexions, honorable members should therefore select that site. But it is not a question of how many miles of railway would have to be constructed, but rather of whether, when the railway is constructed, the returns will be sufficient to pay interest and create a sinking fund. If New South Wales, or any other State, had been guided by the principle the honorable member advocates, this vast continent would not have been interlaced with railways. We have had to consider the possibilities which might accrue from their construction, and our wise predecessors in the administration of public affairs have acted in the main correctly, and largely for the benefit of the State. The lack of communication may raise to some extent a difficulty in the case of some sites as compared with others. I admit that Lyndhurst has accessibility, but I cannot admit that that should be allowed to overrule all other considerations. I cannot honestly say that Lyndhurst possesses fully any other of the features which are essential to the site for a Federal Capital. We know that railway communication could be provided from Cooma to Dalgety. It is also desired to have a through railway connexion. People from Victoria, South Australia, and other States desire to be able to go direct to the Federal Capital, and not to be obliged to travel by a circuitous route. The connexion of that site with the Victorian railway system would involve a very large expenditure. But, in fairness to the site and its advocates, it should be said that the question to be considered is not so much the expenditure of money as the character of the country through which the railway would pass, and whether it would be an acquisition to the State and the Commonwealth when constructed. We are dealing with a matter which involves far larger issues than some men who talk very glibly about it appear to recognise. I have not gone into the details which have to be considered before one can arrive at an honest and just conclusion. The reports of this historical discussion will be read when we have passed away, and the wisdom or unwisdom of our choice will be criticised for generations to come. I do not wish my name to be linked with those who have jumped to a conclusion. There are many elements to be considered. We have to judge the sites from the stand-points of climate, soil, quantity and purity of water supply, accessibility, picturesqueness, and general adaptability. We have to consider, not only those questions, but the cost of resuming the lands, and not their intrinsic value only, but also their prospective productive value. Leaving the Bombala sites, the Coolringdon site, eight miles from Cooma, is very eligible from one standpoint. It has advantages from the standpoint of railway communication. A supply of water might be got from two sources — from the Murrumbidgee, and the mountains adjacent. This site is not so precipitous as the others. It is slightly undulating in character, and larger in area and scope. It resembles a large table-land more than anything else. And from the standpoint of accessibility it is far preferable to the Lyndhurst site. If we are to judge the quality of these sites and their claim to our support from that standpoint, the Coolringdon site is as good as, if not preferable to, the site which has been eulogized by the honorable member for Macquarie. I ask honorable members who intend to vote for the Lyndhurst site, because it could be cheaply connected with a railway system, to pay due regard to the claims of Coolringdon. Having dealt as minutely as I can with the sites, I come to the last visit we paid to the Tooma site. I had no intention of going to see the site, but I felt that, notwithstanding a promise I had made to return to my home, it was an imperative duty on my part to make the visit in order that I might be able to come to a right conclusion. Our journey to Tooma was not made under pleasant conditions; the companionship was pleasant, but the trials of the trip were disagreeable. To drive seventy miles in one day is not an agreeable undertaking in this weather. All along the line we found food for reflection, and the outlook was most interesting. The climate was very invigorating, and as I drank in the pure atmosphere I wondered why any country of that character should be unoccupied. My common sense soon supplied me with an answer. I quickly perceived that it was unprofitable to occupy the country, owing to the difficulty of getting products to market. I then began to ask myself, "By whom is this country occupied?" I instituted an inquiry as to the number of landholders between Germanton and Tooma, and I found that for a distance of seventy miles the country was practically held by seven firms or families. I then asked myself, "Why, and for how long, have these families held this country?" I thought that, perhaps, it might have only recently come into their possession by reason of the failure of the previous holders. I found, however, that the land was so good that its holders did not wish to let it go. I discovered that they could find in Australia no better or more profitable place on which to pitch their tents. Why had they no desire to sell this land, which was the pick of New South Wales? Because it provided them with a handsome income at a minimum of expenditure. From the carriage window as we travelled through the country we looked at beautiful scenery instead of at ring-barked timber. In the Lyndhurst district, one cannot see even a forest reserve, or a place where timber could be conserved. Every tree has been ring-barked. Why? Because every blade of grass that can be grown is needed for the succour of stock in summer and winter. The timber has been destroyed by the hungry pastoralists, who are always ready to sweep away a forest, and to sweep away with it, as they often do, wealth far greater than the value of the land which they clear, or of its products for years to come. We can judge of the character of a country by the trees which it grows in the same way as we can judge of the character of a man by his stature. The character of a country is delineated in that way. Yet when we go to Lyndhurst we find only inferior timber, and notice the absence of those elements which would indicate that its soil is capable of supporting a large population. Travelling towards the Tooma site, I was not prepared for the surprise which I experienced. I was surprised to find that at half-past 9 o'clock at night the cold did not make a person shrink towards the fire, or bring into use a top-coat or a rug, but invigorated him. That indicates the temperature and the character of the climate. On rising next morning, although there was ice on the shallow waters adjacent, my comrades and I, who had to turn out in our pyjamas to replenish our water supply, instead of being benumbed by the cold, felt fresh enough to take a good long walk. That is the kind of temperature that I like to find in a country—one which braces up and invigorates a man. It is a climate like that which produces the characteristics which we desire to see in our population. Next morning we climbed to the top of a mountain called Bald Knob. I think, and although I admired the scenery of the Dalgety site, it is nothing to the panoramic view spread out before us on the occasion of which I am now speaking. I saw then the ideal site for the Australian Capital, a site which the artist could paint, and the poet could sing about. Honorable members opposite would have no trouble in securing the selection of Lyndhurst if it possessed such scenery. We all marvelled at the beauty of the prospect. Returning, we had a day's journey of eighty miles, because the Parliament of this great Commonwealth could not afford to allow its members to acquire information on this momentous question unless they travelled at top speed. Therefore, we missionaries who were looking for a site had to hurry along as fast as we could. We had really to submit to a sort of martyrdom, such as the Government should not have expected us to undergo, and therefore we did not make our examination of the district under the most favorable circumstances. We had not sufficient time to photograph the scenery with our eyes, and imprint it upon our memories. But I—and I think every other member of the expedition was equally zealous—used all my opportunities to the best advantage. At Welaregang we passed through beautiful undulating country—country somewhat resembling that of Lyndhurst, but quite different in character. Beyond it is a fine panorama of hills. Then we saw the rich Murray flats. There is no denying the fertility of the land on the banks of the Murray, and the undulating country behind it is also capable of high production, if properly cultivated, as it would be if the Federal Capital were located in the district. In the matter of water supply, there is the Murray, which winds its way through the landscape, its glassy surface being seen here and there as one's eye travels over the prospect; the Tooma River, the Tumberumba Creek, and several other creeks which come from the Snowy Mountains, bearing with them pure, undiluted, and ever-running water. We ought not to choose a site whose water supply will be derived from dams. The records show that townships which are so supplied are visited periodically, and almost annually, with epidemics of typhoid, diphtheria, and other diseases. We ought not, if by the exercise of a wise discretion we can avoid doing so, to locate the Capital where the people will have to depend for their water supply upon storage reservoirs. I am not influenced in this matter by the hope of gaining votes, or by the fear of losing them. If there were a proposed site in my constituency, and it were one which I did not think the best, having regard to the interests of the whole Commonwealth, I should vote against it, even though I knew that by doing so I should lose my seat in Parliament, and the paltry living wage of £400 a year, which practically provides us with only enough to keep us out of the workhouse. I am not a surveyor. I could not take a theodolite or other instrument and measure the heights of the hills, or determine the fall of the water-courses. But I am a man of common sense and clear perception, and when I see streams which are fed by 900 square miles of snow-covered mountains, I know that the district through which they flow is provided with an endless supply of pure water. Surely a man can believe his own eyes, and rely on his own judgment in such a case. But I do not object to the Government authorizing the most minute investigation into the merits of the Tooma site. I feel sure that if such an investigation is made the district will be shown to be even a better one than I have described it to be. I am no more afraid of the production of an expert's report on the Tooma site than a man who is guiltless would be afraid of an investigation into his character. Knowing the advantages possessed by the site, I welcome such a report. But, although experts may put before us scientific calculations, and statements of quantities, volumes, heights, and so on, I shall never be guided entirely by their judgment. I have seen too many monuments to the incapacity of experts to be ready to sink my own judgment. In the electorate which I represented in the New South Wales Parliament, £32,000 was absolutely wasted by experts who were without practical knowledge of the conditions under which their work was being done.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Where?

Mr. WEBSTER.—An attempt was made to divert the water from the Big River, in the Moree district, into the billabongs and dry creeks lower down, in order to supply a large area of waterless country. A weir was therefore constructed at great cost, and the work was splendidly carried out. It was a credit to the men who were responsible for it. But the experts who designed it forgot that they were dealing with black soil country having a gravelly bottom, with the result that the first flood washed the whole thing away, and thousands of pounds were wasted. Facts like that make one careful about accepting implicitly the statements of experts. "Once bitten, twice shy."

Personally, I shall never take the opinion of experts unless it is corroborated by that of other experts, and commends itself to my own judgment. It does not matter to me whether the Capital is located on the borders of Victoria or somewhere near Queensland. Accessibility is, of course, a consideration, but it is not the chief consideration. In time to come the artificial boundaries between the States will be swept away. Why, then, should we not put aside all parochial considerations, and regard the question with a broad sweep of view, as one affecting the future of a great nation? If honorable members wish to rise to the position of patriots, they will not be guided by parochial considerations, and they will not pass judgments upon sites which they have not seen. It is always the man who knows least who is the most confident. But those who have not taken advantage of the opportunities afforded by the Government to visit the various proposed sites, and are governed by the narrow parochial views of the press in their own States, are not the men who can be trusted to come to a right decision on this question.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have always been taught to watch the man who boasts of his own honesty.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I, am not boasting of my honesty; I have never had need to do so. If the honorable member occupies a different position, he has my sympathy. I have never had to parade my honesty, and I hope that I shall never have to do so.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member has been parading it for the last half-hour.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I do not think that any impartial member will say that I have tried to be unjust to any one, but it will not redound to the credit of honorable members if they vote for a site which they have not personally inspected. I challenge anybody who has visited the Tooma site to say that it does not fulfil all essential conditions. I claim that it is in every way suited to the purposes of a Federal Capital. There is adequate land surrounding it to permit of the erection of suburban residences, and the soil itself is capable of producing everything that is necessary for the support of a city. At very little cost, a series of artificial lakes could be constructed, with a view to beautifying the Capital. Rows of trees could be planted for the purpose of affording shelter in the summer, and flowers could be grown in abundance. In the immediate vicinity the snow-clad mountains rise before one as far as the eye can reach. It is possible to gaze at those mountains, with the sun glistening upon them at one moment, and immediately afterwards to turn round and behold orange trees growing to perfection. Do honorable members require any other proof of the excellence of the climate? In determining the location of a Capital Site, it is important that we should know which way the wind blows.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The political wind?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I took the precaution to ascertain which way the wind blows at Tooma, both in the winter and in the summer. The climate is admirable, and the country and its surroundings are beautiful. Do we not all understand what constitutes the main attraction of the watering places of the British Isles? Is it not the scenery, and is not that attraction world-wide? If we select the Welaregang site, there will be no need for tourists from the old world to visit New Zealand or Tasmania in search of beauty spots. They will be able to spend their leisure at the Seat of the Federal Government. Of course, I am thinking of the stream of visitors who will continue to be attracted to Australia when we shall have passed away, when our population shall have learned how to till the soil, how to apply scientific methods to production, and when land which is now regarded as valueless shall have become one of our best assets. There will then be millions of people settled upon our territory, where to-day there are only thousands. I have endeavoured faithfully to outline a picture—a perfect picture, perfect because it is that of Nature—of the Welaregang site. It presents a scene such as no painter ever transferred to canvas. It must be seen to be appreciated. So far as sanitation is concerned, provision could easily be made there for the establishment of a sewerage farm without any fear of the water supply becoming contaminated. Further, I will undertake to say that any railway which is constructed to that site will practically pay from the outset. Consequently, that question presents no difficulties. But there is still another feature upon which we might well bestow our attention. The surrounding country presents vast mineral possibilities. Tumut and Tumberumba have already produced, and are still producing, a large quantity of gold. We all know that wherever alluvial gold has been washed down valleys between mountains, it is only a matter of time when the source of the deposits will be discovered. Mr. Holtermann, who was a mining expert, and who made so much money at Hill End, was so convinced of the existence of auriferous reefs in this locality that before he died he had, by means of a tunnel, penetrated into a hill a distance of 600 feet, in an endeavour to cut some of these reefs. That work only stopped with his decease. If by the construction of a railway to the Tooma site we can open up avenues of employment which will recoup the Treasury for the money expended, and at the same time impart a stimulus to mining, that consideration should constitute another of its recommendations. I am not here to favour or to seek favour from any one. I am not here to placate any honorable member, but to do my duty according to my lights, and to express as plainly as possible the views which I hold, so that they may be recorded for future reference by those who may have hereafter to criticise my actions. The resumption of the land in this district would be a profitable undertaking. In the territory which I favour we should have a large area of productive land. In dealing with this question we have to consider not so much the price of the land as its productivity. The true value of land can be determined only in that way. It is better to pay £5 per acre for land, 100 acres of which is sufficient to support a man and his family, than to pay £2 10s. for a tract of country, on 1,000 acres of which it would not be possible for a man to make a living for himself and those dependent on him. In dealing with this question we must look into every detail, and consider all the elements that are essential to a Federal Capital. If we do, we shall come to a satisfactory decision; if, on the other hand, we are guided only by ex parte statements, I fear that an error will be committed. I have done my best to impartially place before the Committee the views that I hold, and I fear no report that may be asked for in reference to the territory which I favour. The honorable member for North Sydney, when discussing this question last week, referred to the possibility of beautifying a district by artificial means, and spoke of what England had accomplished in this direction. Does not that suggest that the honorable member has in view a site in which it would be necessary to endeavour by artificial means to make good in some respects the natural beauty that it lacks?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not know of any such site.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Will any one tell me that any effort on the part of man could supply the equivalent of natural beauty? Nature cannot be successfully imitated. Natural, rather than artificial, beauties, constitute the chief attractions of England. I know, of course, that they have many magnificent gardens and parks in the old land, for I have visited them myself; but none of them compare with the natural scenery with which the Almighty has blessed the country. No snow-capped mountain ridge meets the eye of the visitor to Lyndhurst. Could the honorable member for North Sydney supply that deficiency? Lyndhurst gives no promise of even great artificial possibilities. We should certainly not be able to make any artificial lakes in the district—a feature which would be sadly missed. Those who urge that any deficiency in natural beauty may be made good by art cannot mean what they say, or if they do they have given no consideration to the cost that would be involved in supplying even a poor imitation. In conclusion, I earnestly and sincerely appeal to honorable members to endeavour to do that which will redound to our credit, and to lay aside all parochial considerations. If honorable members have not seen the site which I have just described, there is yet time for them to do so before we arrive at a determination. Those who have neglected every opportunity to inspect these sites, and are disposed to support the selection of a district merely because it is in the vicinity of Sydney—quite unmindful of its disadvantages—should pause before they give their vote. The Sydney press appears to echo the statements made by certain politicians in this House. It is marvellous how the echoes of this debate are heard in New South Wales. We are told in the Sydney press that representatives of New South Wales are fighting against the interests of that State; but I care not for the press of Sydney, or of any other place, nor shall I have regard to any party consideration in dealing with this question. I have a duty to perform, and shall do it even at the peril of losing my seat in this Chamber. Whatever may be the result, I shall have the satisfaction of knowing that I have endeavoured to do my duty to my constituents, to the State from which I come, and to the Commonwealth; and with that knowledge I shall be happier than will be those who have not endeavoured to deal with this question on broad and general lines.

Mr. RONALD (Southern Melbourne). — It is not usual for an honorable member to compliment the speaker who has just preceded him, but I could not proceed to discuss this question without referring to the magnificent, eloquent, poetic, and graphic speech which has just been made by the honorable member for Gwydir. Happy should we be if every honorable member who went forth to inspect the Capital Sites had something of the vision and the faculty divine to see as he saw, and to describe as he has described, the districts which we visited. We all feel grateful to the honorable member for his earnest, able, graphic, and impartial estimate of the various sites which have been submitted for our inspection, and from which we have now to make a selection. There are one or two points, which have not yet been touched upon, notwithstanding all that we have heard.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—As with the Queen of Sheba, the half has not been told.

Mr. RONALD.—Exactly. I wish to take a retrospective view, and to ask the Committee to look back at the experience of the world. In dealing with this question we are not groping in the dark; we have the experience of the world for our guidance. It has been said again and again that the Federal Capital will be a small and insignificant city, and Washington is the model which has been continually held up to our view. I do not think that this is correct. I believe that the Federal Capital will be a great city, and that we should make provision for a much larger population than is generally anticipated. It is bound to be not only the political, but the social centre of Australian society. That is the opinion which I have formed from a review of the experiences of the world. I look back at the capital of my own native land, Edinburgh, to me the prettiest city in the world—the modern Athens, far surpassing ancient Athens. Prior to the union of Scotland with England, and to the removal of the Parliament to London, Edinburgh had a galaxy of witty men and pretty women, a society of which no other country in Europe could boast the like. With the removal of the Legislature to London, that society left, and the grand old residences of Murray House and Holyrood were given over to vagrants and to rats. Doubtless a new Edinburgh has arisen on the site of the old, but the great lesson we learn is this: that when the legislative power was shifted to London, our gentry and money-spending medium went with it, with the result that the grand old mansions have gone into disrepair, and are now the habitation of rats. When I look at Dublin I see exactly the same state of affairs. Donnybrook, which is now a by-word for all that is rowdy and tatterdemalion, was once the centre of the bright, witty, sparkling society of Ireland. When the Irish Parliament was taken away, the Irish gentry followed their legislators to London, and that part of one of the brightest cities in the world has been depopulated of its society. When I speak of society, I mean not that lackadaisical dilettanteism which indulges in afternoon teas and dinner parties, but the society which makes a nation—its literature, its art, its law, and its politics. All these went with the removal of the capital. The deduction that I wish to draw from these facts is that the Federal Capital will be the centre of society. The representative of the Crown will reside there. This will doubtless be a great source of attraction, and the city will become a very large and important one. We must consequently take care that the area is not circumscribed. It is for this reason that I think that the site which was last described in the excellent speech of the honorable member for Gwydir would provide the greatest accommodation for a large, important, beautiful, and great centre of Australian life—the centre of all that is highest and best and noblest in our civilization. There are other considerations which must not be forgotten. There is the natural beauty of environment which Bombala possesses as well as the series of natural fortifications which are to be found round it. We know that nowadays it is unwise that the capital should be a seaport town, in view of the great facilities for bombardment, and the old sentiment still remains, that if the capital has fallen, the country is captured. We should see to it that our city, wherever it be, is not on the seaboard. It must not be exposed to the danger of bombardment, but must be supplied with a series of natural fortifications that will make it impregnable. The city where the archives of our nationality will be preserved should be one in which we shall be able to hold out against all-comers. This is one of the advantages possessed by the site described by my honorable friend, the Eden revived, which he has depicted. It is for this reason that I return to my first love, Bombala, and find in it advantages which no other site possesses. It has a port at a respectable distance, and would certainly be beyond the reach of even the most accurate long-distance guns on vessels entering the harbor. The series of natural fortifications along the road which we traversed would make it simply impregnable, no matter how strong the foe might be. We should find there the natural means of protection which exist in South Africa, for between the coast and the town of Bombala there are kopjes and other natural fortifications which would make it possible for the capital to hold out against any enemy. Then, again, it possesses other advantages. It has been said that accessibility is a very important feature, but I go further, and say that it is the all-important feature. Some honorable members appear to me to be considering the selection of a Federal Capital Site to meet the existing requirements of the Federation; but it ought not to be forgotten that this Commonwealth is but in its infancy, and what its future proportions may be no man can accurately prophesy. One needs not to be a prophet to say that this Federation will never be complete until New Zealand is in it. That result may not be brought about immediately; but that there will be some kind of federation in respect of Defence, Customs, and such matters, between New Zealand and Australia is as certain as that to-morrow's sun will rise. This should not be overlooked in considering the important feature of accessibility. In this view the Bombala and the Upper Murray sites are unquestionably the most central. We know that electricity is certain to be the great force of the future, and an indispensable requirement of the Federal Capital Site is a cheap and ready means of generating that force. If it has to be generated by coal it is most expensive; but if the generating force is water we can have electric light and power provided in the cheapest possible manner. The only two sites which provide the water power necessary for generating electricity are Bombala and the site on the Upper Murray. In each of these cases it would be practically drawn from Mount Kosciusko. I trust that honorable members will not overlook the element of accessibility, and that, in making their selection of a site for the Federal Capital, they will contemplate a partnership of the Commonwealth with New Zealand at no distant date. I am sure that every rational and fair-minded overture made in that direction will meet with a ready response from the people of New Zealand. I have said that the site chosen should be naturally impregnable and capable of defence without the risk of great loss of human life. If these important qualifications are borne in mind the selection must lie between Bombala and Tooma. I have not seen the latter site, but I have had the privilege of inspecting the Bombala site. The elements essential for the support of a great city—and I believe the Federal Capital will be a great city—are to be found at the site of my first choice, Bombala. I am free to admit that my affections have been somewhat won by the descriptions of the Upper Murray site to which I have listened. I wish that I had been able to avail myself of the opportunity afforded to honorable members to visit that site. I hope that honorable members will not allow any provincialism or any State antipathies to influence their choice. If they do the child unborn may yet rue the selection made to-day. In my opinion there are only the two places which, from the point of view of science, sociology, and common sense, are entitled to be considered in selecting the future Federal Capital. I have not yet wavered in my affection for Eden; its very name suggests an ideal site.

Mr. KNOX.—We were turned out of Eden.

Mr. RONALD.—That is so, but we found another Eden in Edinburgh, and if in Australia we can improve upon that we shall have the ideal city, the golden city, and may it be, if not the Eternal City, a lasting city. But we should view this matter seriously and soberly, and in view of New Zealand forming a part of our great federation, Eden port will be about as near the centre of the Federation, from the point of view of accessibility, as we can get. It has been said that we require an agricultural area for the Federal Territory. We do not require an agricultural area; what we need is a horticultural area, and I have seen no better horticultural area than the district around Bombala. Something has been said about the grazing properties of that district, and I need only say that the stock it produces is a guarantee as to that. I ask honorable members to remember the essential elements required, and to rid themselves of petty provincial jealousies. We have no objection to the selection being expedited as much as possible, but we deprecate undue haste. Time is not wasted in making necessary inquiries, and in that connexion we should all be very thankful, especially to the honorable member for Hume, for the opportunities afforded honorable members to visit the various sites suggested, that they might not give a vote in the dark. I am sure the honorable gentleman made arrangements for those visits purely in the interests of the selection of the most suitable site. Personally, I can say that he has never in any way sought to influence me to vote for a particular site. Victoria and New South Wales are not the only States concerned in the selection we make. We should remember the long distances which honorable members representing Western Australia and Queensland will have to come, and the dreary railway journeys they must make. In their interests we should see that the site selected is as central as possible, and we should not forget that it is important to know which line of railway with a uniform gauge would be most profitable. I am convinced that if all the elements to which I have referred are taken into account, and the question is dealt with impartially and without prejudice or provincialism, the choice must lie between the Upper Murray and the Eden-Monaro sites.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume).—I understood that there was no intention to go to a division on the clause to-day. Many honorable members who wish to speak have gone away with that understanding. I shall occupy more than the half-an-hour that is left to us, and, if possible, I should prefer not to speak to-day. I am aware that the honorable member for Grampians is also very anxious to speak before any decision is come to. I hope the Government will not allow the clause to go to a division when there is such a small attendance of honorable members.

Mr. BATCHELOR. — It is not proposed now to ballot for particular sites.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — If we pass clause 2 there will be no necessity for a ballot. It would be altogether against the general understanding to go to a division on this clause to-day. I know that requests have been made that there should be twenty-four hours' notice given before a division is taken. We might as well adjourn now. I do not wish to commence a speech to-day, and finish on Tuesday. I should prefer to say all I have to say on the same day. The honorable member for Gwydir has made a most eloquent speech, and one which has been unequalled in this debate, and other honorable members are not inclined to proceed to-day.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—I agree with the honorable member for Hume that as a division is not to be taken to-day the clause cannot be passed as it stands. I wish to know from the Government what procedure they intend to adopt with regard to the amendment that will be necessary if we are to substitute another site for that which is mentioned in the Bill? Is it proposed that all the words after "shall be" be omitted, creating a blank which will be filled up by another name; or, is it intended to substitute another site forthwith? There must be an opportunity to make sure that the site which is finally inserted is supported by a majority of the House. If the Government have made up their minds as to the procedure to be adopted, it is just as well that they should inform the Committee.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby—Minister of Home Affairs).—The Government do not ask the Committee to come to a division to-day, but as we have not yet reached the ordinary adjournment hour, so long as honorable members are prepared to speak up to 4 o'clock, we shall be glad if they will express their views. It seems to me that the simplest and best method of ascertaining the opinion of the House would be to continue the discussion on the motion that the clause be agreed to. When the debate has exhausted itself, progress will be reported, and on the following day we shall take a ballot in the House. If we were to adopt the course mentioned by the honorable member for North Sydney, and to strike out the words after "be" in the second line of the clause, it would be impossible afterwards to re-insert the words if it were desired to do so. Therefore, we do not propose to strike them out. So long as honorable members are prepared to continue the discussion upon the sites they will be allowed to do so. But there will be no actual division in Committee upon the clause. The decision will be postponed until a ballot has taken place in the House. When a decision is arrived at, discussion will be resumed in Committee, and the site determined upon by ballot will be inserted.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Do the Government propose to postpone the clause now?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—No. If no honorable member desires to continue the discussion, progress will be reported.

Mr. BROWN.—We should understand that reporting progress does not mean the closing of the debate.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We do not suggest closing the debate to-day.

Progress reported.

PUBLIC SERVANTS' DEBTS.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—During my recent visit to Queensland, serious complaints were made to me in regard to the difficulty which tradespeople there experience in getting many Federal public servants to meet their financial engagements. I ask the Postmaster-General if his attention has been drawn to this matter. Has the difficulty of compelling many Federal public servants to pay their just debts been brought under his notice? If such complaints have been made to him, will he seek to provide a remedy, by regulation or otherwise?

Mr. MAHON.—A substantial though not a very large number of traders have complained to the Department of the difficulty which they experience in inducing public servants to meet their obligations. In several cases, judgments have been recorded, and execution levied, against Federal officers; but the creditors have been unable even by that means to secure payment of their accounts. The matter has been under the consideration of the Public Service Commissioner, who is of opinion that the Public Service Act gives no remedy to a creditor unless the debt is sufficiently large to allow him to sequester his debtor's estate; but, in my view, misconduct of the kind complained of can be dealt with under section 46 of the Act, the public servant being guilty of improper conduct in allowing himself to be dunned by creditors during office hours. I have asked the Deputy Postmasters-General of the various States to invite the officers against whom complaints have been lodged to make a statement of their defence. When such statements have been received, further action will be taken.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—In the case of Palmer v. Withers, although the plaintiff obtained a judgment against his debtor, a Federal public official, the judgment still remains unsatisfied. That case has been brought under the notice of both the present Postmaster-General and his predecessor, and I ask, therefore, if he has any objection to laying on the table an abstract of the papers referring to it.

Mr. MAHON.—Speaking from memory, a judgment was recorded against the defendant in the case mentioned, and remains unsatisfied; but the matter is still pending. When a final decision is arrived at, I shall have no objection to laying on the table an abstract of the papers.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Where officers of the Postmaster-General's Department have to sue outsiders, will the honorable gentleman see that steps are taken to help them, in the same way as their creditors are to be helped?

Mr. MAHON.—I am not aware that the creditors of Federal officials have asked the Department to do anything contrary to the practice which has obtained in the Departments of the States—that is, to see that the officers of the Federal Public Service are reasonably honest, for the reputation of the service itself.

VANCOUVER MAIL SERVICE.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In Saturday's Argus there is an account of an interview with the Premier of Queensland, headed "Ocean Mail Contracts—Position of Queensland," in which the following statement occurs:—

It transpired, in the course of conversation, that Mr. Morgan has been endeavouring to get the New Zealand Government to take over the Vancouver service. The New Zealand Government opened negotiations in the matter through the Federal Government, and Mr. Morgan expressed his willingness to agree to a proposal to transfer the service to New Zealand, but as far as he knows, nothing has yet been decided, though the negotiations may be still going on with the company.

I wish to know from the Postmaster-General if anything has been done? How is it that Mr. Morgan has opened up negotiations with the New Zealand Government in a matter which is entirely within the province of the Federal Government?

Mr. MAHON.—The statement which the honorable member has read is partly correct, since a proposal was made by the Queensland Government in the direction referred to. I ask him, however, to give formal notice of his question, so that I may be prepared with a full answer to-morrow.

MAIL SERVICE WITH KING ISLAND.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. In view of the isolated position of the people of King Island, and the very high price demanded by the Union Steamship Co. for a limited mail service, will he secure one of the obsolete gun-boats of Queensland, now costing about £2,000 annually to maintain, and operate it as a Commonwealth enterprise between the mainland and King Island?

2. Is he aware that a profitable business could be done in the carriage of live stock, passengers, and produce?

3. Is he aware that this boat would afford the people of that thriving island decent communication with the rest of the Commonwealth?

Mr. MAHON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. The Postmaster-General's Department has no control over the gun-boats of Queensland, and is not aware that they could be used for the purpose indicated.

2. So far as the Postmaster-General has been advised, a profitable business could not be done with King Island by the use of a gun-boat for the carriage of mails, cargo, and passengers.

3. It is considered that the existing service, practically once a week, now performed by the s.s. Yambagoona, provides reasonable postal communication with King Island, especially as the revenue derived from the post-office at that island only amounts to £105 per annum. The existing service costs, including the salary of the postmaster, £140 per annum.

TOWN CLOCK, BOULDER CITY.

Mr. FRAZER asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether he is aware that, owing to the absence of a town clock at Boulder City, Western Australia, no reasonable facility is available for the people there to ascertain the correct time?

2. If so, whether, in view of the importance and future prospects of the town named, he will provide sufficient funds in his Estimates, 1904-5, to permit of the erection of a suitable time-piece at the post-office?

Mr. MAHON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. The Postmaster-General is not responsible for any lack of facility owing to the absence of a town clock at Boulder City.

2. He cannot undertake to provide funds on his Estimates for the erection of a time-piece at the post-office, as he is not prepared to depart from the decision previously arrived at, namely, that it is not the function of his Department to provide public clocks in connexion with any post-offices. If a public clock is desired at the post-office, it should be supplied and maintained by the residents in accordance with the practice followed in other places in the Commonwealth under similar conditions.

AUSTRALIAN FROZEN OR TINNED MEAT.

Mr. KELLY asked the Minister of Trade and Customs, upon notice—

1. Whether the Japanese Government has arranged for the supply of Australian or foreign frozen or tinned meat to its troops in the field?

2. If so, will the Commonwealth Government impress on the Government of New South Wales the desirability of taking the present favorable opportunity to, through its trade representative in the east, make inquiries as to the best means of making a market for Australian frozen or tinned meat in Japan?

Mr. FISHER.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. The Government has no information in regard to contracts which may have been entered into by the Japanese Government.

2. This Government favours the opening of new markets for Australian products. Queensland, as well as New South Wales, has a special commercial agent in the east at present to advise on the matters referred to.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 29th July, vide page 3753):

Clause 2 (Determination of Seat of Government).

Mr. McLEAN (Gippsland).—I regard the question with which we are now dealing as one of supreme importance, because it affects the interests, not only of the present, but of all future generations. Indeed, there is no doubt in my mind that our decision will affect future generations to a very much larger extent than it will the present generation, because, as the population of the Commonwealth increases, the importance of the Seat of Government—if we make a wise selection—will grow proportionately. Therefore, it would be most unfortunate if any selfish local interests or any narrow provincial prejudices were permitted to become determining factors in the choice of this site. If we could only place ourselves—I know that it is a difficult thing to do—in the position of impartial observers, say of intelligent foreigners, and could look at this matter without any personal bias or selfish interest whatever, I believe we should find it very much easier to make a judicious selection of a Federal Capital Site. It appears to me that the way in which we can most nearly approach that state of affairs is by first determining in our own minds the conditions which are most essential to the Seat of Government. Having arrived at a decision without having been influenced by an undue regard for any particular locality, we should then consider how far the different available sites comply with those conditions. After having given this matter very careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the most essential conditions to any Federal Capital Site are centrality and accessibility. Other essentials are an abundant supply of pure fresh water, a healthy locality, and a good climate. I am also of opinion that the Seat of Government should be established in a picturesque district, which is possessed of some distinctive features of natural beauty. Then, of course, it is most desirable that the Federal territory should contain a fair proportion of good productive land. Of course, there are other minor advantages into the consideration of which it is not necessary for me to enter. But the conditions which I have enumerated I regard as essential to a suitable site for the Seat of Government.

Mr. HIGGINS.—What does the honorable member mean by saying that the site should be a central one?

Mr. McLEAN.—I mean that it should be central from the stand-point of the nearest available trade routes. Of course, I do not mean that it should be central from the point of view of a camel service or of anything of an impracticable character.

Mr. SKENE.—Not from the stand-point of existing lines only?

Mr. McLEAN.—No. I mean that the site which we select should be capable of being made central at a reasonable cost.

Mr. WILKINSON.—The honorable member would have some regard to future population, too?

Mr. McLEAN.—Decidedly. In selecting the Seat of Government we should never lose sight of future generations, because I believe that they will be more deeply affected by our determination than will be the present generation. Having carefully considered the conditions which I regard as essential to a suitable site, the next step is to ascertain how far each of the proposed sites complies with those conditions. Let me deal first with the western site. I have regarded this question from every stand-point, and I have looked in vain for the reasons which have induced the advocates of that site to support it. So far as centrality and accessibility are concerned, we must remember that there are four States situated to the south of Sydney, and only one to the north.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—May not the northern State become the most populous?

Mr. McLEAN.—Heaven only knows. I should not be at all surprised if in the not far distant future, Western Australia, with its vast territory, and its enormous mineral deposits, became the most populous of all the States. Yet it is farthest removed from all the proposed sites for the Seat of Government.

Mr. CARPENTER.—In connexion with this question, that State has not been considered at all.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am very much afraid that up to the present time it has not. When we recollect that there are four States situated to the south of Sydney and only one to the north, is it fair to establish the Seat of Government to the north of Sydney?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Certainly; that is where it should be.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am glad that my honorable friend can reconcile such a proposal with his conscience. I can stretch my own conscience fairly, but if I stretched it to that extent, I should feel that I was false to my trust, and that I was not representing the interests of the Commonwealth as a whole, which, after all, is what we should endeavour to do.

Mr. McDONALD.—Coghlan states that within a few years, the centre of population will be to the north of Sydney.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am not aware that Mr. Coghlan is endowed with any divine gift of prophecy, or that he is more capable of looking into the future than we are.

Mr. FOWLER.—Very probably Mr. Coghlan has never visited Western Australia.

Mr. McDONALD.—The Commonwealth pays £700 a year to obtain his book, anyhow.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does the honorable member imagine that because Mr. Coghlan is a careful recorder of events which have transpired, he is better able to forecast the future capabilities of the different States than we are? We must look at this matter from a more reasonable stand-point. When we consider that there are four States situated to the south of Sydney, and only one State to the north, it appears to me that any proposal to establish the Federal Capital to the north of that city is an outrage upon common sense. From the stand-point of centrality, it is certainly nothing less than grotesque. Even if the Capital were established on the western site it would be utterly impossible for it to trade with any State other than New South Wales. The cost of land carriage is so great that it would put all trade relations between Lyndhurst and the capital of any other State absolutely out of the question. Every ton of produce which was grown there, and which was not consumed locally, would have to filter through Sydney before it could reach any other State. Sydney is practically its only shipping port. If it be proposed to select the Capital in the interests of only one State, then the best course for the representatives of other States to pursue will be to stand aside and allow the representatives of New South Wales, who are the best judges, to determine where it shall be established. It is not my own view, however, that any one State is entitled to a monopoly. New South Wales drove a very hard bargain, and is doubtless entitled to the "pound of flesh" which she demanded. I should be the last to depart even one iota from the constitutional provision that the Capital shall be established in that State, unless I did so at the request of its representatives; but, subject to that one condition, it is our duty to consider the interests of the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. McDONALD.—Will the honorable member show the Committee in what way some of the other States are going to receive any advantage?

Mr. McLEAN.—I shall endeavour to do so. The Constitution gives the Seat of Government to New South Wales, and we should loyally adhere to the compact. But what is the compact? It has been contended by some honorable members that the correct interpretation of the constitutional provision that the Capital shall not be within 100 miles of Sydney is that it shall be as near to that limit as possible. It appears to me that that is about as absurd a contention as could be urged. The plain English of it is this: "You must not break the law, but you must go as near breaking it as you can." That is not a reasonable construction. The Constitution imposes two limitations; the one is that the Capital shall not be within 100 miles of Sydney, and the other is that it shall be within the borders of New South Wales. It would be just as reasonable to contend that we must establish the Capital as near as possible to some part of the borders of New South Wales as to urge that it must be placed as near the 100-miles limit as possible. The common-sense interpretation of the Constitution is, to my mind, that we are free to select within these two limits the site which is most suitable, central, and accessible to the people of the whole of the States, having due regard to the present and future interests of each State. Taking that view of the position, I have no hesitation in saying that, even if Lyndhurst possessed every other advantage in an eminent degree, the one disadvantage, that it can never trade with any but one State, is fatal, and should cause any reasonable person, who wishes to consider and conserve the interests of the Commonwealth, to regard it as being out of the running. Coming to the second condition, the necessity for an abundant supply of pure, fresh water, how does Lyndhurst compare with other sites? Its most ardent advocates admit that it is inferior in that respect to any of the other sites. But that is not all. If we turn to the report of the experts, what do we find? It is true that we are told that at an enormous expenditure a sufficient supply could be procured, but that supply does not now exist. If we took any given area, and, calculating the rainfall, made provision for impounding all the water that fell upon it, we should no doubt be able to secure a sufficient supply for a considerable population.

Mr. JOHNSON. — Surely the fact that 125,000,000 gallons of water are daily running to waste in Lyndhurst district ought to be a sufficient guarantee of an adequate supply?

Mr. McLEAN. — We know, from the testimony of the Commissioners who were appointed to inspect and report on this question, that the water is not there at present.

Mr. KNOX.—Then there is the report of the right honorable member for Swan.

Mr. McLEAN.—Quite so. The principal source of water supply to which the Commissioners referred was, they said, dry on the occasion of their visit. What sort of a source is that from which to draw supplies for the future Capital?

Mr. JOHNSON.—There is even now provision for a temporary supply.

Mr. McLEAN.—The Commissioners reported that if Lyndhurst were selected, a temporary supply for the workmen engaged in erecting the necessary Federal buildings could be procured by constructing a dam some eight miles distant from the site, and the water would have to be conveyed from that point to the Capital. When we remember that the population of the Federal Capital for a very long time to come is likely to be very limited, we must recognise that it would be undesirable to select a site at which an enormous expenditure would have to be incurred to procure a supply which would be sufficient for requirements, even during the early years of its existence. At any of the other sites we should be able to obtain a sufficient supply for many years to come without incurring any expense. Where streams of pure, fresh water are running through the territories proposed to be selected, it would not be necessary to go to any expense to secure a sufficient supply. In this most essential condition, therefore, Lyndhurst is absolutely wanting; and is a very bad last when compared with the other sites. If we consider the feature of natural beauty and picturesqueness of locality, even its most ardent admirers have admitted that in that respect it is far inferior to any of the other sites. It would be interesting to know what qualifications it does possess, except the one that it will give a monopoly of trade to one city for all time. It possesses none of the essential features required in the site for the Federal Capital.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In the opinion of the honorable member.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am not giving merely my own opinion. I am referring honorable members to the reports submitted for our consideration. Let us take the feature of the possession of good productive land, and how does Lyndhurst compare in that respect with the other sites? The honorable member for Macquarie is, I believe, unconsciously biased, and on that account leans a good deal to one side; although I am perfectly sure that, as one of the strongest advocates of the Lyndhurst site, he is acting quite conscientiously. The honorable member quoted a number of figures to show that a greater area of land has been cultivated in the Lyndhurst district than in the Monaro district, but he did not quote a single figure which was of the slightest value to the Committee in comparing the fertility of the soil in the two localities. No doubt there is a greater area of land being cultivated in the Lyndhurst district, for the simple reason that the settlers in that district have the advantage of direct railway communication with Sydney, whilst the people in the Bombala district have not that advantage, and have no possible means of exporting produce. It would be impossible for the people of the Bombala district to grow profitably any more produce than is required for local consumption; but they have cultivated for local consumption a far greater area of land than is necessary to enable us to prove the quality of the soil as compared with that in the Lyndhurst district. I should not have entered upon the comparison if the honorable member for Macquarie had not compared the areas under cultivation, which, by themselves, are most misleading. If the honorable member had given us the yields per acre in the two districts—the only figures of any value at all in comparing the relative merits of soil and climate for purposes of production—we should have found that the case wore a very different complexion. The Commissioners have submitted to us certain figures which they obtained from the Agricultural Department of New South Wales. They took the average yield of crops over a period of eight years, and I find from their report that in the Lyndhurst district the average yield of wheat over that period was 11 bushels per acre; whilst in the Bombala district it was 12·1 bushels per acre. The yield of maize in the Lyndhurst district was 10·3 bushels per acre, and in the Bombala district 40·3 bushels, nearly 300 per cent. greater.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—A little picked spot.

Mr. McLEAN.—There were 12,513 acres cultivated in the Bombala district, and one-tenth of that area would be ample to test the qualities of the soil.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—How much maize altogether is grown at Bombala?

Mr. McLEAN.—I have given the total area under cultivation. The honorable member is at liberty to look out other statistics for himself.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—In parts of the Eden-Monaro district, as much as £100 an acre has been paid for land on which to cultivate maize.

Mr. McLEAN.—The barley crop in the Lyndhurst district produced 16·7 bushels per acre, and in the Bombala district 25·1 bushels. The Lyndhurst district produced 18·58 bushels of oats per acre, and the Bombala district 20·9 bushels. The average yield per acre of potatoes in the Lyndhurst district for the period mentioned was 1·7 tons, whilst in Bombala the average yield was 2·6 tons, or nearly double the Lyndhurst returns. Honorable members will see that, while in every case the yield from Bombala district is considerably ahead, in the case of potatoes it is nearly double, and in the case of maize it is nearly four times the yield of the Lyndhurst district. Honorable members should remember that these are two crops which require good land, whilst a fair crop of cereals can be grown on very poor land. The crops in respect of which the Lyndhurst district most nearly approaches the yields in the Monaro district are crops requiring the poorest land to produce them; but when we come to compare crops requiring really rich land Lyndhurst is nowhere as compared with Bombala. Taking every qualification that is essential for a judicious selection of a site for the Seat of Government, Lyndhurst is a bad last when compared with the other sites suggested. I have looked at the matter as impartially as I can, and I cannot discover a single qualification in respect of which Lyndhurst approaches anywhere near the Bombala site.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Has the honorable member read the "Case for the West"? Has he looked at the pictures in that pamphlet?

Mr. McLEAN.—I have. There is no doubt that the pictures are very pretty, and the pamphlet reflects great credit on those who have got it up. Their labour and energy in the cause of Lyndhurst have been worthy of a very much better cause, and my only regret is that they have not been expended in a better cause. The next site to which I will refer is that which is called "the southern site." So far as good productive land is concerned, it probably stands highest of all. I am not personally acquainted with the land, but I have carefully watched the stock that has come from that district during the last quarter of a century, and if I see the stock coming from a district, and have some idea of the number of stock run there, I can readily tell the character of the land in the district. There can be no doubt that in the matter of productive land the Upper Murray site probably stands first. In my opinion it complies with all the essential conditions but one, and that is that, like Lyndhurst, it is too far from a shipping port. If there were no available site possessing the necessary qualifications nearer to a shipping port, I should not hesitate to vote for the Upper Murray site. In the circumstances, as we know them, I can only place it second. I admit that it possesses a good climate, soil, and water supply, local features of natural beauty, and all the other essential qualifications. But I think that for a Federal Capital it is rather too far from a shipping port. So far as centrality and accessibility are concerned, the Monaro sites far surpass any of the others. The town of Bombala is exactly midway between Melbourne and Sydney, and is just a little further from Hobart than from Sydney. Bombala is about as central a spot as could be obtained, having in view Melbourne, Sydney, and Hobart; and it is about equi-distant between Brisbane and Adelaide. Therefore, so far as five States are concerned, Bombala is probably the most central by the available routes of commerce—by water communication. Bombala is the only site which would enable the commerce of the Federal territory to be maintained with distant States. The one State which is far removed is, of course, Western Australia. That State will always be heavily handicapped as compared with the other States; but, seeing that the Capital must be in New South Wales, Bombala would afford the nearest available port for Western Australia.

Mr. FOWLER.—We shall travel to the Federal Capital by rail, and not by sea.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member may travel by rail; but he must admit that the commerce of the Federal territory could not be carried on by the same means of communication.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We should also have to reach Lyndhurst by rail.

Mr. McLEAN.—There must be water communication if there is to be commercial intercourse between the Federal Capital and the other States; and that water communication can only be got by one means—the world's great highway. We see that even for distant Western Australia, Twofold Bay is the nearest port that could be selected. If honorable members look at the available routes of traffic they will see that in respect of accessibility the Monaro site is incomparable. That site is not only central and accessible, by means of the port of Twofold Bay, to all the other States of the Commonwealth, but is also accessible to the markets of the outer world, and, having regard to the future, that is a very important consideration. If it is the intention of the Commonwealth to have a large Federal territory, and to develop that territory, it is of the utmost importance that we should be in a position to trade with any part of the world. There is one point with regard to the Lyndhurst site to which I do not think I have referred. That site can be approached only through the territory of one State, and that appears to me to be a fatal defect. We do not know what relations may exist at any future time between the Government of that State and the Government of the Commonwealth. We do not know what conditions might be imposed on traffic by the State Government. If we turn to the Commonwealth Constitution, we find very little consolation. While prohibiting preferential or differential railway rates, the Constitution provides that due regard must be had to the financial conditions of the railways, and also to the development of the territory. Those conditions were inserted in the Constitution by the representatives of New South Wales in order to secure the trade of the Riverina. I have heard that said by the representatives of New South Wales themselves, so that it is no mere assumption on my part; and I give them all credit for the object which they had in view. The Riverina is a part of New South Wales, and it was quite excusable on the part of the representatives of that State in the Convention to do what they could to secure the trade of that district for their own capital. That was the object of placing those conditions in the Constitution; and I venture to say that there is no legal member of this House who could tell us exactly what the meaning of the words of the Constitution is, or what interpretation might be placed on them by the High Court or by an Inter-State Commission. In my opinion, the fact that one of the proposed sites is accessible only through the territory of one State presents a disqualification which should put that site "out of the running." A Federal Capital site should be accessible through more than one State, and the sites in the Monaro districts are the only ones which comply with all conditions as to accessibility. These sites are equally accessible by water from the capitals of all the States, and are also open to communication with the markets of the world. In all other respects, the Monaro sites possess to a very large extent qualifications which I consider essential.

Mr. FOWLER. — Would the honorable member make Twofold Bay Federal territory?

Mr. McLEAN. — I certainly would, even if it were only to the extent of a narrow strip of land. I should like the Federal territory to extend right to the shipping port, so that the Commonwealth need be under no obligation to any State, but should be able to export and import direct.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — Would the honorable member make Twofold Bay a safe harbor?

Mr. McLEAN.—I should do my level best to do so.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That means a gigantic expense.

Mr. McLEAN. — I should carry out those works only as the increase of population warranted. It would not, of course, be necessary to go to great expense in the initial stages; but as population increased we could gradually develop the resources and carry out the necessary works.

Mr. JOHNSON. — Has the honorable member for Gippsland seen the harbor at Twofold Bay?

Mr. McLEAN.—No, I have not. But I have read most carefully the description of that harbor, and have considered the opinions of experts. I do not profess to have any engineering knowledge, or familiarity with navigation, which would enable me, as a layman, to give an opinion of any value; I am guided by the opinions of men who know.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—And the report of those men is that there must be a tremendous expenditure on a break-water.

Mr. McLEAN.—It may ultimately be necessary to incur considerable expense.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—A sum of £150,000 would do all that is necessary.

Mr. McLEAN.—We know that the railway from Sydney already extends into the Monaro territory, and only a slight extension would be necessary to whatever site might be selected on the tableland. Railway communication through New South Wales could be obtained at very moderate expenditure; and there is not the slightest doubt that within a reasonable time there will also be direct railway communication from Victoria. An honorable member interjected the other night that the railway from Victoria would cost more than would the water supply at Lyndhurst. Surely there is a great difference between sinking money in a dead concern, which will give no return, and investing money in a reproductive work?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But there will also be heavy expenditure necessary for a water supply at Bombala.

Mr. McLEAN.—I have already pointed out that for years to come the small population which may be expected need not incur any expenditure on that account, having regard to the running rivers which are there available. Those rivers will give a sufficient water supply for many years to come.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But the rivers are below the level.

Mr. McLEAN.—When the population arrives there, further expenditure on this score may be incurred. It may be contended that the railway from Victoria would not pay for some years to come. So far as traffic is concerned that would probably be true; but honorable members should bear in mind that millions of acres would be opened up by such a line—a considerable area of which is extremely rich land. In fact, I think that in East Gippsland would be found some of the richest land on the Continent of Australia. To give honorable members an idea of the productiveness of the land, I may mention that on the river flats 100 bushels of maize to the acre is quite a common crop. Last year there were numbers of crops that went over 100 bushels to the acre on the Orbost flats. There is a considerable area of extremely rich land in the valleys of the Tambo, Snowy, and Buchan rivers. There are also good jungle lands in the McCulloch ranges. In addition to the land that would be brought into agriculture, there are vast extents of magnificent forest. Splendid timber can be obtained. There is also an enormous quantity of mineral wealth. There are large iron deposits, as well as gold and silver and other minerals. In fact, I might remind honorable members that about three or four years ago a private company, for the sake of the minerals, offered to construct a railway to Mount Deddick, on the Snowy River, at their own expense, on most reasonable terms, as far as I can remember. I think that the bargain fell through only because the company were not willing to agree to the conditions of resumption which the Victorian Government sought to impose. So that honorable members will see that there is not only the traffic to the Federal Capital which could be relied upon to make a railway pay. The loading of the land to a very small extent per acre with the cost of construction would pay a very considerable portion of the cost. In that way the State of Victoria would get back a considerable amount of the outlay, and the investment would be reproductive indirectly, apart from the direct traffic on the line. Looking at the matter all round, I intend to vote for the Monaro site. The Upper Murray site, as I have already stated, possesses, in my opinion, every condition that is essential, with the one exception that it is not by any means as accessible by water as are the Monaro sites; and that is the only means of keeping up commercial relations with the various States. Except for that I should feel disposed to vote for it, because I believe the land of the Upper Murray is better than the land of the Monaro sites; although there is a very large area of very good land at Monaro. My own firm have sold from the vicinity of Bombala some of the best cattle that I had seen in the Melbourne markets since our business was established here. Even after travelling over the mountains down to Bairnsdale, and being trucked from there—and honorable members who have any knowledge of stock must be aware that heavy prime bullocks lose something in condition in travelling over mountainous country—they fetched high prices. I do not like to mention figures from memory, but the price they realized was a record price for many years prior to that date. I think that the price has been surpassed during the years of drought, but only on one or two occasions. That is a sufficient proof of what the Monaro land is capable of producing. The climate of Monaro is probably as healthy as can be found in any part of Australia. It is quite true that it is cold in winter; but the atmosphere is dry, crisp, and healthy. I have heard it referred to by doctors as an ideal site for the establishment of a sanatorium; and any place that would be selected for that purpose by skilled medical men cannot be objected to on the score of climate. As to natural beauty, I think that every honorable member admits that either of the Monaro sites possesses that qualification to a very large extent. There can be no question that there is an abundant water supply, not only for stock and domestic purposes, but also for irrigation, for making artificial lakes, for motive power, for generating electricity, or for any other purpose to which water power can be successfully applied. I believe that the Upper Murray site also possesses those advantages to a very large extent. But, looking at the matter all round, the Monaro site, so far as I can judge, possesses all the qualifications for a Capital city, and it is far in advance of other places in regard to accessibility and centrality of position—that is, of course, by means of water communication, which I contend is the only means by which commercial relations can be established or maintained with the other States. If we were to show the map of Australia to intelligent foreigners, and ask them to look at the different sites and say from the stand-point of outsiders which was preferable, I am perfectly sure that nine out of ten would point to the site that is near the port of Twofold Bay. A very good instance of the view that is likely to be taken by an unbiased observer is afforded in the case of our own Senate. The Senate is composed of an equal number of members from each State. From the stand-point of the different States the members are much better qualified to give a disinterested opinion than we are, because our House represents population, and population may shift. In two successive Parliaments, the representatives of all the States in the Senate, bringing their collective wisdom to bear on the question, have selected a Monaro site by large majorities. That, I think, should have an influence with impartial minds. I sincerely hope that we shall follow in the footsteps of the Senate. If we make a wise selection we shall deserve the gratitude of future generations, but if we commit a serious error of judgment, such as I think we should if we selected that inland site, I fear that posterity would have very little reason to feel grateful for the manner in which we discharged our trust when their destiny was in our hands.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I listened to the honorable member for Gippsland to see if I could, by any possibility, agree with him on some point, and I confess that I cannot find a single point of agreement with him. He has told us once again how necessary it is that we must be fair and impartial in our treatment of this matter; how much, for instance, we must keep in mind Australia, and not the interests of a State. He has told us, for the twentieth time during this debate, that we must take our minds off any particular State, and keep them concentrated on Australia, and he has asked the question,—“What would a foreigner say if he were handed a map of Australia and shown the sites that were located thereon?” I ask, in all seriousness, would it be a fair thing to show a foreigner a map only? Would not the fair thing be to show him a map and the Constitution? Would not the fair thing be, before inviting him to decide, to ask him to study the arrangement which was deliberately made by the States relative to the question of a site? That would be the first thing, I should think, which any fair-minded man would do with a stranger whom he wished to arbitrate on this most important matter. The honorable member for Gippsland does not put the case fairly when he makes this suggestion without reference to any bargain or arrangement—which, by the way, he has already described as the arrangement of a Shylock. That arrangement, whatever it is, ought to be honoured by the people of Australia, not in its technique, or letter, but in its substance and spirit. That is the point we are making in setting out to argue this question. The test of loyalty and patriotism, about which we have heard so much, is in the Constitution, and I ask honorable members to keep that in mind when we consider the question of locating the site. Almost every honorable member who has taken part in this debate has rated some other honorable member, who happened to differ from him, because of his provincialism. It is just as well that we should clear our minds from any such cant as this, because the test of what is provincial or patriotic or Federal must always be sought in the Constitution. It is Federal to keep that bond, and to keep it above any other consideration. I urge that point as a preliminary to all other considerations. We are not free to put the Capital Site where we think it ought to be if that place be outside New South Wales. And I submit that we are not free, if we intend to honour the spirit of the Constitution, to put it at the furthest possible limit of New South Wales, and so make the Federal State, when constituted, of less use and service to New South Wales than to any other State.

Mr. SKENE.—What does the honorable member mean by "less use and service?"

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hope to tell the honorable member before I finish my speech, if he will wait a little. If honorable members put this site on the Upper Murray, it will be of no use to New South Wales. And, to tell me that New South Wales understood, when she was agreeing to this arrangement, and making it the basis of her acceptance of the Constitution, that the Federal Capital was to be located on the most out-of-the-way site that could be selected in that country, is to mis-state the position. The Constitution would not have been the law of the land to-day if the New South Wales people had understood anything of the kind.

Mr. POYNTON.—New South Wales voted for the Constitution without this condition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member has said that a dozen times, but there is no point in it.

Mr. POYNTON.—It is the truth nevertheless.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is an easy answer to it.

Mr. POYNTON.—What is the answer?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It was the provision for an affirmative majority of 80,000 which led to such a small vote being cast at the first referendum, and if the honorable member will analyze the vote at the second referendum, he will see how immensely stronger it was on the second occasion than on the first. I hope that he will consider that fact.

Mr. POYNTON.—The majority voted for the acceptance of the Constitution without any conditions.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The electors of New South Wales felt perfectly certain at that time that an affirmative vote of 80,000 would not be reached, and that led to a great deal of apathy, which, however, was swept away when the further arrangement was made, and the Constitution was finally submitted to the vote of the electors.

Mr. POYNTON.—By the politicians of New South Wales, but not the people.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am very glad that my honorable friend sometimes makes a distinction between politicians and people. I am trying to say what I think is the arrangement which we ought to hold sacred. It is an outrage on that agreement to suggest any site which would make it immensely more difficult to get from Sydney than from almost any other State in the group. Take the Upper Murray site. We who represent New South Wales would have to go by rail to Culcairn, and thence to Germanton, from which point a railway would have to be made for a distance of thirty or forty miles to the site on the border of Victoria. Is there any substantial concession to New South Wales in locating the Federal Capital there?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—What concession is she entitled to?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The concession that is spoken of in this bond—that the Capital shall be in New South Wales. When New South Wales has surrendered this land it will become Federal territory.

Mr. SKENE.—Only the Crown land would have to be surrendered.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Private land will have to be purchased; but the bulk of the land belongs to the Crown, and, therefore, will not require to be purchased. After the land has been made over to the Commonwealth, it will no longer be part of New South Wales; therefore the Capital Site will be just as much outside New South Wales as outside any other State. I wish to know where the compensation to New South Wales comes in, for the sacrifice which she will have to make in the granting of this land, and probably—for this is in the minds of honorable members—the making of a railway to connect the Capital with the nearest railway point. Is there any motive for New South Wales to spend half-a-million for a railway, and give away all this Crown land for the purpose of fixing a Capital Site which will not be of the slightest possible advantage to her? That was not the meaning of the Constitution. Therefore, I contend, we have a right to keep the Constitution in mind before we set out to find the Capital Site, and the selection of a site must always be subject to the arrangement made in the Constitution. It is not a fair way of putting the matter when the honorable member for Gippsland suggests that we should give a map to a foreigner and ask him to say where the Capital Site ought to be located. Another speaker suggested on Friday that we should import an American to fix the site for us. We need no American or other foreigner to fix the site. But if honorable members should so far forget themselves as to call in a foreigner, do not give him a map only, because that would be misleading, but give him a map and call his attention very specifically to the bargain which is in the Constitution.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member would not give any of the other States a say in the settlement of this question, if he had his way.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is just as silly, easy, and cheap a thing to say as many others which the honorable member has said. It is a libel upon myself. If the honorable member keeps repeating these statements, he may in time come to believe them. I am prepared to deal as liberally as possible with the other States, and to consent to the site being fixed where it will be convenient for their populations.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member will not allow any one else to form an opinion on the subject. We have heard of nothing but New South Wales during this debate, and I am full of it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is at liberty to express his opinion. I am now stating mine only. I do not wish him to listen to my remarks, unless he chooses to do so, but it is necessary for me to put the case from my stand-point. The matter is of concern to New South Wales, in a sense in which it is not of concern to the other States.

Mr. POYNTON.—It is an Australian matter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Constitution provides that the Seat of Government shall be within New South Wales, but some honorable members seem determined to honour the compact between that State and the Commonwealth only in the letter. They virtually break it in the spirit, by saying that the site of the Seat of Government shall be no further within the boundaries of New South Wales than is necessary to fulfil the literal terms of the Constitution. The honorable member for Gippsland could not find a single good point in connexion with the Lyndhurst site. Fair-minded and impartial man that he is, he omitted to state anything that could be said in favour of the Lyndhurst site. Honorable members who berate the representatives of New South Wales for their provincialism are constantly taking that view of the matter. The honorable member for Grey when he speaks will, no doubt, tell us that the site which possesses all the virtues is that which is nearest to the Victorian border, and will have nothing good to say for any site which is substantially within New South Wales, although that is the arrangement contemplated by the Constitution.

Mr. POYNTON.—I have visited the various sites, but the honorable member has not.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not think it necessary to visit some of them. I have not troubled to visit the Upper Murray site, for instance, because I think that sites which are only on the fringe of New South Wales ought not to be taken into consideration.

Mr. POYNTON.—Then the honorable member virtually contends that the other States have no "say" in the matter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not at all; but I ask them to honour the constitutional bond in its spirit.

Mr. POYNTON.—All that the Constitution says is that the site of the Seat of Government shall be within New South Wales. I am here to represent, not the interests of any one State, but the interests of Australia.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—So are we all. But this is a bargain between New South Wales and the rest of the Commonwealth, which it is for the honour of Australia to keep. I do not quarrel with the basis of selection suggested by the honorable member for Gippsland. He thinks that centrality and accessibility should be placed first, and that climate should be the next consideration. To my mind, centrality, accessibility, and climate should be the main factors in the determination of the question. I do not, however, agree with the right honorable member for Swan that the Seat of Government should be placed midway between Sydney and Melbourne. I think that it should be located where it will be as convenient as possible to future generations, having regard to the probable trend and development of population.

Mr. GROOM.—This is the first time that the rights of Queensland have been even hinted at.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What are those rights?

Mr. GROOM.—To be treated in the same way as other States are treated.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Gippsland may despise the opinion of experts; but I think that those who have made it their business to study the movements and growth of population are more likely to be right in what they say on this question than are we who have made no such study. Now, Mr. Coghlan and other experts say that the trend of population is unmistakably to the north. It has been shown over and over again that Lyndhurst is more central and more accessible than any of the other proposed sites. That has been proved time and again, and notably by the honorable and learned member for Wannon. He showed that for the next twenty, and even fifty, years to come it will be easier for the people of the other States to travel to and from Lyndhurst than to travel to and from any of the other proposed sites. The honorable member for Gippsland referred to the attitude of New South Wales in this matter as analogous to that of Shylock requiring his pound of flesh; but it seems to me that, if the honorable member gives Shylock what he wants, he will see that he gets it all back again. It is news to me to learn that the spirit of the arrangement in the Constitution should be departed from because compliance with it may incidentally benefit one State more than the rest. The honorable member urged as one of his strongest reasons against the selection of the Lyndhurst site the fact that the trade from the Federal territory, if situated at Lyndhurst, might be of advantage to New South Wales.

Mr. McLEAN.—I said that Sydney would have a monopoly of that trade. It could not go to the other States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is certainly a disadvantage to the other States, but it cannot be helped. It flows from the bargain originally made.

Mr. SKENE.—Certainly not. It is no part of the bargain that New South Wales shall secure the whole of the trade of the Federal territory.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Surely the honorable member does not imagine that the trade of the Federal territory will be confined to New South Wales? Whatever is produced there for export will find its natural market, just as the produce from other parts of the Continent does now. It is absurd to say that New South Wales will monopolize it. The honorable member for Gippsland pointed out that it would cost a great deal to give Lyndhurst a water supply; but he did not tell us what the pumping scheme at Monaro would cost when in full working order.

Mr. POYNTON.—At Monaro a supply can be obtained by gravitation.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes. An ample supply of water, for all present purposes, can also be obtained at Lyndhurst by means of gravitation. The scheme to which the honorable member for Gippsland referred contemplates only the future. The honorable member, however, with his usual fairness—and I should not put the matter in this way if he had not boasted of his fairness—told us in one breath what the ultimate scheme at Lyndhurst would cost, and in the next informed us that at Monaro there was plenty of water available for immediate purposes. The fact is, that just as there is plenty of water for immediate purposes at Monaro, so there is plenty of water for immediate purposes at Lyndhurst. But the scheme which has been outlined contemplates making provision for the far distant future, when the Federal Capital will contain 100,000 inhabitants. I say that, given equal populations, a water supply at Monaro would cost practically as much as would a supply at Lyndhurst. That is the point which I desire to make, and I complain of the unfair way adopted by some honorable members in putting these facts. These honorable members have accused the advocates of Lyndhurst of being provincialists, who wish to secure an unfair advantage over the other States. Consequently it is necessary for somebody to put the facts in their proper light. I put them forward to show how unfair was the honorable member for Gippsland in dealing with this question of water supply alone. In this connexion he quoted Mr. Wade's figures, but he did not tell the Committee that that officer's estimates were based upon a scheme for supplying a population of 100,000. When questioned in regard to the water supply at Monaro, the honorable member replied "Monaro has plenty of water for immediate purposes." I say that Lyndhurst also has an ample supply of water for immediate purposes, and that the two places are equal in that respect. Another point made by the honorable member was that if Lyndhurst were chosen it would be necessary to bring the water a distance of eight miles. Surely a distance of eight miles is not a very serious consideration in connexion with a scheme for supplying a great city with water? In New South Wales, the water supply for Sydney comes from a source fifty miles distant.

Mr. SKENE.—In Western Australia water is conveyed 300 miles.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is so, but I am speaking of Sydney, which possesses a population of 500,000. No difficulty is experienced in supplying that population with an abundance of pure, fresh water. Consequently, if we can show that a supply of water can be obtained at Lyndhurst, very much nearer than it can be obtained at Sydney, we need not trouble ourselves very much further in regard to that branch of the question. To compare the various sites, from the stand-point of the water supply obtainable—as has been done during the present debate—is pure idealism. To say that there is more water at Bombala than there is at Lyndhurst does not argue anything. Nobody questions that statement. The point which we have to consider is, "Will the Federal Capital be adequately supplied with water at Lyndhurst?" If that question be answered in the affirmative we need not trouble ourselves as to whether there is not more water at Bombala than there is anywhere else. All we have to do is to see that the Federal Capital city is supplied with as much water as it will ever require to use.

Mr. POYNTON.—I suppose the cost of providing an adequate supply does not matter?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have already spoken of the cost. If the honorable member will look at the official reports he will find that the cost of the Bombala pumping scheme has been carefully kept out of sight during this debate.

Mr. POYNTON.—The Dalgety scheme is not a pumping scheme.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—During this discussion, all the difficulties in connexion with the Monaro sites have been carefully concealed, and when any honorable member has dared to bring them forward, the cry has been instantly raised that he is a provincialist. Take the case of Dalgety. There, it is proposed to obtain a primary supply for a population of 50,000 from the Moamba River, which is the nearest gravitation source to the city site, conveying the water a distance of about thirteen and a half miles. The honorable member for Gippsland did not tell us anything about this matter in his speech. He assured us that there was an abundant supply of water in the Bombala district, but he did not inform us that in the case of Dalgety it had to be conveyed thirteen and a half miles.

Mr. McLEAN.—But Bombala has a river which for many years would provide the city with a sufficient supply of water.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am speaking of the primary supply, and not of the supply in the distant future. The primary supply for Dalgety would serve only a population of 50,000. But even that supply would require to be conveyed a distance of thirteen and a half miles. I submit that if the honorable member had desired to be fair he would have placed these figures before the Committee.

Mr. McLEAN.—That eight miles in the case of Lyndhurst refers only to a temporary supply for the workmen.

Mr. POYNTON.—The Dalgety scheme is a gravitation scheme. The honorable member said that it was a pumping scheme.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — A pumping scheme there would probably cost as much as would the Lyndhurst scheme. I submit that a fact which can be tested only in 200 or 300 years' time is not very important in the determination of this question. I would further point out that the devotees of other sites, whilst emphasizing every possible drawback in connexion with the Lyndhurst site, have quietly kept in the background all these disadvantages attaching to other sites. The honorable member for Gippsland spoke of the presence of minerals on the line of railway leading towards Bombala from the Victorian side. Is he aware that there is a mineral belt surrounding the Lyndhurst site?

Mr. McLEAN.—But Lyndhurst is connected with a line of railway. I spoke of minerals in connexion with the construction of a railway.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is the honorable member aware that one of the richest mineral belts in Australia—possibly in the whole world—surrounds the Lyndhurst site?

Mr. McLEAN.—I hope that it is more real than is its water supply.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Does the honorable member know that there is an abundance of gold all through that district? Is he aware that the cross country between Blayney and Harden is supposed to be full of rich copper ore, and that close to the Lyndhurst site—certainly within twenty miles of it—are to be found the iron deposits of Cadia, which are alleged to be the best in Australia?

Mr. McLEAN.—I did not speak of mineral deposits as an attraction in connexion with the Seat of Government, but as an incentive to the construction of a railway.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—These minerals, not being far removed from the Lyndhurst site, would constitute a splendid backing for a big city.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Why is Lyndhurst not a big city now instead of being a one-horse town?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member knows the reason as well as I do. He is aware that no iron is being produced in Australia, although the deposits exist there. He also knows that the reason the copper deposits are not being exploited is because of the very defective Mining on Private Lands Act in New South Wales. Nevertheless, these rich deposits are to be found in the western district, and unmistakably they would form a big backing for Lyndhurst—if that place be selected—and one which must make it the most valuable site of all. The honorable member spoke of another possibility, and held it up as a menace to the Committee. He conceived a time—far distant, I hope—when New South Wales might come into conflict with the Federal authority, and when it naturally would be terrible if we could not reach the Federal Capital without going through her territory. That is a harmonious and Federal argument to advance. What a fine Federal spirit is shown in the suggestion that we should contemplate a time—and prepare for it by taking steps to avoid any difficulty—when there shall be such bitter and dire enmity between one State and all the others as to preclude even the possibility of our travelling over the railways of that one State! I should be ashamed to seriously advance such an argument.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member might some day be Premier of New South Wales, and we know his provincialism.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—My provincialism is a little less than that of the honorable member, but I do not persist as he does in mouthing my patriotism. I am not continually denouncing every other honorable member as a provincialist. The honorable member has succeeded in making the champion provincial speech of the debate.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member's index finger looks rather threatening when he shakes it at one.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not wish to threaten the honorable member; it would be useless to do so. The honorable member may talk about provincialism as much as he pleases, but I have yet to learn that patriotism is a quality that one must constantly asseverate. In connexion with this matter, actions speak louder than words, and the attitude taken up by the honorable member during this debate has shown that he is a provincialist.

Mr. McLEAN.—Is one guilty of provincialism in advocating the rights of all the States?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No.

Mr. McLEAN.—That is all that I have done.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is only fair to advocate the rights of all the States as long as the compact made in the Constitution is substantially honoured.

Mr. McLEAN.—I hold that we must keep to that compact.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am prepared to consider, so far as I am able, every State in the Union, as long as the arrangement in the bond is honoured. I do not think that the honorable member is prepared to honour it.

Mr. McLEAN.—I wish to see the most central site selected.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am inclined to think that the honorable member in some of his proposals is outraging that arrangement. Let me refer for a moment to the Upper Murray site. It is nearer to almost any other State than it is to Sydney, and I have yet to learn that the compact arrived at was not a substantial concession to New South Wales.

Mr. SKENE.—Not to Sydney.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It was, in effect, a substantial concession to Sydney, because the agitation centred in that city.

Mr. KELLY.—Is not Sydney the centre of the coast line, and therefore the centre of the most populated portion of New South Wales?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I submit that Lyndhurst is the most central site suggested. If we turn from the present to the future we must recognise that it will be the most accessible site.

Mr. McLEAN.—By means of a camel service?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hope that, so far as this matter is concerned, we have left the days of camel services behind. If Lyndhurst were selected, the Capital would be within 600 or 700 miles of Brisbane, whereas if the site favoured by the honorable member for Gippsland were chosen the Capital would be 1,000 miles from that city.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—That would be too bad.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then, again, Lyndhurst is more accessible from Melbourne than any of the sites mentioned by the honorable member.

Mr. McLEAN.—The site which I specially mentioned is about midway between Brisbane and Adelaide. Then there is Perth, beyond Adelaide again, to consider.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am now speaking of means of communication. The honorable member has probably in mind, not a camel route, but one which would have to be traversed by means of a balloon.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am speaking of a water service.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have in mind, not a camel route, but a railway service. I am afraid the honorable member for Gippsland is taking the radial distances which would have to be negotiated by ships or balloons, or some such means of locomotion. I am speaking of available means of communication, and I repeat that Lyndhurst is nearer Victoria and Queensland than is any of the other sites which have yet been mentioned. Now, what is the position of Western Australia? If the transcontinental railway be constructed, as perhaps it will be, in the future, Lyndhurst will be nearer Western Australia than is any of the other sites suggested during this debate. My main point is, therefore, that Lyndhurst is the one central site proposed, because it affords the maximum means of convenience and accessibility to almost every State in the group, excepting, perhaps, Tasmania and South Australia. The last-named State, of course, cannot hope to secure the degree of convenience that would accrue to others from the selection of Lyndhurst; but having regard to the great bulk of the population, and considering the drift of population, Lyndhurst is the point which gives most accessibility and centrality. What of its climate? I have not heard any one impugn it. No one has disputed that its climate is excellent, and I would also point out that it has an adequate water supply. I say no more than that. I am not going to urge that the water supply of Lyndhurst is as good as that of Bombala, or that there are millions of tons of water daily running to waste in the district. I simply assert that there is an adequate supply at Lyndhurst for all the future requirements of the Capital. There is as much water there as we shall ever require, and we should, therefore, experience no difficulty in that respect in selecting it. The fact that it has an abundance of water, and an excellent climate, and boasts of centrality and accessibility, such as no other site furnishes, seems to me to point unmistakably to Lyndhurst as the proper site for the location of the Federal Capital. I have no desire to say anything about the Upper Murray site; except that we heard the other day a great deal about its beauties and its climate. I have yet to learn, however, that we should select a site merely because of its picturesque-ness. No one has pointed out more clearly that has the right honorable member for East Sydney, that persons will not go to the Federal Capital merely to enjoy its scenery; they will go there, for the main part, to do business, and if we provide them with business conveniences the rest may very well be left to take care of itself. The honorable member for Southern Melbourne gave his whole case away on Friday last, when he told us that, although Edinburgh was the prettiest city in the world, the galaxy of witty men and pretty women of which it boasted left it for the fogs of London, because the capital was the social centre. I therefore say that we ought not to give undue importance to the consideration of beautiful surroundings. If we can secure them in addition to the factors I have named, well and good, but they are embellishments pure and simple, and not the essentials of a good Capital Site. The honorable member for Hume told us that there was an abundance of fish available in the Upper Murray, and that if one cared he might make a catch every morning. As a commentary on this statement, I might mention that I read in the report of the Water Commission which met a little while ago, that there are no fish in the river—that the stream is so muddy that the fish have been absolutely destroyed.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Where was this?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In the Upper Murray—in these parts.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Why not talk a little sense?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Because the honorable member has a monopoly of it. He never opens his mouth but he puts his foot in it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And the honorable member never opens his mouth without making an ass of himself.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I must ask that that scandalous remark shall be withdrawn.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I withdraw it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member will find evidence in support of all that I have said in regard to the destruction of fish in the report of the Commission, provided that he has the intelligence to understand it.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The fish have been destroyed at a point considerably below the site proposed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have no desire to refer to any other statement made by the honorable member who preceded me, except to say that I think his speech showed that he had already made up his mind as to the desirableness of a particular site, and that all his arguments were built up to support that predilection.

Mr. McLEAN.—I shall vote for the district which I supported before.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member simply left out of sight every qualification that would commend any other site, and at the same time took care to emphasize every good point associated with the site which he favours. On the other hand, looking at the question as impartially as I am able to do—and I hope that I regard the matter as one who has just as little to gain from it as has any other honorable member—I hold that Lyndhurst is the most desirable site. It is immaterial to me where the Capital is established; but looking to the future of Australia, and to the convenience of the people principally interested in the Federal site, I think that Lyndhurst more than any other site offers the advantages of accessibility and centrality. Its climate is unquestioned; its scenery is good; its water supply is adequate, and it possesses, therefore, all the materials essential to the building up of a large, prosperous, and up-to-date city.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—I shall labour under a disadvantage in dealing with this question, because the site which I favour has not been done justice in the matter of inspection. I am sure that had it been inspected as closely as have the other sites it would have stood very much higher in the estimation of a good many honorable members. Some honorable members, notably, the right honorable member for East Sydney, the right honorable member for Swan, and the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, have expressed their surprise that the Upper Murray site should have been at the last moment dragged in for our consideration; they do not appear to have heard before of the Upper Murray as a suggested site.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—We expressed, not surprise, but astonishment.

Mr. SKENE.—I should like to know where these honorable members were on the 25th September, 1902, when the honorable member for Hume, who was then Minister of Home Affairs, moved that a Committee of experts be appointed to examine and report upon sites in the localities of Albury, Bombala, Lake George, Orange, and Tumut. On that occasion—at the very initiation of the proposal to inspect the various sites—the honorable member, having referred to Tumut, proceeded to discuss the Upper Murray site. He said—

Tumut is one of the prettiest and most fertile valleys in New South Wales. It will be noticed that there is no proposal in regard to the Upper Murray, though, in my opinion, the finest and most beautiful valley in Australia is to be there found—it is Tumut on a triple scale—and I hope that later on honorable members will take the opportunity of visiting the district.

At a later stage, he said—

I now come to the Bombala site, and have to say that Dalgety is not amongst the places which it is proposed to refer to experts.

I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that in the first place the Minister did not propose that Dalgety should be inspected, but contemplated taking honorable members on a visit of inspection to the Upper Murray.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Why was not the Upper Murray site subjected to the same scrutiny as was Dalgety?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Because the honorable member was so persistent.

Mr. SKENE.—I also should like to have some information on that point. On the same day, whilst the then Minister of Home Affairs was speaking, I interjected—and the report will be found in Hansard, Vol. XII., page 16135—

Will the inspection of the Albury site include an inspection of the Upper Murray site?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No; there is no need for that, because the water supply of Albury is an assured one.

Then the report proceeds—

Mr. SKENE.—The honorable gentleman spoke very favorably of the Upper Murray site as being a very picturesque place.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The matter is a very delicate one for me to refer to, inasmuch as there are two sites in my electorate which have already been put forward as suitable for the Federal Capital.

Mr. SKENE.—Might not the Commissioners be allowed to report upon the whole locality within a certain distance of any proposed site?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I hope that I shall not be called upon to give an opinion upon the Upper Murray site, but I intend to ask a few members of the House to visit it during the summer months, and I shall be guided by what they think of it, and of the probability of any site so far south being selected.

Mr. SKENE.—But the Albury site is equally far south.

I then urged upon the Minister that those sites should be inspected together, Dalgety with Bombala, and the Upper Murray with Albury. Coming to the next session of Parliament, an inspection was made of these different sites, with the exception of the Upper Murray site, an inspection of which had been promised. I then tried to find out the reason why Dalgety had been inspected, when there was no promise that it would be inspected, and why the Upper Murray had not been inspected, although a promise had been made that it would be. I do not know where honorable members were on that occasion. That was a year afterwards, in September, 1903.

Mr. CROUCH.—Was it not an attempt to get the honorable member's vote for Tumut by a subterfuge?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is an unworthy suggestion of any member of the Committee. The honorable and learned member ought to be ashamed of himself.

Mr. SKENE.—I mention these matters, because it has been suggested that the Upper Murray site is a new site. I desire to show that from the very beginning I have persistently urged that this site should be inspected, because I heard it so well spoken of. On the 7th October, 1903, I moved—

That after the word "Tumut" the words "including the Upper Murray" be inserted.

I said then—

I am led to move this amendment by the fact that when the proposal to refer the various sites to a Commission of experts was under discussion the present Minister for Trade and Customs referred to the Upper Murray site, and made a promise from which he can hardly escape.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have not endeavoured to escape from any promise.

Mr. SKENE.—Quite so.

I do not know why I said "quite so" then. Because afterwards it was not quite so, and the site was not inspected. I was ruled out of order on that particular amendment, and I afterwards proposed—

That the schedule be amended by the insertion of the words "Upper Murray."

After debate that amendment was negatived, but what I have quoted shows clearly that, so far from this being a new matter, the selection of the Upper Murray site has been considered from the very beginning. If such sites as Lyndhurst and Dalgety, which were absolutely rejected by this House on the last occasion when this matter was before it, are to be brought in, surely the Upper Murray site may well be brought in along with them. We are not selecting a Capital Site for to-day or to-morrow, but for all time, and I certainly think that it would be well even now, if there is a site which honorable members may consider better than those which have been so thoroughly surveyed, that we should have a thorough survey of that site. There is no disguising the fact that political considerations will weigh a great deal in this matter. It is a great pity that it should be so, but it is nevertheless the fact. The right honorable member for East Sydney the other night accused the supporters of the Upper Murray site of being desirous of getting as far away from Sydney as possible. I have possibly been the most persistent in endeavouring to secure the selection of this site, but I deny altogether that I have ever had any idea of doing an injustice to Sydney or to any other part of the Commonwealth. "Let the gall'd jade wince." I am the keeper of my own conscience, and I intend to vote upon this matter upon what I conscientiously believe to be broad national grounds.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member voted in favour of Sydney itself last session.

Mr. SKENE.—I remember that I tried to introduce an amendment of the kind.

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member knew that that was impossible.

Mr. SKENE.—One thing I should like to know is what Sydney has specially to do with this matter. Our compact is with New South Wales, and not with Sydney. To my mind there are only two conceivable ways of looking at the compact. From the very beginning of the agitation for Federation I have taken a very considerable interest in the matter of the probable Capital Site. I know that in 1891 or 1892 I read an article in the Nineteenth Century, written by the right honorable member for East Sydney, in which the right honorable gentleman gave several reasons why New South Wales was not likely to come into the Federation. With one exception all the reasons stated at the time seemed to be arguable, and that one was the uncertainty as to the site of the Federal Capital. The right honorable gentleman was afterwards successful in getting a clause put into the Constitution, providing that the Capital should be in New South Wales. I say, there are only two conceivable ideas which can occur to one with regard to that. New South Wales is the oldest and most populous of the States, and returns the greatest number of representatives to this House. I have it on the authority of the President of the Senate, Sir Richard Baker, that the proposal was made in the first Convention, that Ballarat should be the Capital. I do not know whether it was actually proposed that Ballarat should be the Capital, but, at any rate, it was suggested.

Mr. CONROY.—I can assure the honorable member that Sir Edmund Barton put it that there would be substantial agreement, and that the spirit of the Constitution would be carried out.

Mr. SKENE.—I propose to give honorable members my view of the matter, and, if I understand it at all, it is my desire to carry out the spirit of the Constitution as generously as possible. In my view there are only two ways of looking at the question. Ballarat having been suggested in the Convention as the possible Capital, naturally the representatives of New South Wales saw that there would be a chance of their having to travel a long distance out of their own State to reach the Seat of Government. The Premier of that State at the time, the right honorable member for East Sydney—very properly, I think—made a proposal that the Capital should be in New South Wales, simply in order to prevent New South Wales representatives having to travel a great distance out of their own State to reach the Capital.

Mr. CONROY.—No, no.

Mr. SKENE.—Will the honorable member allow me for a moment. I ask what is the alternative. Is it not what the honorable member for Parramatta has just repudiated—that preference should be given to the city of Sydney, that the protection of distance should be considered in the interests of the trade and commerce of Sydney? That would be an outrage upon all the principles professed by the Leader of the Opposition, the right honorable member for East Sydney, and the honorable member for Parramatta.

Mr. CONROY.—It was really thought that the Capital should be Sydney, as being the oldest city in Australia.

Mr. SKENE.—That was suggested originally; but we have now to deal with the restriction of distance from Sydney. There are but the two ways of looking at the matter—that the representatives of New South Wales, being the largest body of representatives returned to this Parliament, should not have to travel to a distance out of their own State, or that there should be protection afforded to the trade and commerce of New South Wales, a suggestion which the honorable member for Parramatta has repudiated, and, I think, rightly repudiated.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I repudiate it only to this extent: I am prepared to say now that New South Wales thought she was going to get some slight trading advantage from the arrangement.

Mr. SKENE.—Then I must say that I do not think the honorable member can produce a single scrap of documentary evidence in support of his contention. I have sought for it, and I have listened to the right honorable member for East Sydney without discovering anything of the kind. I asked the right honorable member for Balaclava his reason for agreeing to the 100-miles limit from Sydney, and he told me that it was simply because he did not believe in having the Federal Capital in a big city.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—According to the report of an interview with him, which appeared in the press a little time ago, the right honorable member said that his reason was to exclude the district of Mossvale.

Mr. SKENE.—The honorable gentleman has told me that his objection was to the Federal Capital being fixed in a big city. According to my reading of the compact, it is perfectly in accordance with national instinct that the Capital should be in New South Wales. The representatives of New South Wales being in a majority in this Parliament, should not be dragged out of their own State to attend the Federal Parliament, as they would have to be if Ballarat were chosen as the site for the Federal city. But to say that the object in selecting the site is to give a preference in trade or commerce to New South Wales is almost an outrage upon decency.

Mr. CONROY.—But, apart from that, has not New South Wales to give up certain territory to secure any advantage there may be from the selection of a site in that State?

Mr. SKENE.—New South Wales may or may not give up territory. She has only to give up territory which happens to be Crown lands. The New South Wales Government is not supposed to purchase land for us if we require a Capital Site in that State. If New South Wales is not prepared to carry out the compact I say let her not do it, and we can purchase land on which to establish the Capital. In suggesting the site on the Upper Murray, it never entered into my mind, and I had no intention at all of suggesting a site which would remove the Capital to a distance from Sydney. In making the suggestion, I thought I was doing what was best in the interests of the people of Australia.

Mr. CONROY.—I do not think the honorable member could find anybody in New South Wales who does not think the proposal a departure from the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. SKENE.—I cannot help what the people of New South Wales may think in that way. I have not the remotest idea as to how the matter was put before them, but I may say that, in travelling by the train in New South Wales, I met one very intelligent man, a railway conductor, who told me that, as he understood it, the intention was that the Government of New South Wales should select the Capital. He assured me that that was the way the matter had been put before him.

Mr. CONROY.—I accept that interpretation. Does the honorable member think that the State Government of New South Wales would select the Upper Murray site?

Mr. SKENE.—The honorable and learned member spoke of the way in which the matter had been put before the people of New South Wales, and I have mentioned that one man stated the way in which it was put before him.

Mr. CONROY.—What is the difference in climate between Albury and Welaregang?

Mr. SKENE.—I shall deal with that directly. The two things which I considered particularly were accessibility, not for to-day, but under reasonable conditions for a reasonable time, and a gravitation water supply.

Mr. WILKS.—On the ground of accessibility we should take Lyndhurst as being most nearly the centre of population.

Mr. SKENE.—It may be in the future.

Mr. WILKS.—It is, on the figures for to-day.

Mr. SKENE.—I do not know that, but I believe that Sir George Clarke was right when he said that probably the bulk of the population of Australia would be confined to the fringe of coast lands.

Mr. CONROY.—I rather agree with that.

Mr. SKENE.—If we take the country from Brisbane right round to Adelaide, we shall find that that is the case, and in that view Lyndhurst is further north than the centre of population will eventually be.

Mr. CONROY.—I do not know that. If we consider the Northern Coast district of New South Wales, and the Southern Coast district of Queensland, including the Darling Downs, I think we shall find that the centre of population will be north of Sydney.

Mr. SKENE.—I have no desire, in arguing this matter, to depreciate any State, but I may say that Queensland has not been regarded favorably, from a financial point of view, by Victorian people, for many years past. Possibly I am doing Queensland an injustice.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—We must not say a word against Queensland.

Mr. SKENE.—All I know is that there has been a tremendous lot of Victorian money lost in Queensland. If the Victorian people had the money they have lost in Queensland and in western New South Wales they could pay the whole of the Victorian debt.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—We must not forget the money which Victorian people have made in those States.

Mr. SKENE.—When I was first called upon to consider the question, I regarded it from the point of view of accessibility, and the prospects of a gravitation water supply. Proceeding, as it were, from the Sydney end, the first place I came upon that in any way "filled the bill" was Tumut. That site was first reported on favorably by Mr. Oliver, who gave it second place, and, I believe, it was given first place by the Royal Commission. I should be very glad if a site, with all the advantages which I have described, could be found nearer Sydney; but I think I shall be able to show that the Upper Murray site is not so unfair to the interests of that city as some honorable members seem to suppose. Some honorable members have made wild statements about the cost of a railway line from Tumut to the suggested site of the Capital.

Mr. CONROY.—Would the honorable member suggest a site at Tooma itself?

Mr. SKENE.—I do not say that the site should be at Tooma; there are other places in that district. What I am contending now is that the district which I favour has not been sufficiently inspected; and I know that my friend, the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, in discussing this matter, pointed out that, so far as railways are concerned, the difficulties are not so great if one runs with the stream than they are if one has to go across country. I am told that in the direction of Germanton to Tumberumba there is an easy horse road for a team with a considerable load.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—There are no engineering difficulties on that road.

Mr. SKENE.—The railway from Tumut to the proposed site, if selected, in my opinion, is the only one likely to be made for years, and its completion would mean that Sydney would be brought sixty-eight miles nearer the site than Melbourne. The distance from Melbourne to Tumut would be 390 miles, and from Sydney to Tumut, 322 miles—a difference of sixty-eight miles. On the other hand, the distance from Sydney to the site by way of Tumut would be 368 miles, and from Melbourne via Germanton, 293 miles—a difference in favour of Melbourne of seventy-five miles. It must be remembered, however, that there is a break of gauge at Albury, and that that break is likely to continue for a considerable number of years. A further consideration is that the State Government of New South Wales would have the construction of such a line in their own hands; and it is likely that for a great many years to come—during which the Capital would be building, and the greatest amount of money would be spent on the carriage of material from the port of Sydney—the advantage would be entirely with New South Wales.

Mr. CONROY.—Could not a line be made via Tallangatta?

Mr. SKENE.—But to take the best we can, in the light of Mr. Chesterman's report—341 miles from Sydney and 278 miles from Melbourne, both being expensive routes to construct—the distance in favour of Melbourne would be only 63 miles.

Mr. CONROY.—I can assure the honorable member that a line through that country would cost 75 per cent. extra for surveying.

Mr. SKENE.—The possibility is that the line would be no more difficult to make than one from the other side. But I am taking the shortest route—that is a route which is only twenty-seven miles shorter than by way of Cootamundra. By that short route the distance would be 341 miles from Sydney, and 279 miles from Melbourne, or a difference of 63 miles.

Mr. CONROY.—Why should New South Wales undertake this work in order to give pleasant outings?

Mr. SKENE.—Because such a line would open up a country for the supply of her own markets.

Mr. CONROY.—The line would not pay.

Mr. SKENE.—The honorable member says that such a line will not pay; but the fact is that the New South Wales Government are now constructing railways of the kind without the incentive of a Federal Capital. Not only have the New South Wales Government made a railway to Germanton, but they have surveyed the route for some distance beyond to the Gap. I fancy I shall be supported by the honorable member for Hume when I say that the line has not stopped at Germanton, but has been surveyed up to a place called the Gap.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes, to a place eighteen miles further on.

Mr. CONROY.—The line would not pay for axle grease.

Mr. SKENE.—All I know is that the other day the people in that district claimed to have sent away a larger number of bags of wheat than had been sent from any district in the Commonwealth; and I have already pointed out that the New South Wales Government are building a line without any idea of a Federal Capital. Such a work would present no engineering difficulty; but my own idea is that the line would be constructed from the Tumut side. The Victorians would still have a long distance to travel, even if a line were made via Tallangatta.

Mr. CONROY.—The line would be just as expensive one way as the other.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable and learned member does not know anything about the matter.

Mr. SKENE.—The right honorable member for East Sydney urged that the Upper Murray site was inaccessible, and he went on to contrast it with the site at Dalgety, to which the provision of railway communication would be easier. But if the Southern Monaro country is equal in quality to the other country which is being opened up by the line from Germanton, it is curious that construction should have stopped at the entry to the promised land for so many years.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It has stopped there for sixteen or seventeen years.

Mr. SKENE.—I was there twelve or fourteen years ago, and the line has not been extended since. If the country had been worthy of a railway, there is no doubt that the New South Wales Government would have provided communication before now. What I want to point out is that railways are being pushed into the Upper Murray district, but not into Eden-Monaro.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Where are railways being pushed into the Upper Murray district?

Mr. SKENE.—From Culcairn, on to Germanton, and up the Murray; and Eden-Monaro cannot have a particularly good record, or, otherwise, the railway Commissioners, who are constructing railways into the furthest parts of the State, would have turned their attention to those districts. The Railway Commissioners have taken good care to get the trade of the Murray and the Murrumbidgee for the New South Wales railways; and there is no doubt that if the Eden-Monaro country had been considered good enough, it would have been provided with railways long ago. There was one contention of the right honorable member for East Sydney, which hardly holds water from a national point of view. The right honorable member could not understand our selecting a place which was simply picturesque, or beautiful to the eye; his opinion was that we should have a place where a large population would gather, and employment would be afforded.

Mr. McLEAN.—If the wealthy and leisured classes are brought to a place, business men will soon follow.

Mr. SKENE.—That is so. The Constitution—and, indeed, the House, according to the vote on the amendment of the honorable member for Corangamite—is against the Capital Site being in a large city; and, that being so, is there any sense in suggesting or contending that the Capital should be in a place where a large population will gather? If we are to follow the example of the United States, quite a different place will be selected.

Mr. CONROY.—Was it policy or jealousy which led to the exclusion of Sydney?

Mr. SKENE.—I think it was possibly a matter of jealousy at the commencement, but it has become a matter of policy; because when an honorable member moved an amendment the object of which was to effect an alteration of the Constitution in this respect, not a single New South Wales representative voted for it, notwithstanding that the supporters of that proposal were favorable to placing the Capital in Sydney. Some honorable members who at one time favoured the Capital being placed in Sydney have since told me that they are now opposed to that idea.

Mr. CONROY.—I do not think so; they apprehended some danger from altering the Constitution.

Mr. SKENE.—I cannot imagine any better place for a Capital city than a site which would be fairly accessible, as Tooma would become in a very short time, and one which would be an attractive place of residence for the leisured classes. It is a central site, about equidistant between the two great centres of Australia, Melbourne and Sydney. Some honorable members may ridicule the idea of establishing a city where the leisured classes might choose to reside, but I am quite sure that the tradespeople of the place would not consider it to be a disadvantage to have there a leisured class—I do not say necessarily a wealthy class, but a class of retired people. It might be a place where men of letters, painters, and sculptors would take up their abode.

Mr. CONROY.—Such people mostly frequent the great commercial centres.

Mr. SKENE.—I do not think that is the case in regard to Washington. I am assured that Washington is now one of the most cosmopolitan cities in the world. There are residing there not only people of artistic and literary tastes, who have long been settled in the neighbourhood, but also people who have been attracted from different parts of the world.

Mr. CONROY.—There are more blacks than whites there, are there not? It is cosmopolitan in that sense!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Grampians is perfectly right.

Mr. SKENE.—I was at Washington myself in 1867, and I did not admire the city much at that time. But since then, I understand, it has made rapid progress, and is now one of the great cities of the world. It has been stated that Washington was not meant to be a commercial centre, but I am not sure that it was not intended to be the commercial capital of the United States, because it was placed upon the tidal waters of the Potomac, on Chesapeake Bay, in a situation where it was quite possible that it might become a great commercial capital. We ought to establish a Capital where probably people of light and learning would choose to reside, and where perhaps some retired politicians in their old age might vegetate, and now and then give to budding politicians the advantage of their advice. The right honorable member for East Sydney found no fault with the Upper Murray site, except on the ground of inaccessibility. In respect to climate, it is in every way satisfactory. We can have any climate we like there. We can have land from 1,100 feet above sea level at Welaregang, to 1,600 or 2,000 feet a few miles away. We could even go up to 3,000 feet. There is an excellent water supply.

Mr. CONROY.—Where can we get water at that height?

Mr. SKENE. — There is no question about the water supply, I believe. I am told that from the Tooma River alone we could have a gravitation supply sufficient for the needs of a very large city.

Mr. CONROY.—If it is on the flats. But can we get a water supply there at a height of 1,500 feet?

Mr. SKENE.—I believe that we can. Mr. Chesterman, in his report, says, without any reservoirs, that we can obtain a sufficient supply for a population of 50,000 people, and that we would be able to add to it to any extent by utilizing streams further up the river. The honorable member for Gippsland gave this site credit for having all the qualifications except that of a port. I think that it would be very well served indeed by the two ports of Sydney and Melbourne. We need not trouble about a port for the purposes of the Capital city. I really cannot see that a port would be an advantage to the Federal Territory. If we had a port at Eden, it would only afford another point of attack. We already have a large coastline to defend.

Mr. McLEAN.—It is only by means of water that we can give fair play to Queensland and South Australia, in a commercial sense.

Mr. SKENE. — I dissent from the honorable member's view in that respect. It is not necessary, in my opinion, to consider the Capital city in a commercial sense at all. It is not intended to be a commercial city. The idea in leaving a large city is that we should locate the Federal Capital away from a large population.

Mr. McLEAN.—Then why do we need a large territory?

Mr. SKENE.—We may require a large territory for the purpose of water supply. But it seems to me to be an absurdity for those who contend that we should run away from a large city, to talk about establishing another large city with a port of its own. In any case, it could become nothing more than a coasting port. I have heard it said that it might become the port for the Eastern States, but that would really be impossible.

Mr. JOHNSON.—To what port is the honorable member now referring?

Mr. SKENE.—To the port of Eden. I have also heard it said that Washington was at one time considered likely to become one of the principal ports of the United States. But the difference of a few days—perhaps not more than a few hours—in the voyage between Europe and the United States, gave New York the opportunity of becoming the great commercial centre of America; and if the port of Eden were the finest in the world, from its situation it would not attract the traffic which now goes to Sydney.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Twofold Bay is practically an open roadstead.

Mr. SKENE.—But my point is that, even if it were the finest port imaginable, it would make no difference to the trade routes of the Pacific, which would not pass by Sydney. If the Panama Canal is completed, vessels coming westward would have to clear the North Cape of New Zealand, and the trade route would be diverted so close to Sydney that the port of Eden could never derive any benefit. So that in that respect there is no advantage in the Federal Capital having a port at Eden. But, in addition to that, Captain Mahan told us, in one of his articles at the time of the Behring Sea dispute, that Canada's safety consisted in the liability to attack of the coastal cities of the United States on the Atlantic by the British Navy. That would be the case here. The idea suggested by Mr. Oliver, in his report, that we could establish an arsenal at Twofold Bay, is the most absurd that could be put forward. In that case we should have to maintain a strong force to defend the arsenal. To do so we should have to take away our ships from defending our large cities, such as Sydney and Melbourne, and use them to defend another port, established for no useful purpose whatever that I can see. Because members of the Federal Parliament would certainly travel overland to the Capital city. I attach considerable importance, as the honorable member for Gippsland also does, to the view of this matter taken by the Senate. I attach importance to it for the reason that the members of the Senate do not represent small sections of the community in any of the States. They are elected on a broad basis by the States as States, and are therefore more likely to have a free hand in dealing with this question. In the House of Representatives we cannot discuss it without political and local considerations arising.

Mr. McLEAN.—The Senate represents the whole of Australia.

Mr. SKENE.—That is so; and the senators represent Australia in equal numbers for each State. Inasmuch also as they represent the States as States, and not particular electorates, they are not so likely to have a Capital site in my own back yard; to favour one particular site as against others. Therefore I attach considerable importance to their opinion. But, so far as my own personal view goes, I attach greatest importance to the questions of accessibility and the possibility of having a gravitation water scheme. While I do not believe personally in the Monaro sites, as not being equal to the Upper Murray site, still, if the site which I intend to vote for is not adopted, the Monaro sites would be next in favour, so far as I am concerned. I do not intend to dip into the future, and to argue as to where the centre of population is likely to be in years to come. It may be at Lyndhurst. It is all a matter of guess-work. I regret that the House did not afford an opportunity to honorable members to more carefully inspect the site which I favour in regard to water supply. If it were fully considered in that respect, I feel sure that it would grow in favour amongst honorable members, and would stand a much better chance than it now has of being selected. But still a number of honorable members have inspected the site for themselves, and those with whom I have had any conversation have been disposed to support it. In the end I think it likely that it may receive that consideration which it certainly deserves.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—I am one of those unfortunates who do not happen to have a Capital Site in my own back yard; therefore, there is no need for me to indulge in rhapsodies with regard to any particular locality. We have had a certain amount of word painting as to the merits of the various sites that are favoured. I do not pretend to have much of the æsthetic faculty in my composition, and am, therefore, rather disposed to confine myself to discussing the question on the lines which have been followed by the honorable member for Gippsland, who presented to us what he termed a practical sketch of the requirements. But, before expressing my views at length, I should like to say that I deeply regret—not only for the sake of New South Wales, but for the sake of all Australia—that the 100-miles limit has been placed in the Constitution. The members of the Premiers' Conference inserted that provision in consequence of a sharp piece of diplomacy, which was practised by the right honorable member for Balaclava on behalf of the State of Victoria. He saw the opportunity of driving a sharp bargain, but the right honorable member for East Sydney, with his usual kindness of disposition, gave himself away when he allowed such a stipulation to be made. At that time, it will be remembered, it was questionable whether Federation would be accomplished. New South Wales had repulsed the overtures of the other States, and it was thought that if the Capital were conceded to New South Wales she would be induced to enter the Federation. The Constitution was altered, and, as a result, it was accepted by all the States. We should have no beating about the bush with regard to the 100-miles limit. However the electors in other parts of Australia regarded it, it is certain that the electors of New South Wales considered that the Capital was to be as close as possible to the largest centre of that State. The honorable member for Gippsland tells us that he would rather vote for placing the Capital at Sydney than at Lyndhurst.

Mr. McLEAN.—I would a hundred times rather vote for Sydney than Lyndhurst.

Mr. WILKS.—I am glad that the honorable member makes that admission.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Would the honorable member sooner vote for Sydney than Bombala?

Mr. McLEAN.—Bombala would be more central than Sydney, but Sydney would be a better site than Lyndhurst.

Mr. WILKS. — The people of New South Wales supposed that the Capital would be established as near as possible to Sydney, consistently with the 100-miles limit. Every one must regret that such a site as Moss Vale, Exeter, and the surrounding district, is debarred, because it possesses all the qualities of accessibility, centrality, and all the special physical features which it is claimed are of primary importance. But we cannot now obtain that, although it is only a few miles short of the 100-mile limit, and, therefore, we have to go further afield. The first consideration with the honorable member for Gippsland was centrality. That is a well-sounding word, and makes a good head-line. I wish to know whether he means centrality in regard to population, or centrality in regard to geographical area. If he means the former, I think I can show him that he is departing very much from the centre and extending himself to the circumference.

Mr. McLEAN.—I mean centrality in regard to the different States.

Mr. WILKS.—According to the first census which was ever taken in Australia, in 1861, the centre of population was in the neighbourhood of Albury; but census returns for 1901 show that it had shifted to the neighbourhood of Lyndhurst; that is 125 miles north of Albury; and the tendency is still to the northward. The honorable member for Grampians, a representative of Victoria, has admitted that in a rough way the trend of population is to the east and north-east shores of Australia. That is unquestionably so, so far as Queensland and New South Wales are concerned.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable member think that it will always be in that direction?

Mr. WILKS.—If the right honorable member will permit me, I will put my case in my own way. My power as a seer is no stronger than in his. I am dealing with matters of fact—with statistics. We know that as regards the occupation of land Victorian electors—even electors from Gippsland—have within very recent weeks, taken themselves away, not to the north-east portions of Victoria, but to the north-east portions of New South Wales. With that commercial acumen, which all Victorians possess, these men seek “fresh woods and pastures new,” not on the south coast of New South Wales, but on the north coast of New South Wales and in Queensland. It is the constant rainfall which visits the north-east coast of New South Wales, and the southern districts of Queensland, which attracts population to the luxurious districts to be seen there. Any one who is acquainted with those districts—and no one knows them better than does the Prime Minister—must admit that, in point of fertility, no soil excels that which he has seen on the north-east coast of New South Wales, and the southern coast of Queensland.

Mr. WATSON.—Hear, hear.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable gentleman knows, by practical experience, that it is so. Naturally, the bone and sinew of the country—the farming class—will drift in that direction. I am now appealing, not to a representative of New South Wales, on behalf of a particular site, but to a representative of Victoria, whom I ask, on lines of centrality, to give his first choice, not to Bombala or Dalgety, but, unquestionably, to Lyndhurst, which is today the centre of population. In reply to the right honorable member for Swan who has practically asked “what concern is that to Western Australia,” I may mention that Lyndhurst and Kalgoorlie are in about the same latitude. I wish to take another view of the question of centrality. I take it that the regard of the honorable member for Gippsland, and those who use that well-sounding word, plus what they term accessibility, is for the population of to-day. If accessibility is to be applied as a test in the choice of a site, let us consider the accessibility of Lyndhurst, not from the standpoint of a Sydney or Melbourne man, but from the standpoint of an Australian. At the present time Lyndhurst can be approached by railway more cheaply and expeditiously than can any other site. Again, let us consider the possibilities of bringing Lyndhurst into closer touch with Queensland. For several years prior to the establishment of the Commonwealth, the Government of New South Wales had seriously considered the question of connecting the Great Northern Railway at Werris Creek with the Great Western Railway at Wellington or Dubbo. The cross-country line would be a connecting link for the Queenslander, who would not be compelled to take the long journey which he otherwise would have to take to Tooma, or Dalgety, or Bombala. The accessibility of Lyndhurst to Victoria by means of existing railway communication has been established here time after time. Let us now consider the accessibility of Lyndhurst to South Australia. The construction of a railway from Cobarto Broken Hill has been seriously considered by the Government of New South Wales. The construction of that line is not beyond the realms of possibility. A survey of the line has been made. I cannot say that the money has been voted yet, but there has been a strong agitation in favour of its construction.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Does the honorable member think that South Australia wishes that railway to be constructed?

Mr. WILKS.—New South Wales, with its rich deposits at Broken Hill, has not been a bad friend to South Australia. Broken Hill has supplied a good deal of trade to South Australia, and if the honorable member means to imply that the South Australians are afraid that they would lose that trade by the construction of a line to Cobar, to connect with the existing railway system at that point, let me tell him frankly and openly that their Federal spirit is a sham. That is a harsh word to use; but if, when I am fighting for a Capital Site for Australia, and trying to show the accessibility of Lyndhurst to South Australia by that route, I am met with the question, "Do I think that South Australians wish that railway to be constructed?"—

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—With fair railway rates New South Wales could never divert the Broken Hill trade from Adelaide.

Mr. WILKS.—If that is the only fear which the honorable member has, let me remind him that this Parliament have the power to create an Inter-State Commission, which could destroy any advantage which New South Wales may get from cutting railway rates. Apparently, he fears that South Australians are not concerned in fixing a site which could be made accessible to them and to others—generally accessible to Australia. If the representatives of every State are proceeding on the basis that their people are trying to make as much out of the Federation as they can, and to obtain their pound of flesh every time, let them not pretend to feelings of horror when they are told New South Wales wishes the Capital Site to be fixed. Let them not decry New South Wales for requesting that the Capital Site shall be located near the port of Sydney. If one State is to fight because she thinks she will lose a commercial, and another State fights because she thinks that Sydney will gain another advantage, that says very little for their Federal spirit. I trust, however, that we have not yet come to that stage. We, as politicians, may engage in such battles. We may think it right to fight for one State as against another, but I do not think that the electors of Australia, once they were satisfied that the best available site had been chosen, would bother very much whether one State or another gained in commerce. The average elector, whether he be in Richmond, in Victoria, or in Balmain, in New South Wales, or in a suburb of South Australia or Western Australia, knows that wherever it may be fixed, it will be of very little concern to him individually. Our concern should be to choose a site in the interests not so much of the people of this day as of future generations. The trend of population, in the course of forty or fifty years will not be south of Lyndhurst, but north of that point. If centrality of population is to be the primary consideration in fixing a site, I say to those honorable members who wish the Capital to be taken south, that the centre of population to-day is Lyndhurst, and that the centre in a few years will be nearer to Queensland. I hold the view that the great rival of New South Wales in years to come will be Queensland. If I were starting life again it would be to Queensland that I should go, and I think that the young people of Australia would be acting wisely if they were to establish their homes in that great State. For these reasons I think that Lyndhurst is about as far south as any representative of Queensland can go, or any representative of New South Wales can be expected to go. Let us now consider the physical features—water supply, productiveness of soil, and mineral resources—on which the honorable member for Gippsland laid great stress. It has been demonstrated here by the report of an expert that Lyndhurst, although not so favorably situated as Dalgety in that regard, has, for all practical purposes to-day, a storage capacity sufficient to supply with water the population that will exist in the Federal Capital in a couple of hundred years from this time. That statement has not been contradicted. It has been made, not by a representative of the State, but by no less an authority than the Engineer-in-Chief for Water Conservation in New South Wales, who, by reason of his technical knowledge, was asked to report on the water resources of various sites. His report is of such a character that no one can say that Lyndhurst is devoid of a water supply which would meet the requirements of the population of, not only to-day, but of 200 or 300 years from this time. The productiveness of the soil at Lyndhurst has been discussed by its representative here. I do not wish to throw on the table a sample of the greatest pumpkin or the largest potato which has ever been grown, and say to honorable members—"Look at what Lyndhurst will grow.

You will get potatoes and pumpkins of such a size that your domestic accounts will be smaller and smaller; in fact, the green-grocer will be paying you instead of your paying him, if you go and live there." I do not intend to present an argument of this character, that it would pay a green-grocer to give honorable members so much a week instead of taking their orders, the vegetables grown in the district being so heavy that it would cost too much to convey them from house to house. We do not need to produce for your edification, Mr. Chairman, the well known potato or pumpkin which has travelled all round the shows of Australia, appearing in one place to represent the products of Gippsland, in another to show the fertility of the country surrounding Ballarat, and in another as an example of what can be grown near Adelaide. Still, the honorable member for Macquarie has not left us without knowledge as to the productiveness of the soil in and around Lyndhurst. What he said may be supported by a reference to the condition of the people in that district. Some of the most prosperous landholders in Australia reside in the Lyndhurst district. Theirs is not an intermittent prosperity, nor is it prosperity occasioned by a gold mining rush. It is solid prosperity which has endured for many years. Bathurst is one of the most important country towns of New South Wales. Not only is the whole district settled by a wealthy pastoral and farming class, but it has also great mineral resources. I would point out here that in the present utilitarian state of feeling, we are not likely to extravagantly expend millions of pounds in housing the future Federal politicians and Federal officers. Personally I am not so accustomed to dwelling in marble halls that I would feel it necessary to construct for the Federal Parliament a building which would be a replica of this. The country cannot afford such expenditure. What we desire is the happy mean between Spartan simplicity and Oriental extravagance. But even if we erected gorgeous palaces for public officers, the Seat of Government would not attract a large population. The building operations there would, of course, bring many mechanics and artisans to the place, who would enjoy an ephemeral prosperity; but to attract a large permanent population the Federal Capital must be situated in a district which will afford opportunities for the obtaining of a livelihood. Lynd-hurst is such a district. "Earth is here so kind, that just tickle her with a hoe and she laughs with a harvest."

Mr. McLEAN.—The Commissioners say that the good land in the district is fifty miles from the proposed site.

Mr. WILKS.—They mean the best of the land. It is all good land there, though some may be better, and some best. No doubt the honorable member has heard of the man who was not addicted to the habits of temperance, and who, when he heard a reference to bad beer, said, "There is no such thing as bad beer. There is good beer, and better beer, but no bad beer." I do not take that attitude in reference to beer, but I would apply the remark to the land in the Lyndhurst district. It is all good land. An agriculturist has only to supply energy in order to get a return from it. Its pastoral capabilities, too, are shown by the number of wealthy families in the district who follow pastoral pursuits. But, of course, not every man in Melbourne or Sydney can afford to buy a station or to purchase a farm, though there are many persons who would be glad to move to the Seat of Government if they could find work to do there. The Lyndhurst district is one which would give employment to a great number of people, because, in addition to its pastoral and agricultural resources, it has great mineral resources. Within an easy distance of the proposed site are large coal-fields, and rich copper mines. The whole district may be described as a network of the jewels of the earth. I do not wish to rhapsodize, however. As I said in my opening remarks, I envy the Ruskin-like powers of description possessed by some of those who spoke last week. It would, indeed, require the descriptive faculty of a Ruskin or a Sir Walter Scott to do justice to this site. But if the honorable member for Gippsland had visited the district he would have seen that, notwithstanding the advantages possessed by the southern sites, Lyndhurst is still more favorably situated. The districts in the north-eastern corner of New South Wales, and in the southern parts of Queensland, are daily attracting large numbers of people. I can understand the attachment of the honorable member for Gippsland to the electorate which he represents; but people are leaving that district to go, not to Bombala, but to the places further north which I have mentioned.

Mr. McLEAN.—That is because there is land for sale there. I admit that the land on the Richmond River is good land ; but it is not always a good sign when you find the people of a district anxious to sell.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member is a canny Scot, possessing all the virtues and all the shrewdness of his race ; but he finds my argument difficult to answer. It is well known that within the last six months certain of his own people formed a syndicate and purchased the Kyogle estate, in northern New South Wales, for about £150,000. This estate has since been cut up into farms, which are now being sold at very high prices.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does the honorable member call the prices high ?

Mr. WILKS.—Yes, for farm land.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am told that it is excellent land, but that it is being bought for prices which are being given for the worst land in Gippsland.

Mr. WILKS.—Proximity to a market has a good deal to do with the price of land. But I do not wish to be led off on a side track. The point I am making is that the people of Gippsland, who know what good land is, and farmers from other parts of Australia, are going, not to the Bombala district, but further north, to take up farms and to make homes for themselves. Lyndhurst is practically the centre of the present population of Australia, and as population increases its centre will shift, not further south, but further north. The honorable member for Gippsland spoke against the selection of the Lyndhurst site also for the reason that if that site were chosen the result would be the aggrandizement of the port of Sydney. But that argument is at once met by the statement that if Tooma were chosen the result would be the aggrandizement of the port of Melbourne. In dealing with a matter of this kind, one must be very careful not to throw stones, because, while it may be easy to break the windows of other sites, there is always a great risk of getting the window of one's own site broken as well.

Mr. McLEAN.—The site I advocated is situated midway between Sydney and Melbourne.

Mr. WILKS.—If the site the honorable member advocated were chosen, we should have to travel either by balloon or airship, because there are mountain ranges to be negotiated, and to construct a railway there would involve an expenditure of about £4,000,000. In considering this question, it should be recollected that the average individual prefers to travel by coach, rail, or steamer, rather than by balloon or air-ship. The honorable member for Gippsland, I repeat, has argued that if Lyndhurst be selected, all the trade of the Capital will go to Sydney. What would honorable members think if I turned round and declared, "Oh, the Tooma site is a grand one. Potatoes will grow there better than in any other part of the world. So also will cabbages and pumpkins—in fact, everything is greener there than it is elsewhere, but if we select that site all the trade will go to Port Phillip" ? If we all entertain views of that sort, and are struggling for commercial gain, the city of Sydney should be protected equally with that of Melbourne. Let us understand whether we are fighting for commercial gain or for the establishment of a Federal city, for the benefit of the population not only of to-day, but of the future. To institute comparisons between sites from the point of view of centrality, accessibility, &c., is of no use, if our arguments when boiled down mean that we object to a site because its selection will mean that its trade will go to Melbourne or Sydney. If that is the view which is entertained, I can quite understand the anxiety of the Victorian press, and of many honorable members, to secure delay in the settlement of this question. I venture to say, however, that, if the feeling of the people of Australia could be tested, it would be found that they have sufficient breadth of mind—irrespective of the State from which they come—to enable them to respect their brothers and sisters in other portions of the Union, and to induce them to say that they desire in the interests of all to see the most suitable site selected. The honorable member for Gippsland has urged that if we choose the Lyndhurst site, gain will result to Sydney. Do I understand that he has decided to support the claims of Bombala ? I know that, to a large extent, he represents Victorian opinion in this House, and Victorian sentiment outside of it. Consequently, I wish to know whether he has decided to stand by the Bombala site ?

Mr. McLEAN.—I intend to support one of the Monaro sites.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member is a generous sort of mortal, who practically says, "Here are two apples. I will take this one, and you may exercise your own choice as to which of the remainder you will have." He has decided to support the Bombala site. In the first place,

I suppose, that site, by a sheer accident, is situated just on the border-line of Victoria. In the second place, the honorable member must be aware from the reports of experts, that New South Wales would require to spend millions of pounds to connect it by rail with existing lines.

Mr. MCLEAN.—Does the honorable member know that the railway already runs into the Monaro district?

Mr. WILKS.—I ought to know exactly how far the railway runs into that country, seeing that upon one occasion I was laid up in the Cooma hospital for ten days. The fact is that I strained my eyesight so seriously in an endeavour to discover the beauties of the Bombala site that I was compelled to enter the hospital at Cooma, which is the present terminus of the railway.

Mr. BAMFORD.—It is a beautiful little place.

Mr. WILKS.—Yes; next to Lyndhurst, it is one of the prettiest little towns I know. The honorable member for Gippsland has argued in favour of the selection of Bombala, on the ground that it possesses a seaport. But I would point out that Twofold Bay is fifty miles distant, and that between it and the Bombala site there are mountains to climb, as precipitous as are those to be found in Gippsland. During the course of this debate we have heard a good deal in reference to climate. Honorable members appear to be very desirous to secure a cool climate. I do not know whether they expect to experience a very warm climate in the future, but, possibly, that may be the true explanation. Though during the parliamentary visit of inspection there, I was unable to attend the festivities at Bombala, I had an opportunity of asking one of its residents what the townspeople did during the summer months. His reply was that everybody who could afford it went to the seaside. Upon being questioned as to why they did this, he informed me that during the summer the climate of Bombala was too warm to permit of their remaining there.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The honorable member for Eden-Monaro did not say so.

Mr. WILKS.—No; he could not be expected to say so. As the honorable member for Grampians has pointed out, if we desire to obtain a port in connexion with the Federal Capital, we shall have to pay for it, and we shall also require to spend money in fortifying and otherwise defending it. I wish, further, to impress upon honorable members that Twofold Bay is such a well-sheltered harbor that during all the gales experienced upon the coast of New South Wales, no vessel ever seeks shelter there.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That is absolutely incorrect. During almost every heavy gale two or three boats seek shelter there.

Mr. WILKS.—Two or three fishing boats. An ordinary sized steamer cannot enter it. One of the Union Steamship Company's boats was unable to turn there because the channel was not deep enough.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — Why, it is deeper than is Sydney harbor.

Mr. WILKS.—The steamer of which I am speaking had to go astern until she had got safely out of the harbor. To make that port a harbor of shelter over a million pounds sterling would require to be spent in the construction of a breakwater, and we all know that when once a Government commences to build breakwaters there is practically no end to the bills which have to be met. Moreover, apart from railway construction, millions of pounds would require to be expended to make it even an ordinary port of shelter. I have nothing to urge against the selection of the Monaro site, save that it would involve an extravagant outlay. The Melbourne press is continually crying out about extravagant Federal expenditure, and, in order to bolster up a case in opposition to the choice of what it calls a "bush" capital, it has dragged in millions of pounds for the construction of such works as the trans-continental railway. I freely present the journals of this city with further reasons for the rejection of the Bombala site. Its selection, I claim, would involve an excessive expenditure in dredging the harbor, so as to make it afford a safe anchorage, also a large outlay in constructing breakwaters, and in fortifying it. I wish now to give one other illustration of the weakness of Twofold Bay. It is scarcely necessary to point out that the vessels of the Australian Auxiliary Squadron never use it, either for manœuvring purposes or for shell practice. They use Jervis Bay, which, from the point of view of safety and dimensions, offers even better facilities than does Port Jackson. If representatives from other parts of Australia merely desire to secure a beautiful harbor of large dimensions, and one capable of sheltering any class of vessel in the world, I would recommend them to visit Jervis Bay. The Lake George site, the claims of which have not been considered on the present occasion, is situated within forty miles of that port, and the intervening country presents no engineering difficulties in the way of railway construction. If their only desire is to secure a territory possessing a suitable port, so that, in the event of a conflict between the Federal authority and the State, it will be possible to reach the Capital without passing through State territory, then let me recommend them to Jervis Bay. Desperate as we are, however—and ready as we are to fly off the handle—I do not think the time will ever come when, because of conflict between the Federal authority and the State, it will be dangerous for residents of the Federal territory to travel over that State. We are fairly bad, it is true, but we are not a lot of Bashi-bazouks, and there is no cause to fear anything in that direction. If any honorable member fears that at some time or other there may be a struggle to the death between the representatives of the Commonwealth and of the State of New South Wales, and therefore desires that the Federal territory, shall have independent means of access, I respectfully recommend him to support the selection of a site near Jervis Bay.

Mr. SKENE.—Is Jervis Bay beyond the 100-miles limit?

Mr. WILKS.—I think it is.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No.

Mr. WILKS.—I believe that it is more than 100 miles from Sydney.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Will the honorable member propose its selection?

Mr. WILKS.—No; for the reason that I do not wish any further delay to take place. The people of New South Wales have been fooled quite long enough, and the sooner we make a selection the better. It is often said that it was a "bargain" that the Federal Capital should be in New South Wales. I decline to use that word in this connexion. It was not a mere bargain, but the recognition of an absolute right.

Mr. SKENE.—To a certain extent that is so.

Mr. WILKS.—I am glad to have that admission from a representative of Victoria. Do not let us say that it was a concession to New South Wales. A fig for any concession. The people of New South Wales are not going on their bended knees to ask for any favour; they ask for the recognition of a constitutional right.

Mr. POYNTON.—Neither are the other States going on their bended knees to New South Wales.

Mr. WILKS.—There is no necessity for any ill-feeling. In dealing with this matter I do not intend to have regard to any question of State against State, or to study the convenience of Brown of to-day as against the inconvenience of Jones of to-morrow. Some reference has been made to the position taken up by the press. If the press of Australia find it to the interests of Australia to report the proceedings of the Federal Parliament, then, wherever the Seat of Government may be, they will do so. It matters not whether a report, or a leading article dealing with the proceedings of the Parliament, be written in an office, in the back blocks, or in the sanctum of Syme, in Collins-street, Melbourne; it is bound to be circulated wherever it is written and published. I do not think that the question of expense will be considered by the press in relation to the publication of the debates of this Parliament. They will give such publicity to our proceedings as may be considered desirable. In urging that Lyndhurst should be selected, I am actuated by a desire to conserve the interests of the whole Commonwealth. Lyndhurst is to-day the centre of population in Australia, and the point cannot be taken further south. It is easy of access, and on that ground I claim the votes of the representatives of Queensland, South Australia, and Victoria. I put aside all considerations as to the commercial advantage which might accrue to Sydney, Melbourne, or any other city, from the selection of a particular site; but would point out that if Lyndhurst were selected, no expense would be incurred in providing a means of communication by railway. The existing railways supply all wants in that respect. With the construction of a railway from Cobar to Broken Hill, South Australia will be directly tapped, while Lyndhurst will be placed in touch with Queensland by the construction of a railway from Werris Creek. I am not so moulded that I can soar into rhapsodies about the picturesqueness of the country, but I would remind honorable members that some of the most romantic sights in Australia are within easy distance of Lyndhurst. The Blue Mountains, which are close at hand, are unexcelled in point of interest and beauty by any other part of Australia. Visitors from all parts of Australia, as well 'as from the old world, make their pilgrimages to the many beauty spots with which they abound, so that if we are seeking for picturesque country we shall find it at our very doors.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Lyndhurst is also close to the Jenolan Caves.

Mr. WILKS.—That is so, and to many other points of interest, to which men of business in the capital may resort in their leisure moments. After all, the Federal Capital is not likely to be a sort of Elysium where the people will wander about the streets, from early morn to dewy eve, with garlands of flowers around their hats, spending their days in picnicing. It will take them all their time to bustle round and earn a living. I do not anticipate that the effects of the scenery will be such as to cause a new class of people to arise. The troubles which prevail here will prevail there, but if we select Lyndhurst, those who have the means and the leisure will be able to satisfy their love of the beautiful by visiting the show places of the Blue Mountains. So much for the question of picturesqueness. I wish to emphasize the point that Lyndhurst can sustain a large population. The development of its pastoral, agricultural, and mineral resources, will provide employment for a very large industrial class. I therefore appeal to those who fly the banner of the industrial classes to a greater extent than does any other party in the House, to vote for this site. Can any honorable member point to any other site at which the industrial classes would find a more ready means of employment than will be forthcoming in and around Lyndhurst? The raw material exists there in abundance, and those who believe that a certain policy is necessary for the development of our resources, should avail themselves of this opportunity to experiment under favorable conditions. Some reference has been made to the climatic conditions of the several sites. There are some who are anxious that as cool a spot as possible should be selected, in order to make up that which they will probably lack in the future; and to these I would point out that the mean temperature of Lyndhurst is better than is that of any other site.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—There is no rhapsody about that.

Mr. WILKS.—It is no figure of speech. My statement is supported by the figures of the Government meteorologist.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The honorable member can double spades on that.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member uses a simile which I shall not attempt to bridge. The Government meteorologist shows that the heat is not so great, and the cold certainly not so intense at Lyndhurst as it is at Bombala and Dalgety—that the climate is not so warm as is the climate of the other sites. The mean temperature is certainly better. If those who oppose the selection of this site do so chiefly on the ground that Sydney would be benefited by it, I can only say that it is time that the capital of New South Wales received some advantage from the Federation. If poor old Sydney is, however, to depend upon the Federal Capital for her existence, she had better put up her shutters. But we all know that she can live without the Federal Capital. A city of the stability of good old Sydney has no occasion to rest upon the establishment of the Seat of Government close at hand. New South Wales is not in the national Insolvency Court, although I must admit that Federation has dragged her pretty close to it. The Federal spirit so overwhelmed the people of that State that they almost lost their mental balance, and supported extravagant expenditure to such an extent that the State has now to cut down her public outlay.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The people of every State are saying the same thing.

Mr. WILKS.—I shall not allow the right honorable member for Swan or any other honorable member to suggest that Sydney is anxious to live on the charity of Western Australia, or of any other State. New South Wales does not intend, any more than does Victoria or Queensland, to live on the mere sufferance, so to speak, of the representative of any State.

Mr. McDONALD.—Queensland is not asking for any concession from the Commonwealth.

Mr. WILKS.—She has done very well. She has obtained that for which she chiefly entered the Union—the abolition of coloured labour, and New South Wales played a serious part, if we measure everything by pounds, shillings, and pence, in assisting Queensland to that end.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—She helped to give Queensland a heavy duty on sugar.

Mr. TUDOR.—The representatives of New South Wales did not assist in passing that duty.

Mr. WILKS.—No honorable member was more earnest in advocating the abolition of black labour than were the representatives of New South Wales.

Mr. TUDOR.—But the representatives of New South Wales did not vote for the sugar duty.

Mr. WILKS.—We wished to get rid of one evil without creating another. To those who say that Lyndhurst is favoured by some honorable members because its selection would be advantageous to Sydney, I would reply that Sydney seeks no benefit in that direction. She merely demands a recognition of her right. I believe that if a referendum of the people of Australia were taken on the matter, Sydney itself would be chosen as the Capital Site. When it is suggested that some honorable members support Lyndhurst because of some possible trade gain to Sydney, I can only say that, if there were a trade gain to Sydney, that city would be absolutely entitled to it. For years before Federation New South Wales had her doors open to the people of the other States. She did not keep out their products, but invited them to send their products into New South Wales. The only response we get now is to be told that those who advocate the selection of Lyndhurst as the Capital Site do so because some paltry portion of trade might gravitate to Sydney. We know that last session some honorable members tried to drag the Federal territory right down to the borders of Victoria. The site chosen by this House was Tumut; but some honorable members were not satisfied with that, and they insisted upon defining an elongated Federal area, which might be compared to the patch upon the nether garments of a schoolboy. It ran from Dan to Beersheba—from one end of the country to the other. They insisted that the Federal territory should extend to the Murray, and there were some honorable members who, if they could have done so, would have brought it in a straight line to the very confines of Melbourne. In spite of this, we are now told that those who propose to vote for Lyndhurst do so in order to secure a trade advantage to Sydney. I say a fig for all these professions of Federal sentiment's. If honorable members mean business, and are Federal, they should not merely profess a spirit of Federalism, but should act in a Federal manner. I am prepared to act in the interests of the people of all the States. Specious arguments were offered last session, when Tumut was chosen as the Capital Site, for extending the Federal territory to the Murray River. It was said that it was necessary to secure a doorway to the Federal Capital for the people of Victoria. I ask whether there should not be a doorway also for the people of Queensland, Western Australia, and South Australia? Why should there be a doorway for the people of one State only? These things cannot well be forgotten; but I trust that since last session our disposition has undergone a change, and that there will now be no more of the struggle to have the Federal Capital placed in the backyard, so to speak, of Victoria. I hope that honorable members will be concerned to select a site that will be suitable for the whole of Australia, and, in that view, I respectfully suggest that Lyndhurst should be the site selected. Last session I voted for Tumut, on its record, and without seeing it. But having seen Tumut since, I must admit that this session my second choice will be Dalgety. I do not now propose to say why and wherefore. At the first ballot last session I voted for Lyndhurst, and on that occasion there were twenty-five straight-out votes given for the selection of that site. No other site has had equal voting in its favour. The supporters of other sites were, by combination, successful in destroying its chance of selection; but no other site on a straight-out vote secured as much support as did Lyndhurst. Believing that Lyndhurst is practically in the centre of the population of Australia, I am not prepared to go to the Victorian border for a site. I am not prepared in any case to go nearer to the Victorian border than Dalgety, which, I think, is distant forty miles from Bombala. I ask honorable members to be guided in their selection by considerations of centrality, accessibility, and the physical features which have been referred to by the honorable member for Gippsland. That honorable member can now have no fear about an adequate water supply at Lyndhurst, and I cannot, therefore, see how he can fail to vote for the selection of that site. One argument used by the honorable member I could not understand, and that was his objection to Lyndhurst, on the ground that certain trade would go to the port of Sydney. I ask honorable members to consider what the trade involved would be worth. Is it likely to be of such value that Melbourne cannot live without it, or that Sydney without it must perish in the national Bankruptcy Court? If the only argument of the honorable member for Gippsland against the selection of Lyndhurst is the advantage that would be given to the port of Sydney, I can recommend to him the port of Jervis Bay, which is one of the best ports in Australia, and which is within forty miles of an excellent site. For the reasons I have given, I trust that Lyndhurst will be the site chosen; but I still think that, in the interests of Australia, it would have been better if the limitation of 100 miles from Sydney had never found a place in the Constitution, because, not in Sydney itself, but at Moss Vale, Exeter, and round that district a site might have been selected which would be unexcelled in Australia.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby—Minister of Home Affairs).—If honorable members have no desire to further discuss the sites, the next step will be to report progress, and we propose to ask the House to-morrow to take a ballot. If honorable members will look at the notice-paper, they will see that the order of the day No. 2, "Seat of Government Bill: ballot to determine site," appears after the order of the day. "Seat of Government Bill." That order will be reversed to-morrow if I am given to understand that honorable members have concluded the debate upon the sites, and, in that event, we shall take the ballot the first thing to-morrow.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume).—I do not know what the Minister desires in this matter, but I think there will be an opportunity to further discuss the question.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—After the ballot, the honorable member means?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No; before the ballot.

The CHAIRMAN.—The resolution distinctly states that the ballot is to be taken without discussion.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I know that a number of honorable members intended to speak. I wish to speak myself, but I should be better prepared to do so after dinner. I do not know what is in the wind, but it appears to me that two or three honorable members who were going to speak have, for some reason or another, drawn back.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Let us divide.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is useless to talk about a division. It was not intended that there should be a division on this clause, but that we should know when the debate on it had been concluded. If there is to be an adjournment now I cannot allow the matter to go without saying a few words. I have listened during the debate to some statements that are absolutely incorrect. Some were made by way of interjection, and some directly by different speakers. There are those who have attempted to cast blame upon me particularly, because the site which has of late been brought under notice was not previously brought under the attention of honorable members. The honorable member for Grampians in the able speech which he has delivered has shown clearly what I previously said. I did not know that I had stated in this House that my objection to supporting this site, at the time when I was Minister of Home Affairs, was because it was so far south. But I knew that that was in my mind, and I thought also, that the people of Sydney might object to the selection of such a site. I stated at the time to which reference was made, that Tumut is situated in one of the finest and richest valleys in New South Wales, and in my humble opinion it was one of the sites that would give satisfaction as a Federal Capital. But I then stated also, that the Upper Murray was for scenery, for extent of good land, and for water supply, probably the finest valley that there is in Australia. I can now repeat what I then stated. I have travelled over a very large part of Australia; I have explored the continent as much as most men, and I say that for picturesqueness I have never seen a valley which could compare with the Upper Murray Valley. When we deal with the matter on a previous occasion Tumut, with its extent of rich land, its fine views, and its magnificent water supply, appeared to me to be an ideal spot on which to locate the Federal Capital. In addition to other qualifications, it is practically half-way between Sydney and Melbourne. Those were the reasons which mainly induced me to throw all the energy I could into securing the selection of that particular site. I cannot understand how any honorable member can state as the honorable member for Dalley has done, that he voted last session for Tumut, but that on this occasion, having seen the district, he will not vote for it. I can only say that the honorable member must have a very dim eye for the picturesque, must have a very poor knowledge of the difference between good and bad soil, and can have no idea of the importance of a good water supply for the Federal Capital. I wish now to refer to the way in which certain sites were decided on for inspection.

That has been referred to in debate, and referred to with an evident want of knowledge. The origin of the selection of these sites was my appointment of the late Mr. Alex. Oliver considerably before the members of the Federal Government were chosen, and, certainly, before the Federal Parliament was elected. My object then, as head of the Government of New South Wales, was to select some person who knew the country fairly well, and who, taking time by the forelock, would inspect the best sites. After his appointment, Mr. Oliver inserted notices in the press, which were circulated throughout New South Wales, asking all those who knew a particularly good site to communicate with him. There were, I think, forty or fifty sites, perhaps more, in regard to which there was reasonable anticipation of their being inspected.

Mr. McLEAN.—Mr. Oliver gave us the best report we have yet had.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I must differ from the honorable member for Gippsland. Mr. Oliver's report was absolutely incorrect in some particulars, and I regret very much that he was induced, or allowed, to issue a report by way of a criticism on the report of the Royal Commission.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The criticism was well deserved.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The report of Mr. Oliver showed that he was not the Alexander Oliver he was in the full prime and vigour of his life. Mr. Oliver's report was a petulant, unfair, and uncalled-for attack, and, certainly, did his well-earned reputation no good in his last days. I regret very much that Mr. Oliver ever made that second report; and, further, it has been clearly proved that in regard to his first report he was in one or two instances absolutely wrong, as he acknowledged, in the face of the report of the Royal Commission subsequently appointed by the Federal Government.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — Mr. Oliver carefully reported the details as he understood them, but when he found out the true facts he simply gave them.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is to some extent correct; but I took the trouble to inquire how it was that Mr. Oliver dropped into so many errors. I inquired from one or two of the leading heads of Departments in New South Wales, and the reply given to me was that Mr. Oliver, either for the reason that he did not want to spend too much money, or for some other reason, did not obtain the best officers to make inquiries and report. There were none so competent as the heads of Departments to instruct him as to the officers from whom information could be best obtained; but what I have stated was the reason given to me as the one which caused Mr. Oliver to fall into so many serious errors—errors which were pointed out by the Commission subsequently appointed. Mr. Oliver selected the sites which he conceived to be eligible, and reported accordingly; and I do think that he was extremely unfair in regard to Albury, Corowa, and the Murray districts generally. It was most unfair to those districts that he should put them on one side, simply for the reason that they were, in his opinion, too far from Sydney. As a matter of fact, I may point out to the honorable member for Gippsland that Bombala, or any other outlandish place in that neighbourhood, is further south than Albury.

Mr. McLEAN.—Bombala is exactly midway between Melbourne and Sydney.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for Hume ought to know the opinion of the House in regard to Albury.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Mr. Oliver had a good deal to do with forming the opinion of the House in regard to Albury. I shall not go to the honorable member for Eden-Monaro for an opinion on any place other than Bombala; the honorable member seems to lose his temper whenever he discusses the matter, and that is never a wise thing to do. I could not allow this question to be discussed without saying a word or two in regard to Mr. Oliver's report on Albury and the Murray districts. Mr. Oliver does not show in his report that Albury is not a suitable site. He does not show that at Albury there is any absence of water supply, or that the climate is objectionable—he simply gives the one reason that the place is too far south of Sydney. Finally, he recommended Bombala, having spent about a week or ten days there.

Mr. CROUCH.—Mr. Oliver said that Tumut had a good climate.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—How long did the Royal Commission spend at Twofold Bay? Ten minutes?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think the Commission stayed long enough at Twofold Bay to get a good idea of the place. I have been there many times, and I know the district almost as well as does my honorable friend who represents it in this Parliament. I know that one can get a good idea of the place in a few hours. All this, however, is by the way. The honorable and learned member for Corio has suggested that Mr. Oliver said that Tumut has a good climate; and so it has. It is unfortunate that some people wish, without justification, to vilify Tumut in every way; and in regard to this particular district there has been a good deal of unfairness. Tumut, though not extensive, is one of the finest valleys on the Continent, and it possesses a climate in which people, who have lived for many years in hotter districts, can reside without injury to their constitution. That, I need not say, is not possible at Bombala or Dalgety, where only those of iron constitution can survive.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—After members of Parliament visited Tumut, that site became out of the question.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I would suggest that the honorable member for Eden-Monaro address the House after I have finished. The honorable member has jibed at me a good deal, but I am not going to get out of temper. It is unfortunate that the weather was warm on the day when most honorable members went to Tumut. But though there may occasionally be a hot day, still any man, woman, or child who has lived in a hot climate for many years can live there without danger or fear. That cannot be said concerning the Monaro country. Statements have been made regarding the Tumut climate, and the unhealthiness of the neighbourhood, that are not capable of being verified; but an impression has been produced owing to which I fear there is not much hope of Tumut being selected by the House.

Mr. MAHON.—Do not lose heart.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am not losing heart. I never did in my life. But I cannot shut my eyes to facts. Honorable members can see from the map that the Bombala and Dalgety sites are much further from Sydney than either the Welaregang or Tumut sites. In fact, Bombala is forty-nine miles further south than Welaregang, and Dalgety is twenty-six miles further south.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Dalgety is closer to Sydney than Welaregang.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member has repeated that statement many times, and it may be that he is right, taking the route of the present railway, which runs direct to Goulburn, then takes a direction right away west from the coast, from whence it comes round to Cootamundra. Following that line round the distance is perhaps further, but not if we take a direct line. Honorable members can measure the distance for themselves upon the map. In a direct line I do not think there is a difference of much more than a mile or two. If the railway communication were anything like direct, it would be found that Welaregang was much more accessible to Sydney than is Dalgety or Bombala. It is not to be supposed that, for all time, the railway will remain as it now exists. Surveys have been made taking off at various points along the line between Goulburn and Cooma, and also at points to Cootamundra; and though it might be an expensive railway, it is possible to make a line direct to Welaregang through Tumut. But, in the state of our finances, and at this early stage of the history of the Federal Capital, I do not think that it is necessary to construct a railway at great cost in the most direct way. It may be left for future decision as to what railways are to be constructed between the Capital Site and the various States of Australia. I will deal as rapidly as possible with the various suggested sites, though much of what I have to say will, no doubt, be a repetition of what I said on the previous occasion. The harbor at Eden or Twofold Bay is, I admit, a pretty little place, but it would take a large sum of money to make it practically useful for a number of ships.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—What was the honorable member's statement in the New South Wales Parliament as to the necessity for building a railway to Twofold Bay?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member has not quoted my statement.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I will quote it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I dare say the honorable member will quote something that was said in connexion with some project that I was dealing with at that particular time.

Mr. MAHON.—Perhaps there was logging going on.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No, there was not; but I think there was some idea of running a railway through to Melbourne.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member wanted to tap the Monaro country. He said it was magnificent country, with a good port.

Mr. REID.—And that it would hold all the navies in the world!

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Twofold Bay could be made, with a great deal of expense, a good harbor. But at the present time it is not a good extensive harbor for numbers of large ships. I say, advisedly, that one of the large ships that are now engaged in the Australian trade, such as the Peninsular and Oriental and Orient boats, and even the largest of our coastal vessels, would find great difficulty in getting shelter anywhere near the wharf in Twofold Bay. I do not believe that such a vessel could even get to the wharf. But I think there is a plan in existence showing how breakwaters could be built at a cost of something over £1,000,000, to make it a good harbor for a few large ships.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—For the coasting trade.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes. I totally dissent from those honorable members who advocate the Monaro site on account of the harbor. The world to-day is building its principal capital cities away from harbors or seaboard. Recent wars have proved that a Seat of Government should not be near a harbor where it can be easily attacked by an enemy. I do not see that there is any necessity or utility, for the sake of a harbor, to select a spot which is not nearly so good as some other places that have been suggested. When we had made the harbor, at a cost of about £1,200,000, we should have to construct a railway to climb country like the side of a house. The railway would have to run up 2,000 feet. The distance in a direct line is about fifty miles, but as the line would have to wind in and out, so as to obtain possible grades, the fifty miles would be extended to something like eighty-five. In addition to that, the Monaro tableland—referring especially to Bombala and the neighbourhood—is degrees colder than any other tableland in Australia. The reason why it is so cold is that the prevailing winds during the winter are westerly. Blizzards blow over the snow-capped mountains of Kosciusko and the Bogongs. The wind on the tableland is keen enough to destroy any man who is getting on in years, and who has come from a warmer climate. It is not a good place to which to send representatives from Queensland and Western Australia. In regard to the quality of the soil, there are little valleys here and there which contain good land, but taking the average, the Bombala country is poor. It is an unhealthy country so far as stock is concerned. A railway would have been built there long ago had it not been realized that the country was so poor. It was not a question of money that prevented New South Wales extending her railway system to the Monaro tableland. If the country had been as valuable as has been described, the line would have been constructed. It is not a difficult country through which to build a line from Sydney.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member as Premier of New South Wales introduced a motion favorable to the construction of the line.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am not sure whether I did, but certainly Parliament did not authorize the construction of the railway. I am now thinking of the time when the line was extended to Cooma. What was to prevent its being carried on to Bombala? The traffic about Cooma is so small they cannot afford to maintain a refreshment room at the railway station. I cannot understand anyone saying that country of that kind is suitable for a Federal Capital. There have been opportunities for the development of the country about Cooma within reasonable distance of the railway terminus, but it has not developed, and closer settlement has not prospered, simply because it could not take place to the advantage of the settler. The honorable member for Gippsland has spoken of the wheat crops of the neighbourhood. There is no wheat production of any consequence.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—What does the mill crush then? Sand?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The people there do not grow enough wheat to eat.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That is absurd.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is not; they import a large proportion of their flour, and they do not export to any extent. Indeed, I do not know that they export flour at all. Close to Bombala there are, no doubt, patches of black soil country, where almost anything will grow. But they are not extensive; and, taking the tableland as a whole, it is a very poor place for agricultural settlement. Coming to Dalgety, I admit that I have not seen the proposed site. It may be that some of the land in the neighbourhood is better than I have understood. But I have never known granite country in New South Wales to be first class. It is not good for stock. I will direct the attention of the Victorian representatives to some of the country on the Ballarat or the Bendigo line—I forget which. I went to look at it some time ago. It is granite country. I found that the stock and the sheep were unhealthy, and it was not heavy carrying. Granite country, as a rule, is poor. Dalgety may be a pretty site, and it is possible to get a good water supply from the Snowy River, which, of course, is fed by the snows of Mt. Kosciusko.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member admits that it is possible?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is possible, but I believe, although I have not seen it, that it would be necessary to go for a considerable distance up the river to get a sufficient fall for a gravitation scheme. I oppose a site on the coldest table-land, when there is no necessity to go there. To connect the table-land with Cooma and to continue the railway through Bombala to Melbourne, would be a gigantic undertaking, involving a huge expense. On the last occasion on which this question was discussed I produced the surveys, from the Survey Office of Victoria, of two proposed lines from Bairnsdale to Bombala. They are called four surveys, but in reality there are only two, with deviations. The grades of the first survey which was made were one in thirty. I believe that in New South Wales there is only one grade of that kind, and an effort is being made to get rid of it—it has always been a bugbear to the Southern Railway. On the Western Railway there was a grade of one in thirty, but the Railway Commissioners made a tunnel, at great expense, in order to get rid of the Penrith Zigzag. It was found from the surveys above referred to that the curves were from 5 to 8 inches radius, and every one knows that it is absolutely impossible to run a fast train on a line with such curves and grades. When I looked at the second survey I thought that an improvement had been made, but I found that it had grades of one in forty with better curves. It did not go, however, to Bombala, but to a place called Bondi, which is 1,000 feet below Bombala.

Mr. WATSON.—It did not climb the mountain at all.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No. It would be necessary to go from Bondi to Bombala, in about twenty-four miles I think, and rise to a height of 1,000 feet.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is a Bondi

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I know that. If the right honorable gentleman will look at the surveys, he will find that what I have stated is quite correct. I am not quite sure that, in order to reach that height in the distance, it would not be necessary to adopt a zigzag, as had to be done in New South Wales. But the expense would be enormous. I venture to think that before the railway connexion to Bairnsdale, Cooma, and Eden was completed, and a harbor made at Twofold Bay suitable for any large quantity of shipping, it would cost at the very least £6,000,000. That is a very great stumbling block, even if the other objections I have named did not exist.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Could we not have a chute down to Twofold Bay?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The wheat which is grown there could be put in a chute at the top of the mountain and shot down to Eden. That is about the only way in which it could be got down with ease and comfort. I have no doubt that Dalgety is a better place than Bombala for the reason that the water supply is better—probably it is good—and it is so much closer to the mountain that I believe that the excessively cold winds which strike on the table-land of Bombala would, to a large extent, blow over Dalgety, and lose their extreme cold and bitterness.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—But the land at Dalgety is very poor.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is poor everywhere, except in patches.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But the honorable member has not been there.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have never known any granite country which was much good.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is not all granite country.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am not saying much about Dalgety, because I have not been there, and I only know of it from hearsay. If there was a place other than those I have been strongly in favour of that I should have been inclined to vote for, had it been amongst those submitted, it would have been Lake George. I believe that it is next best to Tumut, and that for two reasons it would give greater satisfaction than almost any other site which has been suggested.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is second to Lyndhurst.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Lyndhurst is absolutely the worst site of all, as I shall point out presently. The reason why Lake George, to my mind, would be a good site, is that the land is fairly good for agriculture, and there is the possibility of making almost an inland sea. At a very small expense, I believe, the waters of the Murrumbidgee River could be turned into it, and a dam could be erected at the lower end, thus making an inland sea.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—How is the climate there?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—At times it is hot in the summer; but the climate is good. It also has this advantage, that by constructing a railway of about seventy miles, we could tap Jervis Bay, which, as a harbor, is, I believe, second only to Port Jackson. Lyndhurst is, I repeat, the worst site of all. There is nothing to recommend it to honorable members. The land is not very good. There are spots of basalt land, which are reasonably good, but, taken as a whole, the land is not good. And, despite what was said by the honorable member for Macquarie the other night, there is a grave difficulty about getting anything like a reasonably cheap or substantial water supply. That, in my opinion, is a first essential. I do not take the view, as some honorable members do, that we should not go west because it would be near Sydney, or because the trade would go through Sydney. I believe that if this House had the opportunity, and the room-limits did not exist, Sydney would be selected, even now. Therefore, I do not think that there is much argument in the fact that the western district is close to Sydney. But the Lyndhurst site is not good. If a site is to be selected in the west, let it be about Orange or Bathurst, or perhaps between Orange and Wellington, where good land and a better water supply could be got than at Lyndhurst. But of all the places in the west—and I know the west as well as most honorable members do—Lyndhurst is the worst site, and it would not have been heard of but for the efforts of my friend, Mr. Biddulph, who, to his credit be it said, in the interests of the district, has fought very long and very hard to try to prove, not that water will run uphill, but that water exists where it does not. The credit is due to him for having brought this spot so prominently forward, and kept it in evidence so long. But if honorable members are determined to go west, certainly let them go to Orange, or between Orange and Wellington, where they could find a site which would be worthy of the location of the Federal Capital.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member said that Lyndhurst was the best site of all.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I beg the honorable member's pardon, I did not.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable member said in the Sydney Daily Telegraph that he would rather have Lyndhurst than any other site in New South Wales.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think the Daily Telegraph stated that; but if it did, it only keeps up its reputation of scarcely ever telling the truth about me.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member would not have been Premier of New South Wales if it had not been for that newspaper.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have repeatedly said that at Orange a suitable site could be found.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member said in this House that the western site was the best.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not Lyndhurst. I am repeating what I have said before.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Let it pass. The honorable member has had fifteen sites suggested in his own district.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And each one of them is a better site than Bombala. I do not know what is likely to happen in regard to the western site, but if that area be selected, I should do my level best to prevent the Federal Capital being located at Lyndhurst. I should like to see some other spot chosen.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the honorable member support the selection of Orange?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If the western area were selected, I should support Orange a long way before Lyndhurst.

Mr. FULLER.—Is the honorable member going to vote for Tooma?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member will know when I sit down. I wish to say a few words in indorsement of what has been said regarding the railway connexion. I desire to be fair, and trust that, on an important question of this kind, honorable members will at least give me the credit—though I have beautiful sites in my own electorate—of voting for the site I conceive to be the best, irrespective of whose electorate it is in. If the leader of the Opposition and those who are supporting a western site had not opposed my project to extend the railway from Cobar to Wilcannia, and thence to Broken Hill, and from Wellington to Werris Creek, those lines would have been in existence to-day.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—They must come.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member knows better than that.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think I know as much about the policy of railway construction for New South Wales as the honorable member does.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think I know more about that particular railway than the honorable member does.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Of course the honorable member knows everything, and he does not credit any one else with knowing anything. I brought the project twice before the Public Works Committee, and tried to get it sanctioned by the State Parliament. Had it not been for the opposition I received from honorable members who sat on the left hand of the Speaker, and who are now saying so much in favour of a western district site, those railways would have been constructed as I desired, and there would have been very little doubt now as to the minds of the majority of honorable members.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member never wished to construct it, or else it would have been done.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member forgets, I suppose, that when the river was “up,” I took the responsibility of ordering sleepers and rails to Wilcannia, with a view to commence the construction of a railway from Cobar to Wilcannia, and a railway from Wilcannia to Broken Hill simultaneously. I do not know whether the honorable member was one of those who opposed me, but the Opposition at that time fought me to that extent that I could not carry out my plans.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the honorable member think that these railways will be built?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member is younger than I am; but I think I shall live to see them built. I suggested—and a plan of the route is now lying in my private safe in Sydney—that this railway, if constructed, would be a connecting link with Albany.

Mr. KELLY.—Is not that a very strong argument in favour of Lyndhurst?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Only on the strength of communication. I am pointing out that those honorable members who are now so anxious to prove that this railway construction would do good to Lyndhurst opposed my proposal, and practically prevented me from carrying it out.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They did not.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member may be of that opinion, but the records show otherwise.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—On what date was that?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It was done on three occasions—once when I ordered sleepers and rails to Wilcannia, and twice when I brought the matter before Parliament, a proposal to build a line from Werris Creek to the western line, and a line from Cobar to Broken Hill, via Wilcannia. I do not think it can be proved that a good water supply could be obtained for a large population at Lyndhurst without incurring a great expense and risk. If an eastern site be preferred by honorable members, do not go to Lyndhurst, but go to some other place. Now, let me deal with the last site to which reference has been made, the Welaregang site. I have given my reasons why that site was not brought forward when the honorable member for Grampians desired that it should be, and it is useless to repeat them; but of all the sites there is none to compare with it, either for picturesqueness, extent of good soil, facilities for building, or water supply. Before dealing with it, I wish to say in regard to the Tumut site that if there were any chance of it being selected—and I still have the lingering hope that it may be chosen before the matter is finally settled—

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Now the cat is out of the bag!

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The vacant laughter of honorable members does not prove anything. Despite what has been said to the contrary, the water supply available at Tumut comes next after that available at the Upper Murray site. The river there is snow fed, and it was proved by the Commissioners that the largest, purest, and cheapest water supply available at any of the sites investigated is that at the Tumut site.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It cannot be the largest supply available. It cannot be so large as the supply available at Dalgety.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I will not speak authoritatively; but my opinion is that the Commissioners reported that it is the largest, the purest, and the most continuous supply obtainable. Only a short time has been available for the examination of the Upper Murray site; but I appeal to those who have seen it, a few of whom may intend, for various reasons, to vote for other sites, to say whether it does not stand out prominently as that which should be chosen. I do not say that it is a site which is favoured by the people of Sydney; but it is favoured by a large section of those who live in the southern and south-western districts, and possibly, in the western district of New South Wales. A great many of the people of Sydney are opposed to the selection of the Upper Murray site, not because it is not a beautiful spot, unequalled for its scenery, and the extent of its good land, but because it is too near to Melbourne. If there were a similar site at Cootamundra, at Yass, or in some other part of that district, it would be chosen by them at once; there would not be two opinions held in regard to it. I think honorable members who have visited it are unanimous in stating that it is the finest site that has yet been seen. We are considering the selection of a site for the Seat of Government for all time. The growth of the Federal Capital will not be very much within our lives. But if we are to choose a site which 100 years hence will reflect credit upon us, we must ignore local jealousies, which will have died out long before that time comes. I am afraid, however, that a number of honorable members, in dealing with this question, are influenced by the local jealousies, instead of looking to the future.

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member is the strongest evidence of the truth of his statement.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not admit that I am. Mr. Surveyor Chesterman, who has known this district perhaps longer than any other surveyor in New South Wales, is an exceptionally cautious man. He resided in the Upper Murray district for four or five years, and in his report refers to the beauty of the place, and to its excellent water supply. He says that about twelve miles from the site, and at a height of between 2,000 and 3,000 feet, water could be turned on to the Federal city from the Tooma River without the need for conservation works, until a supply for perhaps over 100,000 people was required. But, besides the Tooma River, which is snow-fed from one side of Mount Kosciusko, there are other streams from which water could be obtained. One of these is the Pound Creek, whose waters command the site by an elevation of nearly 2,500 feet, and the Mannus Creek, which is always running. The only creek where water could not be used for a town supply, though there is plenty of it, is the Tumberumba Creek. I have been told that the honorable member for North Sydney is in possession of a letter in which it is stated that there is no pure water in the Upper Murray, because the dredging operations in the higher parts of the river have covered the flats with debris, and destroyed the purity of the stream.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I quoted a report, not a letter.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have been told that there is in existence a letter containing the statement to which I refer. If there be such a letter, let it be produced. The waters of the Tumberumba Creek are thick with sludge, but that is the only water-course there which has been polluted by mining operations. The Tumberumba Creek joins the Tooma River about eight or ten miles below the offtake of the water supply, and below the watershed of that river and the creeks which flow into it. The statement only shows the length to which persons will go to detract from the strong points of a site to whose selection they are opposed. There is no purer water in Australia than the water of these creeks. Except for a few months in Autumn, when the snow does not lie, and they are supplied with rain water, they are snow-fed. I do not think it redounds to the credit of certain honorable members that they tried to prevent further information being obtained in regard to this site. The House should be given all the information that can be procured. The delay of a month, or of six months, or of a year, or of several years is of no consequence while information is lacking in regard to such an important question as this. I have in my possession a telegram which arrived to-day from the surveyor who has been sent to examine the site. I wished to ascertain the height of the spot where the two main heads of the Murray junction, and the surveyor telegraphs—Approximate height Swampy Plain River, where river enters gorge 1,340 feet. Present discharge here approximately 440 cubic feet per second.

That is about 26,000 cubic feet per minute. The river is in its normal condition.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—What is the height of the take-off?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The spot referred to is not the position of the take-off, but a place about the Murray Gates, where there is a junction of two streams.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—What is the height of the proposed site?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It ranges from 1,000 to 1,600 feet.

Mr. KELLY.—Is it 1,600 feet high at a distance of fourteen miles from the river?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is 1,600 feet three or four miles from the river. It is much higher at the spot referred to by the honorable member. There are parts within the site itself which have an elevation of as much as 1,600 feet.

Mr. CROUCH.—Then, it is really on the top of a mountain?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No; it is at the bottom of the mountain. From the Murray the land rises between 300 and 400 feet in about two miles. From that point onward one traverses an undulating table-land.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Is Mr. Surveyor Chesterman correct in saying that the proposed site is three miles from the river?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It commences between two and three miles from the river. Welaregang homestead is about two miles from the river. It is about two miles in a direct line from Tintaldra township to Welaregang, and there is a rise of between 200 and 300 feet in that distance. Then one comes to an undulating plateau, seven or eight miles in extent from its commencement to the further side where the hills rise higher, and seven or eight miles across.

Mr. SKENE.—About forty-nine square miles altogether.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is the area available for city building sites. The telegram from which I am quoting continues—

Exact gauging impossible without proper appliances. Approximate height at junction of Swampy Plain and Indi rivers, near Bringenbrong ford, is 930 feet. Between here and Murray Gates most of fall is at upper end.

Mr. SKENE.—What does that mean?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Proceeding towards the Murray Gates the country is pretty level for about half the distance, and then begins to rise rapidly; but the average rise from the ford to the Murray Gates is about thirty feet per mile. In that short distance there is a rise to 1,340 feet, and I think that another four or five miles gives a rise to between 1,700 and 1,800 feet. That is a sufficient height to enable the whole of the Murray waters to be diverted to any portion of the Capital Site. Moreover, the stream is pure and fresh, unpolluted by sludge. It is necessarily of immense volume, being the head water of the greatest river in Australia. If those who are disposed to be sceptical will peruse the report of the New South Wales Water Commission of 1883 or 1884, they will find that a scheme is there propounded for impounding the waters of the Murray somewhere about this point, and for carrying them by means of canals down to Urana, Jerilderie, and Yanko Creeks, and other places. If it be possible to do that, how much easier would it be to divert, not only from the Tooma River, but also from the Murray, a sufficient quantity of water to irrigate land and supply an immense city, without spending a single shilling, except for pipes? I trust that these facts will convince honorable members that an ample supply of water is obtainable upon the Upper Murray. I do not know that there is any necessity for me to say much more, except in regard to railway communication. As far as Tumut is concerned, that town already possesses railway communication, via Cootamundra, and I claim that a line could easily be constructed from the Gadara Gap, about ten miles from Tumut, via the Gilmore and another creek, and the Batlow Gap to Welaregang, at a very reasonable cost.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There is a rise of 1,000 feet between Tumut and Batlow.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—But Tumut is a long way below the top of the Gadara Gap, to which the railway now extends. No difficulty would be experienced in constructing a railway from the top of that gap to the head of the Gilmore Creek on the saddle between Tumberumba Creek and the head waters of the Murrumbidgee. There would be no trouble encountered in constructing such a line, except over about four miles of country along the Mannus Creek, where a deviation would be rendered necessary. Mr. Chesterman, who spent some time in examining this country, declares that it would be possible to build such a railway without incurring any extraordinary outlay.

Mr. CONROY. — Does the honorable member say that it could be constructed without involving any extraordinary expenditure?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes. It could be built at a cost of from £4,000 to £5,000 per mile.

Mr. CONROY.—In my opinion such a work would cost from £10,000 to £12,000 per mile.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think that the honorable and learned member has examined the country.

Mr. CONROY.—It is quite true that there may be a gap of the existence of which I have no knowledge.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There is such a gap. Mr. Chesterman has carefully examined the route, and, except over some four miles of country in the vicinity of Mannus Creek, he estimates that a railway could easily be constructed with easy grades and good curves. He does not commit himself to the exact cost of such an undertaking, but in his report he declares that the country is of a character that will permit of a railway being constructed.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—He throws some doubt upon it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—From Gadara he describes how to get to the Batlow Gap, and from there to the Tumberumba Creek. The top of the Batlow Gap is from 2,000 feet to 3,000 feet above sea level. Along the mountains, between Tumut and Adelong, there is only one difficult place, at which a tunnel would require to be made—

Mr. CONROY.—I do not think there is any gap under 3,000 feet high.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Oh, yes. The Batlow Gap is only a few feet higher than the site of that name. Then a survey has been made of a railway from Tallangatta to Tintaldra. I admit that such an undertaking would be expensive. It would cost about £9,000 per mile. Another survey has been made from Huon's Lane right up to the Victorian side of the Upper Murray site. The cost of constructing that line was estimated at £8,500 per mile, but the engineers responsible for its survey affirm that at the time they framed their estimate, the price of material was extremely high, and that the work could now be carried out for very much less.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—For 25 per cent. less.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Did the honorable member tell his colleagues of this beautiful site?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In detail, I do not suppose that I did, but I stated my opinion in this House.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member for Eden-Monaro seems to have been quite ignorant of it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member for Eden-Monaro is so enthusiastic in his advocacy of the claims of a particular site that it is useless to talk to him about the qualifications of any other. The most magnificent site in the world would not be equal to that of Bombala in his judgment. I repeat that Tooma possesses every essential to a Capital Site. It is not out of the world. I join issue with the leader of the Opposition when he declares that we do not want a beautiful site for a Federal Capital, and that we should go to the bed-rock of commerce. He affirmed that it did not matter whether a site was ugly or not.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He never said anything of the sort.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have described from memory as well as I can the methods by which this country could be opened up. I also think that if the Victorian Premier were alive to the situation he would obtain a survey of a railway from Beechworth to the Upper Murray. No doubt it would be a troublesome line to construct, but it would constitute the most direct route from Melbourne. In addition to that, the present railway from Culcairn to Germanton was intended to be the base of a line which was designed to run right into this particular site. The country has been examined and reported upon, and a flying survey has been made of a line to the top of the Yarra Gap, which is the highest point to be crossed in getting to the Upper Murray site. That line was designed and the base of it constructed before there was any prospect of Tooma being chosen as the Federal Capital Site. Why was a portion of it constructed? For the purpose of developing a country which had been too long reserved for fattening cattle and carrying sheep, because the settlers could not get their produce to market for lack of railway communication. In that country 100 acres would make an admirable farm for any family. If it were irrigated—especially the flats and the higher lands—as they easily could be, fifty acres would prove a fortune to any family. The intention is to carry a line of railway over the Yarra Gap, down the Jingellic Creek to the river, and then across the Victorian border.

whence it could be constructed on the Victorian side over flat country, to right opposite the Welaregang site.

Mr. CONROY.—I thought that it would run up to Tumberumba?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No. There is another matter to which I must refer before concluding my remarks. It has reference to my late colleague, the right honorable member for Swan. My experience has been that no Minister failed to listen to any representations that were made to him by a colleague. When the right honorable member for Swan visited Bombala, Dalgety, Tumut, and Tumberumba, I wired to him—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—To whom did the honorable member wire?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I wired either to the right honorable member or to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, the then Prime Minister. At any rate, the right honorable member for Swan saw the telegram, which urged them to visit the Welaregang site before returning to Melbourne. I was even denied the courtesy of being informed as to the date when they would be in the Tumut district, my electorate. It was only from outside sources that I obtained that information. I pressed them to examine this particular site, but for some unaccountable reason they did not visit it. Had they done so, I feel sure that they would have had their eyes opened like the proverbial kittens.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Where did the honorable member send the telegram?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I sent one wire to Tumut and another to Tumberumba. I felt very much annoyed at the attitude which was assumed towards me in connexion with this matter.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I wonder that the honorable member did not resign.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No doubt the honorable member for Macquarie, with his high-spirited temperament, would have resigned upon any small matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member did not send a telegram to me.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I telegraphed to the then Prime Minister, who was with the right honorable member, and I think also to the right honorable member.

Mr. PAGE.—Perhaps the honorable member for Eden-Monaro obtained possession of the telegram.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That interjection reminds me of a little story which I must tell the Committee. A number of honorable members recently accompanied me on a visit of inspection to the Upper Murray site, and when we had journeyed some distance I was told that one of the drivers of the conveyances, by which we were travelling, was speaking most disparagingly of the Upper Murray, Tooma, and other sites in the district. When I asked the man what he knew about the district, he replied, "Well, I know that it is not a very good place in which to hump your swag, or to lie under a wire fence at night." To this I rejoined, "But who are you?" "Oh!" he replied, "I am a cousin of Mr. Chapman's."

Mr. CARPENTER.—That is true.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes; the honorable member heard the remark. When I made this discovery I began to think that there was some deep-laid scheme to endeavour to influence members of the party against the sites in the Tumut district.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member for Eden-Monaro says that he has no cousin in that district.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Then he had better communicate with the police, because that was the statement made by this man.

Mr. CARPENTER.—And he said that he was not ashamed of it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is so. As an instance of the longevity of residents, I would inform the Committee that I received this evening a telegram stating that an old lady, who had lived in the district for fifty years, died yesterday at the age of 102, and that her husband died twelve years ago at the age of 103. If the right honorable member for Swan wishes to see a site selected in which we shall be able to build up a race of fine, stalwart men—a people who will practically live for ever, as he no doubt would like to do—this is the district which he should favour.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Were the couple referred to the first persons to be buried in the district?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not know; but one does not see many graves in that part of the country. I saw only one. The selection of Tumut would be free from the objections attaching to the choosing of many other sites, because it is midway between Melbourne and Sydney. I advocated its selection before, and do so now. If we are to make such a selection that no sting so far as local considerations are concerned will attach to it, too much cannot be said in support of that site. But if honorable members object to vote for it, we have a right to select Welaregang, which is fifty miles nearer the centre of New South Wales than is either Bombala or Dalgety. It is all very well to say that Dalgety is only twenty miles distant from a railway, but if the productiveness of the soil there were as great as has been described—if the land were as good and the climate as suitable for the growth of various crops as are the soil and climate of Tooma—its development would have been so great that instead of having, as at present, only a few farms, it would be literally studded with them.

Mr. CONROY.—How is it that the Upper Murray district is not studded with farms?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It would be if it were within twenty-five miles of a railway line, but as a matter of fact it is seventy-five miles from one.

Mr. CONROY.—What about Bombala?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Cooma country is very much like that of Bombala, and, if the land were good, it would be leased or sold in farm lots; but that is not the case.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—We have towns in the Southern Monaro district, but there are only sleepy hollows in the district which the honorable member favours.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If the honorable member had been with us on the occasion of our recent visit, and had dared to speak of Tooma as a sleepy hollow after our experience on the first night of our sojourn in the district, he would have been ducked in the river. At one small place we saw a dozen young men, not one of whom was over twenty-four or twenty-five years of age.

Mr. McLEAN.—The old people had all died off, I presume?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No; as I have already shown, the residents of the district live to a ripe old age; but not one of these young men was under six feet, and they were all fine, well set up, stalwart fellows.

Mr. McLEAN.—If the honorable member goes to Bombala he will find that the residents live until they are eighty or ninety years of age.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I thought that the honorable member was going to say that I would find that they were eighty or ninety feet high. I remember meeting a young man who came from a place right under Mount Kosciusko, who was 6 feet 10 inches in height. I do not wish to unduly detain the Committee, and should not have spoken at such great length but that I felt that I was called upon to make a full statement of the claims of the district which I favour. I am disappointed to learn that some honorable members who voted last session for Tumut are now, for no visible reason, turning against their first love. If they refuse to vote for Tumut, then I would point out that, although Welaregang is on the Victorian border, the fact that it is so situated will be forgotten before we are very much older, and that there is no site that can in any degree compare with it.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—It is greatly to be regretted that the consideration of so important a matter as this has proceeded upon personal, rather than upon national, grounds. Three honorable members have, so to speak, eligible sites to dispose of to the Committee, and each one appears to have made it a point to voice the claims of the particular site which he favours as against those of any other district. That is a most unfortunate position for such members of the Committee as may perhaps be unacquainted with the country in which the several sites are situated. So far as I am concerned, I may say that, in dealing with this question, I am absolutely free from all personal or provincial bias. It is immaterial to me whether the site selected be in the west, the south, or the south-eastern district; with me the main consideration is that we shall select the best site within the area to which we are limited. Unfortunately, as I have already pointed out, the 100-miles limit provided for by the Constitution has excluded from selection what, in my opinion, are the best sites, which would otherwise have been available for inspection, and from which perhaps a selection would have been made. We are, therefore, reduced to the necessity of selecting one of the less eligible sites which are offering in other parts of the State, and under these conditions it seems to me that we should put aside all considerations as to whether a site is in a district represented by one honorable member or in that represented by another. We should deal with the question from a broad national stand-point, and determine which is really the best site to select in the interests of the Commonwealth. It is in that spirit that I have approached this question, and have given it consideration. I happen to know the various localities in which the sites under discussion are situated. The climatic conditions of the Southern Monaro district form the basis of one of my objections to it. I have passed over that part of the country. I have on several occasions made a trip from Bega to Dalgety, thence to Bombala, and, via Nimitybelle, to Cooma. On one memorable occasion in mid-summer—when a great heat wave passed over Sydney, and the temperature recorded in that city was about 106 degrees in the shade—I was almost frozen whilst travelling by coach over the ranges in the Southern Monaro district.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I should think so.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Such were the climatic conditions that, although this was about Christmas time—midsummer—I and a number of others who were travelling outside the coach, were so frozen after travelling all night that on reaching Nimitybelle at 6 a.m. we were very glad to avail ourselves of a huge log fire which was burning at the hotel at which we stayed, and to literally thaw while breakfast was being prepared. I do not say that that was a normal experience. It may be that the weather was exceptionally cold for that time of the year; but it struck me that as it was so cold in midsummer, I should not particularly care to pass the winter there. That the cold was so intense there, even in mid-summer, may perhaps be a recommendation to those who favour a frigid climate. On another occasion I spent a summer in the Tumut district, and can only say that I never desire to do so again. For the greater part of the time the temperature was 90 degrees, even after sundown, and it was difficult to obtain anything like rest, either by night or by day.

Mr. WATSON.—Why not have gone to Batlow, where there is an elevation of 1,500 feet?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have been to Batlow as well as to Welaregang; I am familiar with the whole of that part of the country, and I know that Welaregang is more open. Tumut is completely surrounded by hills, and there in the summer time one lives in an atmosphere of steam. That is my objection to the Tumut site. If Welaregang were more accessible, I should be strongly inclined to favour it, at any rate from an artistic stand-point. There is no doubt that it boasts of a fine stretch of country and a magnificent backing for a Federal city. I am not so confident, however, about the abundance of its water supply as some honorable members seem to be. It must be remembered, of course, that the reports which we are now receiving may not, perhaps, give us a fair indication of what the water supply always is in the several districts. Let us, for instance, take the case of Lyndhurst. We have ample evidence from the Chief Engineer of Water Conservation in New South Wales, Mr. Wade, that the Lyndhurst district possesses a splendid water supply, and yet we have the statement of the right honorable member for Swan that when he visited it the creeks were dry. He inspected the district, however, after a period of prolonged drought, and I do not know what was the water supply in the Welaregang district under those conditions. It was not visited by honorable members immediately after a prolonged season of drought, but after more favorable weather conditions had been prevailing. The honorable member for Eden-Monaro referred to the temperature of Lyndhurst as having been on one occasion 98 degrees in the shade. I understand that that is the highest reading on record there. A higher reading has been recorded in Sydney. There the temperature frequently rises in mid-summer to 95 and 98 degrees, and it rose on the memorable occasion to which I have just referred to 106 degrees in the shade. There is an important difference between the climatic conditions existing under these temperatures in the two districts. A temperature of 90 degrees in the shade in Sydney would, perhaps, be more oppressive on account of the greater amount of humidity in the atmosphere than a temperature of 95 or even 98 degrees at Lyndhurst, where the atmosphere is very much drier. It is probable that Lyndhurst, with a temperature of 98 degrees, would not be so enervating as Sydney, with a temperature of 90 degrees or 92 degrees. The honorable member for Hume has several times emphasized his preference for Orange as a western site, and particularly as regards the facilities there afforded for a water supply. I have to confess that what troubled me most on visiting Lyndhurst was the water supply. There were so many conflicting reports upon the matter that I determined to write to a person whom I knew to be well acquainted with the district, and who happens to be a surveyor and civil engineer. I asked him to give me his private opinion, and the fullest information he could supply on the matter. Owing to the position which he occupies I am not at liberty to disclose his name, but I submit his opinion to honorable members for what, in their opinion, it may be worth. This gentleman is a professional expert, and I am personally confident that I can trust his judgment and his impartiality. He says in his letter to me—

If all the gravitation supplies around Lyndhurst are considered, water for 150,000 persons will be available, but of this all would not be used for actual drinking purposes unless filtered. I refer to one source, the Belubula River. I contend that this river could be dammed back eleven miles with a 110 feet breast, and that a lake seven miles long would result from a 100 feet breast. This could be conducted one and a half miles, and let drop a sheer fall of 400 feet, and then again, after creating horse-power, conveyed for six miles into the proposed artificial lake at Mandurama. The same thing could be done with regard to Coombing Creek. In Coombing Creek there is a supply for 40,000. In the Belubula for 60,000 or 70,000. But, apart from these, a supply from Brown's Creek (granite drift country) would do for years for drinking purposes. Then there are Cadia, Flyers, Fciltimber, Mandurama, Ponds Creeks, and a large pumping supply can be had from Hell's Hole, west of Carcoar, on the Belubula—but the Abercrombie and Fish Rivers would, of course, give an additional pumping supply of unlimited quantities.

That report, taken in conjunction with Mr. Wade's report, sets at rest all doubt that there was in my mind as to the adequacy of the water supply to be obtained at Lyndhurst. With regard to Orange, which is so favoured by the honorable member for Hume, it was pointed out by the late Mr. Alexander Oliver that it is a suitable site, and yet it has a considerably greater altitude than Lyndhurst, and its catchment area is not one twenty-fifth of that of the Lyndhurst site for gravitation purposes. If Orange is a suitable site, then, viewed from the stand-point of the water supply alone, Lyndhurst must be a 25 per cent. better site. The honorable member for Hume has expressed doubts as to building material being available in the vicinity of Lyndhurst; but I find that there is an abundance of building material available in the district, whilst at Lithgow, not very far away, iron can be had, and pottery cement. I find that in the neighbourhood of Lyndhurst, if the reports of experts are to be relied on, there is to be found slate, freestone, marble, granite, trachite, porphyry, and basalt. When the honorable member for Hume was a Minister in New South Wales he received a deputation from marble masons, who asked him to give a preference to the local over the imported marble, in order to encourage the working of local deposits. Special reference was made to the marble found in the neighbourhood of Lyndhurst, and the honorable gentleman then expressed the opinion, after an examination of this marble, that it was in every way equal, if not superior, to the marble imported from Carrara. Although the honorable gentleman has here expressed a doubt as to whether there is any stone suitable for building purposes in the Lyndhurst district, we have his own words to prove that he was previously aware of the fact that such stone did exist in the district. I do not regard Lyndhurst as an ideal Capital Site. I do not think it is an ideal site; but it is, in my judgment, the best of the three sites available. In my opinion, its great recommendation is its accessibility.

MR. POYNTON.—Has the honorable member seen the Eden-Monaro district?

MR. JOHNSON.—Yes, I know that district well. The honorable member must have been asleep surely, or he must have known that I related some of my experiences in that district but a few minutes since. It must not be forgotten that if a selection of a site is made in the Eden-Monaro district thirty-one miles of railway will have to be built in New South Wales through a country that is not particularly good for railway construction, as many engineering difficulties would have to be surmounted, and there would also require to be constructed 183 miles of railway to connect with Bairnsdale, on the Victorian side; that is to say, 214 miles of railway construction would be involved if the selection were made in that district. I am not sure that even a survey has been made for a railway to the site suggested at Welaregang; but reference has been made to the fact that a railway has already been extended in that direction as far as Germanton. That line is not a paying line at the present time, and it must be remembered that it was constructed against the advice of the Railway Commissioners. There is a question of considerable cost involved, and the honorable and learned member for Werriwa has roughly estimated that it would take something like from £10,000 to £12,000 per mile to construct a railway there. In the case of Lyndhurst, we could have fifty different sites selected, all equally eligible, and all on the railway line itself. I may add that population is trending in that direction, and that the Western site must soon become the centre of the population of New South Wales. It has a further advantage in the fact that it is on a loop line now connecting the Southern and Western lines of railway; in a short time it will be in direct communication with the Northern line by means of a line from Wellington to Werris Creek, or Dubbo to Werris Creek. When that line is completed, a person will be able to go directly from the farthest point north, to which railway communication extends in Queensland, right away to Adelaide or Broken Hill, without ever going near Sydney. Lyndhurst then is on a line which, when the Werris Creek connexion is completed, will unite the three main trunk lines of the Commonwealth, and I submit that that is a most important feature in considering the selection of a site for the Federal Capital. A great deal had been made by some honorable members, and particularly by the honorable member for Gippsland, of the alleged great advantages of Twofold Bay as a shipping port.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—A breakwater could be built there for £150,000.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I desire to point out that the port itself is not sufficiently capacious to justify the construction of a breakwater there at any cost. It is so very small that I do not know why it should be dignified with the name of a port in the sense of immensity which has been conveyed by the speech of the honorable member for Gippsland. I say that without any disparagement of the Southern Monaro sites. Honorable members who may be induced to vote for a Southern Monaro site on the ground that the Federal territory would include a port should not be misled. I have visited Twofold Bay many times; I am perfectly familiar with the port, and I know what I am speaking about. I say that it cannot possibly be regarded seriously as a port at all, because it is to all intents and purposes little better than an open roadstead, with just a little point of land jutting out, and affording sufficient protection for a wharf, at which two small steamers can be berthed. Beyond that there is no port accommodation at the place. There is certainly an area of water deep enough to afford safe anchorage in the southern and north-western bights for vessels of no great tonnage, but so far as the rest of the port itself is concerned, it is absolutely exposed to every wind from the Pacific. A breakwater at this place would, in my opinion, be absolutely useless as a protection. It would be of no more value than was the breakwater which was recently washed away at Byron Bay, and upon which so many thousands of pounds were absolutely thrown away. If a breakwater could be successfully built at Twofold Bay, the port would not be good enough as a refuge for vessels of large draught; nor could it be made a port of any size for shipping such as one might expect would be required for the trade of a port connected with so important a place as the Federal Capital.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Boyd's attempt to make Twofold Bay a port was one of the greatest failures in Australian settlement.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Unquestionably, because there are no facilities for a port there. None of the large new steamers from, say, Western Australia could go into Twofold Bay and berth alongside the wharf at Eden; the most they could do would be to anchor and tranship passengers and cargo into smaller boats. Honorable members who have had the experience of an eastern swell there, and of transhipping under such conditions, will not want to repeat it.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I suppose the honorable member knows that all the authorities say quite to the contrary?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am speaking from my own personal knowledge.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does the honorable member place his observation above that of the authorities?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am speaking from my own experience; I do not care what the authorities say. Twofold Bay is only about the size of one of the coves in Sydney Harbor.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There are forty acres of Twofold Bay.

Mr. JOHNSON.—So there are at Neutral Bay; but the latter is only a small portion of Sydney Harbor.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Twofold Bay is only a tortuous channel.

Mr. JOHNSON.—There are only two and a half miles in the bay, including the shallow water. The depth of water a little distance beyond the end of the wharf is about five fathoms, but in the open and exposed area as much as twelve fathoms. I admit, can be obtained. But no sensible mariner would dream of attempting to ride out an easterly gale in such an exposed position. If, however, honorable members desire a site in that neighbourhood, there is a splendid stretch of virgin country, all practically Crown land, at the back of Jervis Bay, which is a well sheltered harbor.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The difficulty there is the water supply.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I dare say some trouble might be experienced on that score.

Mr. CONROY.—Is the honorable member speaking of the Lake George site?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am speaking of a stretch of country between Lake George and Jervis Bay. Lake George is about seventy miles from Jervis Bay, in a direct line.

Mr. CONROY.—Jervis Bay is the only good port, with the exception of Port Jackson, from Rockhampton to Adelaide.

Mr. JOHNSON. — Unquestionably. Since we are not to have a Capital Site at a fortified place or a naval station, it would be unwise to select a territory with a port. Such a situation would involve a tremendous amount of expense on fortifications, and in the maintenance of a naval station, and, in addition, we should be open to attack, especially in the case of Twofold Bay. In the latter case, an enemy's ship would not need to come near the bay, but might remain five or six miles distant, and from there reduce the place to ashes in no time, in the same way as Alexandria was bombarded by the British some years ago. Honorable members have, in my opinion, laid too much stress on Twofold Bay as an ideal port for the Federal Capital. Unless they have taken the trouble to visit the place I am sure they will in the future be very much disappointed at the character of the port the advantage of which they urge as one of the main reasons for the selection of this site. It would be much better if, in their advocacy of the Southern Monaro sites, they were to altogether eliminate all calculations as to a port, which may be at once said to be absolutely impracticable. I cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that, from every point of view, Lyndhurst is the best site of those under discussion, and that is the site for which I shall vote.

Mr. HUTCHISON (Hindmarsh).—Although I should like to see this question expeditiously settled, I do not feel inclined, on so important a matter, to give a silent vote. If I were to consult my own convenience, and that of South Australian members generally, I should not be anxious to have the question settled for a long time to come. It is convenient to South Australian members to be able to visit their homes at the end of each week; but I recognise that a bond, which ought to be carried out, was entered into with New South Wales. It is nothing to me in what part of New South Wales the Federal Territory is situated, further than that I desire to see the site selected which will be most advantageous from every point of view.

It stands to reason that wherever the Federal Capital may be located in New South Wales, the parliamentary representatives from Western Australia, Queensland, and South Australia will have to make their homes there during the session; they will not be able to visit their respective States each week as at present. Under the circumstances all the talk about short cuts to this place and the other does not influence me. It does not matter to me whether the Federal Capital be 100 miles, 200 miles, or even 300 miles east, west, north, or south, so long as we select the best position. But to-day I heard the honorable member for Parramatta speak of an attempt on the part of honorable members to break the agreement entered into with New South Wales. So far as the majority of representatives from the different States are concerned, there is not, in my opinion, any such desire or attempt. I do find, however, that there is a desire and an attempt on the part of the representatives of New South Wales to dictate to this Parliament, not only where the territory shall be, but what its limits shall be; and this in spite of the fact that it is clearly laid down in the Constitution that the Commonwealth Parliament is to select territory, and to determine its area. At any rate, I am prepared to carry out the bargain, and I hope that New South Wales will act towards the Commonwealth in the same generous manner that the electors of the Commonwealth have acted towards that State.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—On the argument of the honorable member, is there anything to prevent the Commonwealth taking the whole of New South Wales?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I want to take only what is proposed by the Government—the small slice of 900 square miles out of an enormous territory.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member is too generous!

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We have been too generous to New South Wales. There was so little Federal spirit amongst many of the people of that State that they had to be treated like spoiled children, and offered a gift to induce them to enter the Federation.

Mr. REID.—New South Wales took South Australian wheat for fifty years without placing any duty on it.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The right honorable member would not have continued such a policy if he had not thought that New South Wales reaped the greatest benefit. Why should not South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania have concessions in the same way as New South Wales and Western Australia? However, we are ready to carry out the bargain; and if New South Wales is not prepared to fulfil her part, then this House will be compelled to do the next best thing. To induce New South Wales to enter the Federation, this Parliament was deprived of its undoubted right to select the Federal Capital in any part of the Commonwealth considered most suitable. But while I do not grumble about the concessions offered to New South Wales and Western Australia, I must take exception to the attitude assumed by the Premier and the Attorney-General of New South Wales, who, in spite of the clear provisions of the Constitution, desire not only to dictate the extent, but the situation of the territory. I refuse to be a party to tolerating that kind of thing.

Mr. BROWN.—The Premier and the Attorney-General of New South Wales were asked to do that by the late Prime Minister.

Mr. REID.—And more than once.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—They have not been asked to do it by this Parliament, which was elected to carry out the Constitution in letter and spirit.

Mr. REID.—This Parliament cannot communicate with the New South Wales Government; only the Commonwealth Government can do that.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Why should we communicate with the New South Wales Government further than to point out the decision of the Federal Parliament as to the situation and area? New South Wales will reap all the advantage of having the Federal Territory within her border; at any rate, if the right honorable member for East Sydney had not thought there was an advantage the bargain as to the Federal Capital would never have been made. Whether that bargain be wise or unwise, it has been made, and we must stand by it; and the right honorable gentleman who had much to do with it ought to see that his State performs its share.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member think that a site on the Upper Murray would give any advantage to New South Wales?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I wish honorable members had taken the trouble to inspect all the sites. I do not profess to be an expert, but I like to make my own observations, and then obtain the opinion of experts. I had no prejudice in regard to any of the sites, but from what I had heard and read my idea was that Dalgety was the best. I visited the various places, and thought Lyndhurst looked very well. Then, I thought that Orange was magnificent so far as scenery, soil, and climate were concerned, and that Bombala would do. Dalgety, however, I regarded as the best site of all, though I had to admit that the soil there did not come up to my expectations. I am glad to say that the expert knowledge of the right honorable member for Swan more than bears out my opinion in regard to Dalgety. But I should have been disappointed, indeed, had I been asked to cast my vote without an opportunity to visit the Tooma district, which, to my untutored observation at any rate, seems far superior even to Dalgety. The soil of the Tooma district appears excellent, and the site can be easily made accessible. However, I do not think there is anything in the arguments as to accessibility.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member consider that the selection of the Tooma site would confer any advantage on New South Wales?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Undoubtedly.

Mr. CONROY.—In what way?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—No matter in what part of New South Wales the Federal Territory is situated, it must be of decided advantage to that State.

Mr. CONROY.—How is that?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Honorable members, particularly those from New South Wales, seem desirous to so hedge round the Federal territory that every penny spent on the carriage of goods or passengers shall go into the coffers of that State. There seems to be a fear that a neighbouring State may also share in the advantage.

Mr. REID.—Where otherwise is the advantage to New South Wales?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—It has been decided that the Capital shall be in New South Wales, and I hope that it will be established at the earliest possible moment. For my part, I shall place no hindrance in the way of the decision of the question within the next few days.

Mr. PAGE.—Why should not New South Wales benefit?

Mr. CONROY.—If the honorable member for Hindmarsh represented Queensland, could he not point to other places even more beautiful than those he has mentioned?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I could tell the honorable and learned member of places in Queensland and South Australia just as admirably suited for the Federal Capital as any I have seen. That, however, is beside the question; we do not want the bargain altered. The honorable member for Maranoa has asked why New South Wales should receive any concession.

Mr. PAGE.—I ask why she should not benefit?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I do not see why New South Wales should benefit, further than we were willing, as citizens of this great Commonwealth, to approve of the section of the Constitution which enables her to do so. Except for that section she would not have formed part of the union, and I should have been very sorry indeed if New South Wales had remained outside.

Mr. CONROY.—How can New South Wales benefit if the Capital Site is placed right away from her centre, and in a part which practically belongs to another State?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Wherever the Federal territory is situated, there will be communication with Sydney and with the other States capitals. New South Wales will necessarily be a considerable gainer. There will be tourists from all parts to visit the Capital. I trust that it is going to be a Capital worth going to see, and an object lesson to the world at large. It ought to be. I also trust that it will be situated in territory that is fit for closer settlement. We should not have merely a small area for purposes of building allotments, but contiguous to the city there should be land available for settlement, so that the maintenance of the Federal Capital and territory will cost nothing to the taxpayers. There is no reason why that should not be so. The honorable member for Parramatta has told us that the principal considerations are centrality, accessibility, and climate. But there are other considerations, which are equally important. We also want to have good soil and a good water supply. Dalgely has a magnificent water supply. Any amateur can see that it has a magnificent background for a Capital. It is an excellent site in many ways. It is a better site than Bombala. But Tooma possesses all the advantages that Dalgely possesses, and over and above it seems to have a surpassingly superior soil.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does the honorable member know what the records of the climate are?

Mr. CONROY.—Does he know what the height of the site is?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The land is supposed to run from 1,100 feet to 1,900 feet above sea level, within a comparatively few miles.

Mr. CONROY.—Where would the Capital site be?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—If I had the choosing it would be about Welaregang. At that spot it would be about 1,100 feet above sea level.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member know that it is possible to grow tobacco there?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I am very glad to hear that, because if tobacco can be grown there it is a proof that almost anything else will grow, and that it will be possible to grow the fruit and other produce required by the Capital city within a few miles of the site.

Mr. CONROY.—I mention the growth of tobacco in order to show the heat.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The honorable and learned member's object is to show that the climate is bad. But we have a report from Mr. Chesterman, an expert, who says that he has lived for five years in the district; and any expert who has lived for that time in a district is quite competent to tell us what its qualifications are. He says nothing about intense heat, and nothing about intense cold. I went there almost in the depth of winter, and found the climate magnificent. It was warm during the day-time, and extremely cold at night, just as it is at Melbourne, Adelaide, and other places. There is a great deal to be said against going to too cold a country for the purpose of establishing a Seat of Government, especially as we have representatives from warm climates like Queensland and parts of Western Australia. But I believe that in a cold climate we can grow stronger and more brainy men and women than in hot climates. That is proved from the experience of the highlands of India, Scotland, and other countries. Men and women grown in the highlands are, as a rule, a stronger and superior race from every point of view. It would be wise to have our Capital situated in a cool climate, but not in an extremely cold climate. Nothing has been advanced during this debate to convince me that any suggested site is superior to Tooma. I am sorry that so few members took the trouble to visit that district.

Mr. REID.—Who unearthed it?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Last session the honorable member for Grampians was able to give the House a very great deal of information about Tooma, but other honorable members did not take the trouble to see whether his information could be substantiated.

Mr. REID.—If Tumut had not fallen out of the running we should never have heard of Tooma.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Possibly. But when I went to Tumut I was very unfavorably impressed with the district.

Mr. CONROY.—I assure the honorable member that at Welaregang the heat on some days is just the same as at Tumut.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—But the point is that we have at Welaregang good soil and a good water supply. It is true that we also have a water supply and a good climate at Tumut. But we must have a territory that can be utilized for closer settlement. I wish the Commonwealth to secure a territory that will yield a revenue sufficient to cover the whole cost of establishing the Capital and developing it.

Mr. CONROY.—Is the honorable member aware that practical people living there do not think the land worth more than £3 an acre?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I do not care what they think. We shall not have to pay more than the experts say the land is worth. The honorable and learned member knows very well that where there is no railway communication land, as a rule, is very cheap. What is the value of the land, even at Lyndhurst, where there is a railway right into the heart of the country? The price of land is no guarantee of its value until there is railway communication. No matter how rich land may be, it is practically valueless without railway communication. As a rule, it is only used for growing and fattening stock, when, probably, it would carry hundreds and thousands of families. We shall get railway communication to the Federal territory, so soon as it is acquired by the Commonwealth.

Mr. CONROY.—Who is going to find the money for the New South Wales Government to construct the railway?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—If the New South Wales Government have that wisdom for which I give them credit, they will recognise that in opening up the country, either at Tooma or at Dalgety, they will be entering upon a paying undertaking. I only wish that, in the State to which I belong, we had more country as rich as some of the land I passed through in New South Wales, that has no railway communication. The sooner railway communication is afforded to some of these outlying portions of the country the better it will be for the revenue of the mother State. I deplore the spirit that seems to animate some honorable members in discussing this question. They appear to consider more what their constituents will think of the votes they give than of what future generations will think of the choice we are making. With me it does not weigh in the slightest degree in whose electorate the site chosen may be. The honorable member for Eden-Monaro suggested the other day that people in his part of the country are accusing some of the members of the party to which I have the honour to belong, of changing their opinions with the change of Government. I would remind him that the Prime Minister favoured Tumut. But Tumut never had any chance of securing a vote from me. I favoured Dalgety while the honorable member was a member of the late Government. I now favour Tooma, because I have seen it since the honorable member ceased to be a member of the Government. I support Tooma simply because I consider that, up to the present time, it is the very best site which I have seen.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member think that the selection of Tooma would confer an advantage upon New South Wales?

Mr. HUTCHISON. — Most undoubtedly. No matter in what part of New South Wales the Capital is situated, it will confer an advantage upon that State.

Mr. CONROY.—Let the honorable member look at the map and see whether that is so.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The face of the map is going to be considerably altered when we have selected the territory. Does not the honorable and learned member know of parts of New South Wales where railways have been built, and where the face of the country has, in consequence, been changed in a remarkable manner? That has been our experience in South Australia also. So soon as you build a railway you induce closer settlement. So soon as you have closer settlement you have considerable additions to the revenue, not only through the railways, but through the Customs. But I do not want to go into that subject, which is foreign to the matter under discussion. Without saying more, I trust that honorable members who have not seen the Tooma site before making up their minds to vote for other sites which they have seen, will either ask the Government to give them an opportunity of seeing Tooma, or obtain all the information they can possibly get. If that be done, I feel sure that when the matter is put to the vote, those who hitherto voted for other sites will be of the same mind as myself. I am sorry that the right honorable member for East Sydney, who has asked when Tooma was introduced, did not visit that site. When was Dalgety first proposed?

Mr. REID.—The first expedition visited Dalgety; I was there.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Although the first expedition visited Dalgety, very little was heard of it last session. It was not voted upon at that time. To-day Dalgety is very strongly in the running as a place likely to be selected, but there is no reason why Tooma should not finally be selected if it is found to be superior.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does the honorable member think there is any chance of securing a settlement of the question if Tooma is chosen?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does not the honorable member know that the selection of Tooma means postponing the settlement of the question?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I do not know anything of the kind. It is just possible that the honorable member would like that to eventuate, if he thought that the Eden-Monaro district would not be in the running.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member has no warrant for saying that.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The honorable member asked for an expression of my opinion, and I do not think that it will be found to be very far wrong in this instance. A good deal has been urged to induce honorable members to give the Tooma site more consideration than it has received. It is not the fault of the honorable member for Grampians that it did not receive better consideration. But now that honorable members have heard of its merits, I trust that they will follow my example, and give it their first vote. If it is not selected, I shall be prepared to vote for Dalgety, and even if I am defeated in that vote, so anxious am I that this question shall be settled, that I shall be prepared to vote for what in my opinion is the most undesirable of the other sites which have been favoured so far, and that is Lyndhurst. I shall do anything to carry out the bargain which was made with New South Wales.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—I do not think that I should have risen to speak again on this subject, but for the attitude taken up by the last speaker with regard to the great majority of the representatives of New South Wales, who, he seems to consider, are not actuated by those honest intentions which he claims for himself. Seeing that my view of this question is in some respects very like his own, I cannot understand why he should not allow to us that credit for honesty of intention and purpose which he is perfectly justified in claiming for himself.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I allow it to some of them.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It is quite a mistake for the honorable member to think that there is any organization on the part of any representatives of New South Wales to get this question decided in any particular manner. Of all the representatives from the different States, there are none so much divided as are the representatives of New South Wales. The Prime Minister differs from me; I differ from the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, and the honorable member for Hume is supporting at the last moment a third site, which was not discovered until a few weeks ago. I agree with all those honorable members who have urged that this matter should be viewed from a national Australian stand-point. I agree that honorable members should be actuated by the highest motives in deciding this question. I claim to be actuated by none but the very highest motives. It will always happen that we shall estimate differently the various reasons which should actuate us, and one reason which has been little thought of by many honorable members, is the question of ways and means, or the economy of doing this thing. We find that one of the strongest reasons for deciding this question in one way, other things being equal, as they very nearly are, is the desire to secure a Capital of which we shall be proud without saddling the nation with any extravagant debt. If in one case we can get a really good Capital, with a fine climate and fair circumstances all round, without expending a single penny, except upon the site itself, and if in another case we should have to spend millions of pounds on a railway, and, perhaps, more millions on fortifications, and incur all sorts of other expenditures before it could be made of any use, we should be largely guided by that consideration, although I have just as great an ideal to aim at as have those who picture the glories of this or that site. It has frequently happened that while the site of a city looked very grand with its snow-clad mountains in the distance, it did not look nearly so beautiful when it came to be occupied. It has also frequently happened that an ordinary looking building site has, by the art and hand of man, been converted into a thing of beauty. It is very easy to imagine that in their primitive state the sites of many Australian cities looked rather miserable.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—That cannot be said of the city of Adelaide.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No; the city of Adelaide is remarkably well placed for looking at, although it is ill placed in other respects. When the honorable member talks about how the people of New South Wales should look on the settlement of this question, and says he is willing to give us the whole of the bond as it were, he would appear to be willing to grant us what he recognises we ought to have; but the gift is not offered in a spirit which will tend to foster Federal ideas, although he puts that as his aim. The honorable member has misread the Constitution if he thinks that this Parliament is entitled to approach New South Wales and say, "You are to have the Federal territory in your State, but we shall demand as much land as we like, and we shall have it where we like." The honorable member is mistaken if he thinks that any such demand can be made with any hope of being successful. When it is proposed to take a piece off the end of the territory of New South Wales, and to make that piece very much larger than any one ever anticipated it would be made, we are not keeping the compact with that State, but deliberately breaking it in spirit. I believe that such an idea could not be carried out without either an alteration of the Constitution or an appeal to the popular vote of New South Wales.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Why was not the area definitely stated in the Constitution?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Before I have finished I hope to be able to show the honorable member that there is something in my argument. When he talks about New South Wales having demanded something from the Federation which the other States did not get, he knows full well that this was absolutely a matter of compromise, which the greatest advocates of Federation in my State had to force themselves to consent to in order to get the majority of its people to accept the Constitution Bill. The honorable member knows full well, as other honorable members do, that at the first referendum, notwithstanding the eloquent efforts of a number of gentlemen who sit in this House, and many thousands who are not here, notwithstanding all the organized effort which was made to get the people of New South Wales to join in this great Federal movement, the people were so convinced that they occupied a position of strength, and could run independently better than any other Colony in the group, that it was utterly impossible to get them to consent to the State entering the union. Much against the wish of those who desired to bring about Federation, just as heartily as did the honorable member for Hindmarsh or any other honorable member we had to consent to the alteration of the Constitution in some respects, one, and perhaps the most popular being that the Seat of Government should be in territory within that State. Of course we do not know exactly what transpired at the Conference of Premiers in Melbourne, but I believe that the first proposal was that the Federal Capital should not be located within a distance of 200 miles of Sydney, so great was the effort to keep the Seat of Government from being in that city, and that ultimately the distance limit was reduced to 100 miles, for the simple purpose of preventing the city of Sydney enjoying any benefit from having the Federal Capital in its midst. I think I shall be able to show the honorable member for Hindmarsh, who seems to have taken the greatest interest in this point of the argument, that in the case of very many of the sites which have been proposed New South Wales could get no benefit from the Federal Government, and that all the benefit would go to Victoria from first to last. That is not keeping the spirit of the compact with the people of New South Wales. I do not think that the honorable member for Hindmarsh can accuse me of being actuated by any spirit of greed in the matter, or by any desire to see Sydney benefit at the expense of any other city in the Federation, because, from first to last I have refused to consent to any proposal to amend the Constitution so as to place the Seat of Government in Sydney. At the first session of last Parliament a representative of South Australia submitted proposal of that kind, and it was opposed by me most strenuously, and, I believe, by practically all the representatives of New South Wales. When a similar proposal was brought forward in this session it was scouted; as the honorable member will recollect, it commanded only three votes. It seems to be quite clear that the representatives of New South Wales do not desire to get the expenditure of Federal money in Sydney, and, therefore, they cannot rightly be accused of desiring to get that expenditure in a remote part of the State. Honorable members can fairly dismiss from their consideration any idea that the people of New South Wales, or their representatives, are simply actuated by a desire to get the Seat of Government located in some territory where the expenditure of money, the prestige, and so forth, would benefit that State to the detriment of other States, or even to the advantage of Sydney.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Then why are they interfering with where we shall place the Capital?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Because they have a right to interfere. They have as much right to interfere in the settlement of this question as have the representatives of any other State.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I do not admit it.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Under the Constitution New South Wales has statutory rights, and the representatives of its people here have to see that those rights—a privilege which no other State has—are carried out fairly and in the spirit. I think I shall be able to show that some of the proposals which have been made would not carry out that compact fairly and in the spirit. As the honorable member knows, we have had a great many sites to think of. I must say that amongst all the sites which have been considered here I still recollect one, if not two, which seem to me to be better than any of the others suggested but which have not been considered. When the honorable member tells some of us that we have no right to approach the settlement of this question without asking the Government to postpone the consideration of this Bill in order to allow us an opportunity of seeing the Tooma site, I can, in my turn, ask him if he has seen the Queanbeyan site, and, if not, why he does not ask the Government to consent to an adjournment until he has had an opportunity to visit that site?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Because I understand that it was ruled out by the House.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No; it has not been voted on. Of all the sites I have seen, the Queanbeyan site seems to be that which ought to have had the strenuous support of honorable members from all States. It seems to be perfectly healthy, to have good soil, and to possess a splendid water supply. With two hills in a vast plain, and surrounding hills in the background, it is an ideal site, which ought to have been placed in the forefront.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Why is it not placed in the forefront?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Because it did not get a friend like those three or four honorable members who have battled so valiantly for different sites. It had a friend in me to the extent of having mentioned its qualifications when the previous Bill was being considered. I argued then that it did not receive the attention that it should have commanded. It is situated in the middle of a branch line.

Mr. TUDOR.—In what electorate is it?

Mr. CONROY.—It is just outside the boundary of my electorate.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It seems to be a sort of no man's land, like that inhabited by the Irishman who lived on the boundaries of two districts, and voted for both, and paid taxes in neither. The site I speak of has never had a fair show. The members of the parliamentary party who visited the various sites arrived at Queanbeyan very early on Sunday morning, and the leader of the Opposition, with characteristic rectitude, would not agree to the inspection of any site on that day, contending that we should go to church. In the afternoon I, with some half-dozen others, having wandered a little further from our pious upbringing than the right honorable gentleman had done, thought it no desecration of the Sabbath to climb one of the hills in the district, and take a good look at the site. We were delighted at the prospect which opened before us. We saw then as fitting a location for a large city as I have ever met with anywhere. I took notes of the features of the locality, and marked my impressions with regard to it upon a map, afterwards consulting privately with the engineers, who informed me that an excellent water supply could be obtained there. But, although that site had been reported on by the first Commission, and by several experts, no consideration was given to it when the last

Bill was in Committee. I should have been ready to visit the Tooma site if it had been specified in the first itinerary. But it is not convenient for a business man who attends the meetings of Parliament day by day, to go off on these excursions. In my opinion, there are already a sufficient number of admirable sites to select from, and in making a selection, great consideration should be given to the question of cost. I think that the building of the Federal Capital should be paid for with money derived from the rental of the land in the Federal territory, without imposing any taxation on the people of the Commonwealth, and, other things being equal, I shall support that site in regard to which that arrangement is most likely to be carried out. When the last Bill was under consideration, the Bombala site received a great deal of support in this Chamber, and a majority of the members of the Senate voted for it. Since then, although the supporters of the Lyndhurst site, amongst whom I am glad to number myself, remain firm advocates of that site, the supporters of the Tumut, Bombala, and Dalgety sites have chopped and changed so much that we do not know now what votes they will receive. There has also been a change of opinion amongst the members of the other Chamber, who, in sending this Bill to us, do not provide for the selection of Bombala, but have agreed to a very roundabout clause, which gives the impression that they wish Dalgety to be selected, largely, I suppose, because the Snowy River flows so near that little township. Of course, the presence of such a river, which would give a perennial supply of pure drinking water, is an important consideration. I have always opposed the proposal to adopt the Bombala site, and to take in with it Twofold Bay and the country along the Victorian border for some considerable distance westward. The idea which some honorable members hold as to the need of some sort of buffer State between New South Wales and Victoria is an altogether wrong one. If we chose a territory which would have Twofold Bay as a port, it would be necessary in the first instance to spend a large sum of money in making a harbor there. At the present time, the place would be of no practical use as a port. I have twice had to take shelter there when travelling on small steamers from Tasmania to Sydney. No steamer of as much as 1,500 tons has gone into Twofold Bay during the last five years. It is only the smaller vessels which go there, and they experience a certain amount of difficulty in getting in and out. Not only have we among our papers charts of the bay which give all the soundings, but we have also been placed in possession of the proposals of engineers for constructing training walls to scour out the silt, and a breakwater to protect the shipping. Various estimates have been given for making a serviceable harbor, and in each case the sum mentioned is considerable. But, in addition to making the bay serviceable as a port, it would require an extravagant outlay to fortify it, in order to defend the Capital from outside attacks. Very early in the history of Washington, English vessels proceeded up the river and sacked the city, the soldiery even entering the Capitol, desecrating the Speaker's chair, and tearing up the records. As we are bound to no particular district, why should we incur the risk of destruction by an enemy, in locating the Seat of Government near the sea coast? Furthermore, if we selected Bombala, we should have to make no fewer than three railways to give communication to the Capital. In the first place, it would be of no use to have a port forty or fifty miles away, unless it were connected with the Capital by railway. Then it would be necessary to extend the existing railway from Cooma to Bombala, in order to get rid of the present coach journey; and, finally, Victorian representatives would not be satisfied to journey all the way to Goulburn, and then to return via Cooma to Bombala; and, therefore, would agitate for an extension of the Gippsland line to the Capital. In this way many millions of pounds would be expended, apart from the cost of the city itself. The erection of public buildings, the making of streets, the beautifying of parks, the supplying of water, and other expenditure which is incidental in every case, will be sufficiently heavy to make it necessary for us to go very slowly at first, and nothing would justify the expenditure of millions of pounds in merely providing means of communication. Then, the proposal to take a strip of territory along the Victorian border is a complete breach of the bargain made with New South Wales. Section 123 of the Constitution provides that—be agreed on, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any State affected.

While New South Wales may, under section 125, cede a portion of her territory to the Commonwealth for the purposes of the Seat of Government, if the territory asked for is situated on the Victorian border it could not be granted without an alteration of the boundary of New South Wales, and that is strictly forbidden, unless the consent of the people of that State is obtained. Therefore, to obtain a site bounded on one side by the New South Wales border—and the argument applies both to the proposal of the Senate, and to the Tooma proposal—would involve an appeal to the people of New South Wales, who would not be likely to agree to the selection of a site much nearer to Melbourne than to Sydney, whose trade would go to the former city. I do not know why the people of New South Wales should be asked to do so. The advocates of the border sites say that it is necessary for the people of Victoria to have an open door into the Federal territory, so that they shall not be obliged to go through part of New South Wales to get there. But why should not the people of the other States also have an open door? Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania would have no open door except by passing through Victoria. This policy of the open door, as applied to the selection of the Federal territory, is a pure myth. There is no necessity to have any open door whatever. The Federal territory would be there, and the Federal power would be behind it to enable the whole of the citizens of the Commonwealth to have free access to it. I do not see what necessity exists for having this territory situated alongside the borders of Victoria. It might reasonably be asked, "If the Seat of Government is located alongside the borders of Victoria, what benefit will New South Wales derive under this compact?" I hold that, under such circumstances, New South Wales might just as well cede that territory to Victoria, and inform her that the Federal Capital could be established in the ceded territory. That is the logical position. One honorable member has made a great deal of the benefit which New South Wales will derive by reason of having the Seat of Government located in that State. I am prepared to admit that it will obtain some benefit from that source. But the fact seems to be overlooked that New South Wales is paying very handsomely for that benefit. Under the Constitution, she is compelled to hand over to the Commonwealth, without fee or charge, the whole of the Crown lands within the Federal territory. She is also obliged to surrender the Governmental rights of that territory, and we cannot yet say whether by so doing she will not sacrifice a share of her representation in this Parliament. Certainly she will lose the power of taxing the residents of that portion of the State. To my mind it is doubtful whether — if we ever settle the question of allocating the Customs revenue upon a per capita basis—she will not lose the product of the Excise and Customs duties, so far as they relate to persons resident within the Federal territory. If honorable members will look at this matter fairly they must conclude that New South Wales is giving a quid pro quo for the prestige of having the Federal Capital established in her midst. Outside the site at Queanbeyan, which I regret has not received more consideration, I have, from the first, favoured the site in the Western district, which has been misnamed the Lyndhurst site. To my mind, we ought to speak of it as the "western" site, because one side of Lyndhurst contains very uninteresting and unprepossessing country indeed. By some error the members who formed one of the parliamentary parties which inspected this area were driven to the poorest side of Lyndhurst, with the result that some grew so tired of the country that they saw no more of it. I claim that the western site—the Orange site—is one of the finest to be found in Australia. Certainly there is no site equal to it from the stand-point of that class of beauty for which we should look in the Federal Capital city. If we merely desired to obtain wild grandeur, there would be nothing to prevent us from selecting an area in the Blue Mountains—an area near the Leura Falls, in the vicinity of Katoomba—where, according to experienced travellers, is to be found some of the finest scenery in the world. But, in establishing a fine city, we do not look for that class of beauty. We do not want to tread upon the edge of a precipice or of an avalanche. The ideal site for a Capital city is that class of country which consists of beautiful undulating hills and plains, such as are to be found in the Orange district. I admit that, according to the reports of engineers, it is impossible to obtain a thoroughly adequate water supply for a site higher than is the present town of Orange. But I would point out that between Orange and the proposed Lyndhurst site there are two or three areas sufficient to permit of the establishment of moderate-sized cities—areas which could be supplied with sufficient water—

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—For a million of people.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Personally, I do not believe that a population of a million will ever be settled in the Federal Capital. No difficulty, however, would be experienced in obtaining sufficient water to supply the needs of all the people who are ever likely to be attracted there. The last report of Mr. Wade—a gentleman of considerable engineering skill, and an expert in the matter of water supply—has removed any lingering doubt which I may have entertained that the Orange site would not meet all the requirements of the future Capital. Its position is admirably central. Already, lines of railway have been proposed, which would converge from the different States at Lyndhurst. Consequently, as soon as we erected our first building, we could settle there. The honorable member for Gippsland spoke of the poor quality of the soil of the Lyndhurst district. I am perfectly certain that if the honorable member had visited that country, he would have been forced to admit, with his admirable practical knowledge of land, that there are very few parts of New South Wales which are capable of feeding such a large population. The honorable member quoted statistics comparing the yields derived from land in the Orange, Lyndhurst, and Bathurst districts with those obtained from the country around Bombala, very much to the detriment of the first-named district. I have from the first questioned these figures, and practical men have pointed out the utter impossibility of their being correct. For instance, the honorable member stated that the yield of maize in the Bathurst district was 12·3 bushels to the acre, whilst in Bombala it was no less than 40·3 bushels to the acre. That would be an enormous return even in a part of the country most suitable for the production of maize; but I undertake to say that in the Bombala district practically no maize is grown, except in the most favoured and well protected parts. What is the use of quoting statistics as to the yield per acre without taking into consideration the area under cultivation? If one sowed maize in a highly manured plot in an experimental farm he might secure a return equal to 100 bushels to the acre in respect of a few square yards of land. Owing to the prolonged drought the yields have been notoriously bad in the Orange district of recent years, and if they be compared with those obtained from small sheltered patches in and about Bombala, the result may be detrimental to Orange.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The drought has not affected Lyndhurst.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It affected that part of the country to a very material extent. The honorable member, like the honorable member for Gippsland, has had great practical experience in farming, and if he were to visit the Orange-Lyndhurst district, and then visit Dalgety and Bombala, and look at the granitic country which prevails there, he would readily determine which of these two districts would support the larger population per acre.

Mr. BROWN.—According to the Commissioners' report, there were only 4,207 acres under maize in the Bombala district, as against 6,938 acres under maize in the Lyndhurst district.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Quite so. Any man of common sense who visits the two districts must readily admit that Lyndhurst is better suited to agricultural purposes. I am only an amateur farmer, although I have had some little experience in that direction; but the merest amateur would be able to say from an inspection of the two districts which is the better agricultural country. If he were to see Bathurst as we saw it on the morning of our last visit—if he were to look at the evidence of successful and profitable farming to be seen on every hand there—and then compare it with the vast stretches of land in the Monaro country, he would recognise that the Bombala district does not comprise land as well suited to agricultural purposes as is the land in the western district. Various statements have been made as to the climatic conditions of Lyndhurst, but we cannot get away from the minimum and maximum temperatures recorded—we cannot get away from the figures collated for a number of years past. From a consideration of them I am forced to the conclusion that the climate of the Orange and Lyndhurst districts is similar in almost all respects to the climate of Tasmania, which is held to be one of the healthiest and most perfect in the world. Lyndhurst possesses many advantages. It boasts of centrality; it is easy of access, possesses a good climate, and is already connected with the railway system of the State. Every one who has visited the district admits that its soil is capable of supporting a larger number of persons per acre of cultivation than is any of the other sites. Then we have the fact that there is an abundant supply of building material in the neighbourhood, that it possesses deposits of coal and of iron, and an ample supply of building stone, and there should be some strong reason to justify the rejection of a district that is so admirably suited to the purposes of the Federal Capital. What is that strong reason? I have not yet touched very fully on the question of a water supply. I admit that in that respect Dalgety is the best of the sites.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Except Tooma.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I believe that the Tooma water supply is practically inferior to that of Lyndhurst, in the sense that the water of many of the creeks there is polluted.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Who says it is?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—In the report of the New South Wales Water Commission, a copy of which I saw in the chamber this afternoon, there is evidence that it is largely polluted by mining and sluicing operations carried on along the river. Evidence to that effect has been given by squatters and land-holders in the district.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member, for his own sake, should not talk any more nonsense.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I give the honorable member credit for that bluff honesty which is one of his chief characteristics, and he should give me some credit for honesty of motive, and allow me to conclude my remarks without interruptions of that kind. Unquestionably the best water supply is to be found at Dalgety.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—On the other hand, Dalgety has many drawbacks which are not associated with Lyndhurst, and, in view of the last report received from Mr. Wade, I am convinced that we shall obtain sufficient water not only to supply the domestic requirements of the population of the Federal Capital for very many years to come, but for irrigation purposes, and to allow of the formation of an artificial lake. In these circumstances, and seeing that, if Lyndhurst were selected, we should avoid the enormous initial outlay of connecting the Capital by railway that would be incurred in the case of some of the other sites, I intend to vote for that site all the time. If I am beaten, I shall transfer my vote to Dalgety, because of the existence of the Snowy River there, which I consider is a very strong attraction.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I wish to know whether the Minister of Home Affairs has received Mr. Wade's report on the water supply of Lyndhurst, and, if so, whether he will lay it on the table of the House?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I shall lay the report on the table after we report progress.

Progress reported.

PAPER.

Mr. BATCHELOR laid upon the table the following paper:—

Report by Mr. L. A. B. Wade on the Lyndhurst Water Supply.

Ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT.

REPORTS ON CAPITAL SITES.

Motion (by Mr. BATCHELOR) proposed—
That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro).—The honorable member for Macquarie asked a question just now as to whether the Government proposed to lay on the table a report from Mr. Wade. I presume that members of the Government were aware that the question was to be asked. There appears to me to be some little mystery about the matter, and I should like to ask members of the Government a question on the subject. Mr. Wade is the principal engineer of the Water Conservation Department of New South Wales. He was in attendance at this House last week, and he was prepared to give evidence at the bar of the House. While, in my opinion, it is very desirable that we should have all the information possible on the various sites, it appears to me that if the Government can have officers of such high standing as Mr. Wade in attendance day after day, they might be able also to get further information about the Upper Murray site. I am anxious that we should have the same information regarding the temperature, water supply, elevation, and other points with respect to that site that we have had regarding other sites. I am informed that Mr. Wade has again returned to Melbourne, and is within the precincts of the House. If that is so, I wish to know if it is the intention of the Government to call him to the bar of the House? I should like also to know whether he is here at the request of the New South Wales Government? On the face of it, it would appear as though Mr. Wade were being brought here as a sort of special pleader for a particular site. I have not the least objection to that, and I do not question Mr. Wade's bona fides in the matter. But I should like to get at the bottom of his appearance here. I should like to know if it has been arranged by the Commonwealth Government, the New South Wales Government, or the honorable member for Macquarie. If he is here because of action taken by the Commonwealth Government, I ask Ministers whether they are prepared to take similar action to secure information from engineers who have reported upon other sites, that we may have a fair opportunity to examine them all at the bar of the House. It should be made clear who was responsible for bringing Mr. Wade to Melbourne last week, and for the submission of this hurried report at the last moment, when it might have been placed before honorable members months ago, and an opportunity afforded them to study it. I have a great desire to call Mr. Pridham, and I think it is well that we should have the opinion of Mr. Wade and Mr. Pridham also upon the Upper Murray site.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—There is no proposal to bring Mr. Wade to the bar of the House.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I desire to know whether Mr. Wade is here at the instance of the Government of New South Wales, and whether, if it is intended that he should be brought to the bar of the House to give information, an opportunity will be given to test the feeling of honorable members on the question whether other officers should not also be in attendance at the Bar.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Government have already expressed their policy in that matter.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I cannot understand the objection raised by the honorable member for Eden-Monaro. It is well known that when the question of the water supply to be obtained at various sites was under consideration, the honorable members for Eden-Monaro and Hume suggested that the water supply at Lyndhurst was not sufficient for the Federal Capital. When I heard that damaging statement made, I felt it to be my duty to have information on the subject placed before honorable members that they might be able to consider the question in a reasonable way. It is but right that the fullest information with respect to every site should be given, and I fail to see what objection the honorable member for Eden-Monaro can have to the fullest information being supplied with respect to the Lyndhurst site. Mr. Wade is the officer upon whom devolved the duty of reporting upon nearly all the sites now under consideration, and I believe it was largely upon his opinions that the Commissioners founded their report. As I was quite willing that the fullest inquiry should be made concerning the water supply at Lyndhurst, I had no hesitation when I heard such a damaging statement in telegraphing to Mr. Waddell, the Premier of New South Wales, to get Mr. Wade to report on the water supply at Lyndhurst. I asked that Mr. Wade should supply the fullest information on the subject, and that he should submit it in writing. He did so, and I submitted it for the information of honorable members. Even then some honorable members appeared to question the accuracy of Mr. Wade's figures, and on last Friday I moved that he should be examined at the bar of the House. A full discussion took place, and the Prime Minister, in a very fair spirit, promised to ask the Government of New South Wales to allow Mr. Wade to make a full report upon the water supply of Lyndhurst, and that if such a report were forwarded he would lay it on the table of this House.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I made that promise.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I believe that the Minister of Home Affairs also made the promise. In compliance with the request of the Commonwealth Government, the State Government of New South Wales authorized Mr. Wade to make such a report for the consideration of honorable members. I asked the Minister of Home Affairs just now whether he had received the report, and he replied that he had, and that he would lay it on the table. He has since done so. I fail to see what objection there can be to the fullest information being given on this question, especially in view of the fact that the water supply of Lyndhurst has been discussed in such an unfair way by the honorable member for Eden-Monaro and the honorable member for Hume. I feel sure that when honorable members read the report that has been submitted they will find that every statement which I made with regard to the water supply of Lyndhurst is borne out by the statement made by the highest official authority on this subject in New South Wales.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby—Minister of Home Affairs).—There is a certain amount of monotony about these proceedings. It has begun to be the regular custom now for the honorable member for Macquarie, the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, or the honorable member for Hume to ask that some information shall be given, and for the other two honorable members to immediately get up and protest.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have not done that.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Sometimes we have a request from two of those honorable members, with a protest from the third, and on other occasions the request is by one and the protest by the other two.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable gentleman cannot say that I have objected to the fullest information being given.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Government are prepared to give every possible information. I am sure that no honorable member can find fault with what they have done in this matter. They are willing that every information shall be given that can be given without delaying the progress of the Bill. We do not intend that there shall be delay, but any information which may be obtained in the meantime will be laid before honorable members, in accordance with what I conceive to be only the duty of the Government. I do not know whether the honorable member for Eden-Monaro is quite serious in the request he made just now for information. I think that he knows as well as any of us—indeed, I think it has been stated on the floor of the House—that Mr. Wade was here at the request, I understand, of the honorable member for Macquarie.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—And that Mr. Wade was sent here by the New South Wales Government.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—But not at the request of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Mr. Wade was not here at the request of the Commonwealth Government, but, as he was here, it seemed to us that, if he were in possession of more information than we had previously received as to the water supply at Lyndhurst, it was only proper that that information should be furnished, seeing that, under the circumstances, it could be obtained so easily and without expense.

As to the report of Mr. Chesterman, that has been read this afternoon, showing the additional details.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.33 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 3 August, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

COMMONWEALTH REFRESHMENT ROOM.

Mr. LEE (for Mr. EWING) asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

1. What is the average number of individuals who use the refreshment-room at the Commonwealth Parliament House during the sitting of Parliament?
2. What is the average expenditure per individual on spirits per month during the sitting of Parliament this session?
3. Are all spirits paid for by those consuming them?

Mr. WATSON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. About 250.
2. 1s. 5d. per month, or about 4d. per week.
3. Yes. No free drinks or free meals are given to any person.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The refreshment-room is also the dining-room. The answer may be misleading if that is not stated.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes. The refreshment-room is also the dining-room. The figures represent the average expenditure, including what is spent at meal times.

SHIPPING PATROL OFFICERS.

Mr. R. EDWARDS (for Mr. G. B. EDWARDS) asked the Minister of Trade and Customs, upon notice—

1. Have any persons been recently appointed to fill the newly-created offices of shipping patrol officers in the Department of Trade and Customs at Sydney?
2. If so, were they previously on the list of temporary employés, and have they been exempted from the application of that part of the Public Service Act which requires all candidates for appointment to pass certain examinations, except in a few cases?
3. Are there any experienced men on the list of temporary employés in connexion with the Department of Trade and Customs at Sydney, and, if so, is it intended to take such steps as may be necessary to permanently secure their useful and tried services in safeguarding and protecting the public revenue?

Mr. FISHER.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. Two shipping patrol officers have been appointed.

2. These officers were not on the list of temporary employés. They were officers selected by the Inspector-General of Police of New South Wales from the police force of that State as having special qualifications. They were exempted from the provisions of the Public Service Act relating to the examination of candidates.

3. It is not known that any are experienced men in the particular work referred to. Steps are being taken to appoint watchmen when application can be made by any of the present temporary employés in the ordinary way, and will be considered. All appointments must, however, be made under the provisions of the Public Service Act.

VANCOUVER MAIL SERVICE.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Whether the following statement, appearing in the Argus, is in substance correct, and whether the Government has any intention of altering or doing away with the Vancouver service subsidy and adding it to the Peninsular and Oriental and Orient contracts:—

“OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS.

“Position in Queensland.

“Brisbane, Sunday.

“Mr. Morgan, when asked yesterday whether any action could be taken in regard to the mail contract and the extension of the service to Brisbane, pointed out that the Federal Government appeared to be intent on making a contract only for the conveyance of mails, rendering it necessary for the States to make provision for the extension of the service to their respective States. Mr. Morgan thought this could be done without very much extra cost, by doing away with the subsidy on the Vancouver service, and adding it to the amount now paid under the Peninsular and Oriental and Orient contracts. Thus they would be able to secure a service which would alternate with the Aberdeen service, and provide a regular fortnightly service from Brisbane. It transpired, in the course of conversation, that Mr. Morgan has been endeavouring to get the New Zealand Government to take over the Vancouver service. The New Zealand Government opened negotiations in the matter through the Federal Government, and Mr. Morgan expressed his willingness to agree to a proposal to transfer the service to New Zealand, but as far as he knows nothing has yet been decided, though the negotiations may be still going on with the company. It is presumed that the steamers in that event would follow the Pacific Cable route to New Zealand, and then go back to Sydney.”

Mr. MAHON.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

Nothing is known of the statement referred to, except that the Government of New Zealand inquired through that of the Commonwealth in December last as to the willingness of Queensland to withdraw from the Vancouver mail contract, in order that the mail steamers might call at a New Zealand port instead of at Brisbane, on condition that the Government of New Zealand took over the liabilities of Queensland as a party to the contract. The Government of Queensland acquiesced in the proposal, and the Government of New Zealand was informed in February, but no further action has been taken. There is no intention of altering or doing away with the Vancouver mail service subsidy, beyond what has been stated, or of adding it to any other contracts.

VICTORIAN LETTER-CARRIERS.

Mr. MAUGER asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is it a fact that the letter-carriers of Victoria were paid a salary at the rate of £132 per annum for the month ending 31st of July?

2. Are they not entitled to receive a salary at the rate of £150 per annum, equivalent to £12 10s. per month—in accordance with the decision of the High Court of Australia in the action of Bond v. The King, which provided payment of a certain salary in accordance with State legislation, and which was deemed by the Court to be a right and privilege in accordance with the Constitution Act?

3. If not, what are the reasons?

Mr. MAHON.—The matter is being inquired into, and if the honorable member will repeat his question to-morrow, I hope then to be in a position to answer it.

WESTERN AUSTRALIAN FEDERAL ROLLS.

Mr. FOWLER asked the Minister of Home Affairs, upon notice—

1. Is it a fact that arrangements have been made for the printing of the Western Australian Federal Electoral Rolls in Melbourne?

2. If so, what are the reasons for this departure from the usual course of printing the rolls in the States to which they refer?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. The price asked by the Western Australian Government was £1 1s. 6d. per page of seventy-five names, which would have amounted to £1,862 19s. 6d.; after correspondence the price was reduced to 15s. per page, or more than twice as much as the work has actually been done for.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 2nd August, vide page 3809):

Clause 2 (Determination of Seat of Government).

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—In speaking to this clause, I feel bound to express the opinion—which I believe is shared by most honorable members—that the time has now arrived for the determination of the Seat of Government. It has been found that the question has been used, and, if not settled, is in the future likely to be still more largely used, for political purposes. Those within whose electorates proposed sites are situated—and it is only fair to mention that the Lyndhurst site is situated not far from the electorate which I represent—seem to make the question peculiarly their own. I have observed, too, that members of the Parliament of New South Wales, now that there is a general election at hand, are using it to secure popularity within the districts for which they wish to be returned. When this Parliament was last dealing with the Bill, the Government of New South Wales were given an opportunity to recommend a site, and to stamp it with the imprimatur of their approval; but they did not take advantage of that opportunity. Since then, however, there has been a change of Ministry, and the present Premier, who represents the State electorate of Carcoar, within which the Lyndhurst or Carcoar-Garland site is situated, is now displaying a great amount of energy in connexion with the matter. The question naturally occurs to one, why is it that when the subject was last under discussion in this Chamber, and the Lyndhurst site needed supporters, the honorable gentleman—who was at the time Treasurer of the State—did not show the zeal which he is now displaying? Is not the answer to be found in the fact that proposed sites are situated in a number of the New South Wales constituencies, and the See Government had not the moral courage to offend possible supporters by saying that they preferred some particular site, and offering that site to the Federal Government? In this Parliament we find that members who represent constituencies in which no proposed site is situated are advocating the postponement of the determination of the Seat of Government, in order to gain popularity, and the approval of the press.

Mr. WATKINS.—Does that apply to the honorable member?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It applies to me probably as much as to the honorable member for Newcastle. The honorable member was in favour of Lyndhurst, but he turned a somersault, and discovered that Tooma was the best site. Now that an election is looming in the distance—and we are told that a dissolution may be expected—other honorable members are performing the same acrobatic feat, in order that they may gain popularity among their constituents, or secure the approval of the press.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is no election looming in the distance, is there?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—If the honorable member reads to-day's newspapers, he will see that some persons think that a general election is not very far off. Why should the Victorian press be so anxious to prevent a settlement of this question? Why should they seek to induce members to break faith with New South Wales? Are they not favouring the selection of Albury, or Tooma, because either of those places would be very much closer to Melbourne than to any other State capital, and because they would be able to send their newspapers into the Federal city some hours before the daily journals published in Sydney, or any other capital city in the Commonwealth, could be delivered there? That is the chief object held in view by the newspaper proprietors when they urge that matters should be allowed to remain as they are, or endeavour to persuade honorable members to select a site which would not be regarded with favour by the people of New South Wales. They know that whilst they urge the selection of Albury or Tooma, there is no likelihood of the matter being settled, and that, so long as the people of New South Wales are dissatisfied with the choice made, the Seat of Government will remain in Melbourne. Despite the press, however, the representatives of Victoria should demonstrate that it is the intention of the people of that State to keep faith with New South Wales. The Kyabram movement in favour of public economy has been availed of to prejudice the minds of the electors against any expenditure upon the Federal Capital. I ask how it would be possible to establish the Seat of Government anywhere outside of the large centres of population without a large expenditure of public money? I am prepared to vote any sum that may be required for properly housing the Federal Parliament and Departments, and for laying out the Federal city, in order that the Commonwealth Government may have a suitable home, and I believe that such action will be approved by the common sense of the people. If a large sum be required it must be expended; but, at the same time, it would be inadvisable to enter upon any unnecessary outlay. We should, if possible, choose a site in connexion with which only a reasonable expenditure will be required. Several such places have been offered by New South Wales, and I wish to refer to one or two which I regard as worthy of attention. There are other sites which are not entitled to any consideration whatever. Albury is so close to Victoria that if the Federal Capital were established there New South Wales would be called upon to practically grant to Victoria a large slice of her territory. No concession would be made to New South Wales in regard to the establishment of the Capital within her territory if she were called upon to provide a site embracing an area of 100 square miles on the borders of her territory. That would not be in accordance with the spirit of the compromise entered into between the representative of New South Wales and those of the other States. New South Wales was, at first, unwilling to enter the Federation unless the Capital were established at Sydney, but as a compromise it was agreed that, although the Capital city should be in New South Wales territory, it should not be located within 100 miles of the metropolis. I do not think that I am committing any breach of confidence in stating that at the Premiers' Conference the right honorable member for East Sydney suggested a limit of eighty miles as a fair compromise. But the right honorable member for Balaclava, the then Premier of Victoria, immediately replied that if such a limit were fixed, Moss Vale would become eligible as a site for the Federal city. He said that he could not consent to that, and urged that a limit of 100 miles from Sydney should be fixed. The right honorable member for Balaclava evidently contemplated that the Capital would be established very close to the 100 miles limit, and I think, therefore, that we should only be paying proper regard to the spirit of the compact if we endeavoured to select a site as near as possible to that limit.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—Should we not select the best site that can be found?

MR. HENRY WILLIS.—I believe that the best site for the Federal Capital might be found at some place immediately outside the 100 miles radius from Sydney. When the people of New South Wales voted at the first referendum, they decided against Federation by a large majority—taking into consideration the statutory number of votes that had to be polled. They were then opposed to Federation, whereas all the other States were eager to bring it about. It was impossible to form the Union with out New South Wales, and the other States asked what she wanted, in order to induce her to join. The mother State then made the very simple request, "Give us the honour of having the Federal Capital within our territory; that is all we ask." That request was granted, and I now ask honorable members to carry out the compact then made, and agree to the establishment of the Federal Capital as near as possible to the 100 miles radius from Sydney. The people of New South Wales would never approve of Bombala, Tumut, or Albury and it would be a waste of time to select either of those sites. I heard this matter discussed in the last Parliament, and came to the conclusion that notwithstanding the adverse influence that was being exerted by the press honorable members were disposed to keep faith with New South Wales. I have yet to learn that honorable member will not do what they believe to be fair to the mother State, which entered the Federal union, quite content to trust the people of the Commonwealth through their representatives. A very great moral responsibility rests upon honorable members, and it is their duty to discharge that responsibility. Is it to be said that the other States having induced the people of New South Wales to join the Federation; that the first Commonwealth Parliament having immediately after it had assembled, imposed extra taxation upon them, amounting to £1,000,000—taxation which was not required for the cost of the ordinary government of that State—

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—The amount was nearer £1,500,000.

MR. HENRY WILLIS.—The people of New South Wales are willing to bear the burden for the sake of Federal union. There is only one thing which they ask of us. They say, "Give us the Federal Capital at a distance of not more than 100 miles from Sydney." That is a very simple request to make. Notwithstanding the provision contained in the Constitution, honorable members have not exhibited any undue eagerness to get away from Melbourne. Certainly this question has been kept alive, but no attempt was made to decide it until the end of the first Parliament. The responsibility which rests upon honorable members is a real one, and one which should be discharged to the satisfaction of the people of New South Wales. During the course of this debate a great deal has been said concerning the very beautiful sites which are to be found adjacent to Victoria. Personally, I do not think that the Tooma site can possibly be superior to that of Table Top, which is situated close to Albury—a town which is already connected with the various State capitals by rail—and the altitude of which is quite as great as that of Tooma. Table Top is situated a few miles north of Albury, but although it is a very beautiful site indeed, it is an absolutely impossible one because of its distance from Sydney. The Tooma site, which is advocated so ably by the honorable member for Hume, is also a magnificent one. The honorable member for Newcastle has declared that when he visited it he had a perfectly open mind, but that, after having seen it, he concluded that no better site exists. I am willing to believe that it is an admirable site. The fact remains, however, that it is situated upon the border of New South Wales, and that it is inaccessible, whereas the Albury site is very accessible. Therefore, I claim that the expenditure which would require to be incurred in establishing the Federal Capital at Albury would be very much less than that which would be involved in establishing it at Tooma. I would further point out that while the water supply at the latter place might be very excellent, it would be drawn, not from the Murray, but from the Tooma River. A doubt also exists as to whether that supply is as good as it has been represented to be by the honorable member for Hume. While the Tooma site is no doubt a very excellent one, I do not believe that it is much superior to a hundred other sites which are to be found in various parts of New South Wales, and which can be had merely for the asking.

Mr. WATKINS.—Why did not the honorable member inspect the Tooma site?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is a very fair question to put, and I think that my reply will be equally fair. I did not visit Tooma because I do not consider that it is just to ask the people of New South Wales to assent to the establishment of the Federal Capital upon the Murray River in that locality. During the early history of the Federal movement, the late Sir Henry Parkes frequently used to speak of the "Federal City." I am inclined to think that he borrowed that phrase from the late Sir Hercules Robinson, who, upon one occasion, delivered a famous after-dinner speech in the Albury Town Hall. It is because of that speech, and because Albury was afterwards dubbed the "Federal City" of Australia, that a great deal of prestige has been associated with that particular locality. Personally, I cannot conceive that the Tooma site is very much superior to that of Table Top, which has an altitude of 1,500 feet, and which is situated within ten or fifteen miles of Albury.

Mr. GROOM.—Has the honorable member seen both sites?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I have not.

Mr. GROOM.—The Tooma site is vastly superior.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The site at Albury would not constitute a fair compromise, and therefore cannot be accepted as a settlement of this somewhat vexed question, any more than can the Tooma site. If we want to obtain a magnificent water supply, there is another site which would, perhaps, prove acceptable to the people of New South Wales. The drainage in that case is from the opposite side of Mount Kosciusko—I refer to the Dalgety site—and it possesses a magnificent supply of the purest of water. In the opinion of geologists Mount Kosciusko is the oldest mountain in the world. From it we can obtain water at a season of the year when streams in many other parts of New South Wales are practically dry. The fall of the water is such that it might be possible to obtain motive power there at a very small cost indeed—power which would call into being a large manufacturing centre outside of the city area.

Mr. MAUGER.—We should require to impose protective duties before we could secure the establishment of any manufactures.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The honorable member for Melbourne Ports declares that to induce the establishment of manufactures we should require to levy heavier protective duties. I would remind him that in America—where the protective tariff is higher than that of the Commonwealth, or than was the old Victorian Tariff—at the town of Niagara, where statutory authority is given to use the water from the famous falls of that name to the extent of 500,000 horse-power—notwithstanding the statement of the right honorable member for East Sydney to the contrary—manufactures are springing up like mushrooms. All round the town of Niagara upon the United States side of the river, as also upon the Canadian side, manufactures are being established for the purpose of utilizing the water power available, because it is so cheap. Evidently the honorable member has not read the well-known book, "America at Work."

Mr. MAUGER.—Yes, I have.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—If so, the honorable member must have read the article entitled "Niagara in Harness." If he has read that article he must know that at Dalgety the water might be so diverted as to provide a fall quite equal to that obtained at the Falls of Niagara. I would direct his attention to the possibility that the suburbs of the Federal Capital, if it be established on this site, may be converted into very large manufacturing centres, assuming that the waters of the Snowy River be utilized to the fullest extent under the scheme advocated by Mr. Pridham. Dalgety is a magnificent site. It has an easterly aspect, and a water frontage, and if it were selected it would be possible to make an ornamental lake twenty or even forty miles in length. The land adjacent to the site is as good as any to be found within the several areas dealt with in the reports before us. I have heard it said that Dalgety comprises fluky country. It may be fluky country, and therefore unsuitable for sheep raising; but we desire to secure not a sheepwalk, but a site for a centre of population. The land could be so drained as to secure as large an area for settlement as is likely to be required. If opposition to the selection of Dalgety be based on the ground that it consists of fluky country, then we must give no consideration to Tooma, because I believe that a similar objection applies to it. The honorable member for Hume will admit that is so.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. GROOM.—Is the honorable member's assertion based on mere rumour or on a statement contained in one of the reports?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It is suggested by an honorable member that it was a mere fluke that Tooma was brought under our consideration. I am inclined to think that if it had not been included in the list submitted to us, some other magnificent site in the electorate of Hume—for the honorable member's constituency comprises many such sites—would have been brought forward.

I have no objection to sites in that district being brought under our notice to provide pleasant week-end excursions for honorable members, but it would not be worthy of the honorable member for Hume to seriously suggest the selection of any of them. The honorable member has a duty to perform for his own State—he owes an even greater duty to New South Wales than do the representatives of other parts of the Commonwealth. The right honorable member for Swan visited a number of sites in the Southern Monaro district, and has given Dalgety his imprimatur, holding that it is the best in the district. The right honorable member has a reputation to back up his opinion. He was the first to cross Australia from west to east, and furnished reports on the country through which he traversed, pointing out the good and the indifferent land, the extent of the water supply available, and the possibilities of the interior. His reputation as an explorer—as a man of wide experience, possessing a European reputation—is such that his opinion on this question should not be allowed to pass without due consideration. The possibility of utilizing the water power available at Dalgety has been dealt with by the right honorable member in a very convincing way, and Tooma cannot be regarded as in any way comparable with it as a site for the Federal Capital. The water supply of Dalgety is superior to that of Tooma, while the land is equally good; and as a compromise the selection of Dalgety would be more acceptable to the people of New South Wales. If the distance separating a site from Melbourne and Sydney is to be a factor in the selection, then the journey from Melbourne to Dalgety would not be so great as to give dissatisfaction to even the most fastidious person who might have to undertake it. I should like once more to impress upon honorable members that it is necessary that we should make such a selection as will lead the people of New South Wales to consider that we have kept faith with them. We might secure a site adjacent to Goulburn which would be a little more than one hundred miles from Sydney, and the selection of such a site would give great satisfaction to the people of New South Wales. If we kept faith with them their feeling towards the Federation would be altogether different from what it is. They are a kind-hearted people, and while their representatives make a stout fight on their behalf in dealing with every proposal that comes before this House, they are prepared, as soon as they find that they are in a minority, to bow to the majority. In many cases, a majority has been secured against them by the votes of honorable members from a State whose representation is in excess of the population basis, whereas honorable members from New South Wales actually represent the people.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is not much in that argument.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The right honorable member is one of the representatives of a State who have a smaller proportion of electors behind them than have the representatives of Victoria and New South Wales. That is true of the representatives of Western Australia, both in this House and another place.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is not the case, so far as this House is concerned.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—With all due respect to the right honorable member, I repeat that it is. No State may have less than five representatives in this House, but on the establishment of Federation, Western Australia was not entitled, from the point of view of population, to that number.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think that it is now entitled to that number.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The right honorable member admits that Western Australia has only just secured a population which places its representatives on equal terms with those of New South Wales. In the last Parliament, when, as the result of the passing of the Tariff Bill, heavy taxation was levied on New South Wales, Western Australia had not a population entitling it to five representatives; but the people of New South Wales bowed to the decision of the Parliament.

Mr. GROOM.—But the Free Trade Party secured the votes of all the representatives of Western Australia with one or two exceptions.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Let it be remembered that no measure passed by this House may become law until it has been confirmed by another place. The Senate is the States House, and amendments suggested by honorable senators who represent States rather than people were accepted by this House.

Mr. FOWLER.—It is not a fact that the majority of honorable members representing Western Australia voted to impose taxation on New South Wales, or on any other State in the Union.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—No State can be singled out for special treatment by Act of Parliament; but in the administration of the Tariff Act it is found that the taxation imposed by it falls more heavily upon New South Wales than, say, upon Tasmania. The people of New South Wales pay £1,500,000 more than is sufficient for her requirements—£1,500,000 more than they ever paid before.

Mr. FOWLER.—Western Australia had nothing to do with that.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—They observe the compact and bear the burden cheerfully—for they have satisfaction in the establishment of the Commonwealth—and we should not be wanting in a sense of our responsibility or in the recognition of what is just and reasonable. We have to remember that we are at the dawning of a nation, and the very first act demanded of us is that we should do justice to the States which have entered the Union.

Mr. McLEAN.—If New South Wales by means of the Commonwealth Tariff Act obtains so much more revenue than she requires, how is it that she has to borrow so much money to supplement that revenue?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Because she has had many spendthrifts at the head of affairs.

Mr. GROOM.—In what way has New South Wales been treated unfairly?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—If the honorable member wishes me to discuss the Tariff—

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member would not be in order in discussing it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—If it were in order, no subject would give me more pleasure.

Mr. MAUGER.—We shall have an opportunity to-morrow.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—No doubt, I shall have an opportunity on another occasion of explaining to the honorable member for Melbourne Ports how this taxation has been imposed. Just now, however, I am not making any complaint on that score. I am now endeavouring to show that New South Wales is long-suffering—that that State has shown great kindness, and should be treated with justice.

Mr. GROOM.—New South Wales has been treated as fairly as has any other State in the Union.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—New South Wales expects to be justly treated.

Mr. GROOM.—Hear, hear!

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—And honorable members will show by their vote whether they act fairly towards New South Wales.

Mr. MAUGER.—That would be a wrong inference!

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—New South Wales will be able to judge, by the vote given, whether the other States, through their representatives, are acting justly towards her.

Mr. MAUGER.—I rise to order. Is the honorable member in order in imputing injustice to any member of this House who may vote against his particular idea? My point is that the honorable member is inferring that if honorable members do not vote for the particular spot which he favours New South Wales will be treated with injustice.

The CHAIRMAN.—I fail altogether to draw that inference from what the honorable member for Robertson said. If the honorable member had made a direct statement to that effect, it would have been out of order; but he has not done so. The honorable member for Robertson is, I take it, speaking altogether with regard to the future.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I wish to bring the Committee back to a sense of their responsibility in regard to keeping faith—that is my point—with New South Wales.

Mr. MAUGER.—Who would dispute that position?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—From the honorable member who interjects I claim justice under the Constitution. I ask the honorable member, as a representative of the people of the great city of Melbourne, to do justice to New South Wales, and not to vote in favour of a site not acceptable to the people of that great State. The honorable member ought not to give a vote which he knows will incense the people of the mother State.

Mr. MAUGER.—How am I to know that?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I give the honorable member credit for possessing some common sense, and for knowing that the people of New South Wales, when they entered the Union, would never have agreed to the limit of 100 square miles, if, in the next breath, they had been informed that the Federal territory would probably be selected on the borders of Victoria. Under such circumstances would the people of New South Wales not have said:—"You wish us to cede to Victoria 100 square miles at least of our territory for the purposes of a site over 100 miles closer to Melbourne than to Sydney. In that there would be no compromise—no concession to New South Wales." Having induced the people of New South Wales to enter the Union, if honorable members desire to satisfy their scruples and their pride in the chief city of Australia, they ought to select a site such as the people of the State anticipated. In the western part of New South Wales there is a site which answers all requirements, and which would be acceptable to the people of that State. During the discussion a great deal of attention has been devoted to the centrality of Carcoar-Garland, Canobolas, and Bathurst, situated as they are just beyond the limit of 100 miles. Much has been said by those opposed to the settlement of the question as to the impossibility of conserving in these areas water sufficient for the requirements of a city. We know, however, that with the large water supply of the Carcoar-Garland district there will be no difficulty whatever in conserving sufficient for artificial lakes, reservoirs, and for domestic and other purposes. It is stated by Mr. Wade, in his report, that a great deal of water would, after making provision under these heads, be available for irrigation purposes. The rainfall is 39 inches, and the altitude of the site is 2,270 feet above sea level, as contrasted with 1,500 feet at Tooma. Among other requirements in the site of a Federal Capital are a salubrious climate and a rarified atmosphere; and we can find the very finest atmosphere and climate, a sufficient rainfall, and magnificent soil, with building material equal to any in Australia, in this western district of New South Wales. At Carcoar-Garland, Millthorpe, Orange, or even at Wellington, there is a magnificent rainfall—rivers running through the territory, and land which will produce 40 bushels of wheat to the acre. I should like to read for the information of honorable members what was said by Mr. Oliver in regard to this western part of New South Wales:—

Although, perhaps, the water resources of Canobolas are inferior, in regard both to catchment area and head for gravitation, to those of the Upper Campbell's River for Bathurst, yet there is evidence to support the conclusion that they are fairly sufficient for an assumed population of 40,000, and would be capable, by auxiliary storage, of supplying a still greater population. Moreover, the superior rainfall of Canobolas (as much as 14 inches greater than that of Bathurst) becomes an important factor when comparing the catchments of Canobolas and Bathurst; while the same may be said of the facilities possessed by this site for providing an ample water supply for large bodies of workmen, and others employed on buildings, &c. The climate of Canobolas, from the superior altitude of its site, and its position on the fall of the plateau towards the Great Western Plains, is preferable to that of any western site, and I believe that the comparatively high rainfall of Canobolas is climatically beneficial, and in no way injurious to health.

A very long report was written by the late Mr. Oliver upon the suitability of the western district for a Federal Capital. He says:—

In regard to land values, the figures appended show the estimated cost of absolute resumption of the western sites as originally proposed:—

Canobolas (Orange). —Improved value of 64,700 acres (less 10,800 acres of Crown lands) outside Municipal boundaries
Improved value of lands within Municipal boundaries	592,426	0	0
Total	957,426	0	0

	233,880	0	0
Total	1,147,064	0	0

* NOTE.—This valuation omits the cost of compensation in connexion with Church and School lands held under lease, &c.

That, I think, is a refutation of those arguments used against the quality of the land in that district. There is land estimated as worth £6 per acre at Millthorpe, and it is grand agricultural soil, which will produce wheat such as the honorable member for Grey has seen in his own district. Then we are told by Mr. Oliver that the cost of the site would be £188,160, which is very much less indeed than the cost in the Canobolas district. When we go a little further west, still within the fifty-miles radius, we find that Mr. Oliver, in regard to Wellington, says:—

Wellington. —Improved value of 91,500 acres outside Municipal boundaries (less 15,800 acres of Crown lands), at £3 per acre
	226,830	0	0
Improved value of lands within Municipal boundaries	167,535	10	0
Total	394,365	10	0

Here is a very large area of Crown land that should be very acceptable to the people of Victoria, who are saying so much about the cost of the proposed Federal site. The lands outside, the Crown lands area are valued at £3 per acre. The land in the Wellington Valley is magnificent; it is a very rich chocolate soil. The yield of grain there is very much superior to anything in South Australia, or to the average in Victoria. One notable fact is that grain grown there has taken the gold medal in London for its superior quality. If honorable members sitting behind the Government wish to obtain a large area for closer settlement, there is no part of New South Wales that is more suitable than the district which I have the honour to represent, say, within the area described by Mr. Oliver at Wellington, or the country a little further on towards Werris Creek, going up to Cobbora, or the land between Cobbora and Dubbo. Most of that land is a short distance beyond the fifty-mile radius. So that in selecting a western site, we should have an almost unlimited area of first-class land surrounding the Federal city. I do not know of any part of Australia where we could obtain such a large area of land so suitable for settlement, and which from its superiority in quality should be so acceptable to the Commonwealth. It will be noticed, from Mr. Oliver's description, that a large area is what is called Church and School Land. It has not been taken up for settlement, because it was reserved for a specific purpose.

Mr. GROOM.—Is it still Crown land?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Yes, it is described as Church and School Land, though it is now held under lease.

Mr. GROOM.—It is not held by trustees for church purposes?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—No. The Church and School Lands Act of thirty or forty years ago disposed of all the revenues, and gave a pension of £300 a year to the clergymen who were interested, for which they surrendered their claims. But the lands are now held under lease, and are available for the purposes of a Federal Capital.

Mr. BROWN.—They became Crown lands after the passing of the Act which the honorable member has mentioned.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The fact that they are designated Church and School Lands is of some value, because it goes to show that they might have been taken up for settlement except for their reservation for a particular purpose. Land that was reserved for church and school purposes in the early days is, as honorable members may well suppose, very superior indeed, considering that the church then wielded such influence in the management of affairs at head-quarters. I should like also to direct attention to the report concerning the Carcoar-Garland site. Mr. Oliver estimates the cost of absolute resumption—

For the whole area, including Church and School lands, but excluding town of Carcoar—at £200,000; or, at £3 per acre, for 50,000 acres, outside municipal boundaries, and £35,000 for lands within those boundaries, £185,000.

Those figures allude to the site which has been specially selected as representing the western district. There is no reason whatever why honorable members should not consider the claims of any site in this district that would be equally as good and as convenient as that of Carcoar-Garland. Canobolas is a most excellent site, and one that is deserving of considerable attention; but I should particularly like to say something for Wellington. Honorable members have referred to a considerable extent to Tooma, where the altitude runs from 1,200 feet up to 1,500 feet. But there is a much finer climate in the district of Wellington. Close at hand is Mount Arthur, which, as may be supposed, was named after the Duke of Wellington. The mountain overlooks the town. The situation is not at all unlike that of Montreal, where Mount Royal, from which the name of the city is derived, is close to it. There is a magnificent range of hills around the site. Perhaps that is the reason why it was not seriously considered by Mr. Oliver. It was not that the soil was inferior, or that the water supply was not adequate, but that the altitude within the town was not deemed by him to be commendable. But if climate is to be considered, there is a very much finer climate in the district of Wellington than at Tooma. The people there are healthy; disease is not prevalent, and persons with weak lungs are sent there because of the salubrity of the climate. Major Barton wrote a report setting forth the case for Wellington, and I should like to say something about it, because this document throws some light upon other sites, and also because it affords information of a most acceptable character in the interests of those who are advocating the selection of a site in the western district. Mr. Oliver says—

The climate of Wellington is described by a very good judge, Mr. C. H. Barton, as one of the healthiest climates in the world, though for four months in the year the heat is very great.

But it is not anything like so great as the heat at Adelaide, and I suppose that there is no finer climate in Australia than that of Adelaide.

For a period of eighteen years, the records of the Government Astronomer, show that during the Summer quarter, the mean temperature is 73°3; during the Autumn quarter, 53°3; during the Winter quarter, 49°7; and during the Spring quarter, 68 deg. The greatest recorded temperature reached 105°9, and the lowest 19.

Then, with respect to the rainfall, the report says—

The quarterly rainfalls during the same period are very regularly distributed, being 5°83, 6°30, 5°58, and 6°84 inches, showing for the year a rainfall of very nearly 25 inches.

It has to be remembered that that rain falls upon magnificent soil, at regular periods of the year, when it is most wanted.

The altitude of Wellington is 995 feet, and that of the proposed Federal territory averages 1,200 feet.

That is about the altitude of Tooma.

On this subject the evidence of the witness above quoted, Mr. Barton, went to show that the pretensions of Wellington to possess the Seat of Government depend mainly on the construction of the railway from Werris Creek, on the Northern line, to Wellington, and that, without that connexion, Wellington could not be considered accessible, so far as Brisbane is concerned—an objection which, in the opinion of the witness, is common to all the western sites; but that, if connected with Broken Hill and Werris Creek, Wellington would be a singularly central site, and would be very accessible to Adelaide, Brisbane, and Melbourne. On this head, he produced the annexed Tables and Report.

These figures have been used by quite a number of plagiarists without acknowledgment. I have read newspaper articles published in all the States in which they have been quoted, but in very few of those articles have they been used for the purpose of advocating the western sites. They were brought forward to show that this large area was adjacent to the railways that might run from Western Australia, viâ South Australia, from South Australia, and from Queensland, into New South Wales, were a line built right across from Werris Creek, say, to the western line touching either at Dubbo or Wellington, and going on to Canobolas, if honorable members pleased, or on further to Carcoar-Garland. The district is so centrally situated that, were lines constructed in a judicious fashion on the western side of the Blue Mountains, one could go from Queensland to Victoria without going to Sydney. When these lines have been constructed to Cobar and Broken Hill, viâ Wilcannia, one will be able to go from the other States right through to the Federal city without touching at either Melbourne or Sydney. We should have a city all to ourselves right in the centre of New South Wales, and people from Brisbane could run right through to the Federal city, cutting off some 90 or 100 miles by avoiding Sydney. I refer honorable members to the following "Table of distances from Wellington railway station to Adelaide, Brisbane, Melbourne, Sydney, and Newcastle by railway lines now in existence":—

From Wellington—

To Adelaide viâ Melbourne ...	1,020½ miles.
To Brisbane viâ Sydney ...	971 miles.
To Melbourne viâ Blayney ...	537½ miles.
To Sydney viâ Bathurst ...	248 miles.
To Newcastle viâ Sydney ...	350 miles.

I specially direct the attention of honorable members who have had so much to say upon the necessity of centrality to the following table of distances, because they will gather from it that we have here the most central part of the settled portion of the Commonwealth:—

Table of distance from Wellington railway station to Adelaide, Brisbane, Melbourne, Sydney, and Newcastle, with proposed connexions from Cobar to Broken Hill and Wellington to Werris Creek:—

From Wellington—

To Adelaide viâ Cobar ...	*784 miles.
To Brisbane viâ Werris Creek ...	589 miles.
To Melbourne viâ Blayney ...	537½ miles.
To Sydney viâ Bathurst ...	248 miles.
To Newcastle viâ Werris Creek ...	*272 miles.

*Approximate distances.

The Public Works Committee of New South Wales has recently held quite a number of sittings in that district, and they have reported that if a line is constructed from Werris Creek to the western line, it will open up magnificent country in the locality of Cobbora. I am happy to be able to say that this large district is also in my electorate. The electorate covers 10,000 square miles, and though I speak with some little modesty, I may say that I think it is really the finest district in New South Wales. All the lines to which I have referred are within easy reach of these magnificent agricultural districts. Cobbora has not yet been established as an agricultural district, simply through lack of railway communication. When a railway is constructed from Werris Creek across to the western line, it will bring the land in that district under settlement. I have already referred honorable members to the yields of crops grown. I have said that last year, in one or two cases, the yield of wheat went up to as much as 60 bushels an acre, and the average yield of the district was just upon 30 bushels to the acre. Throughout this district of mine there is grown the finest grain produced in the world. The Wellington flour secured the gold medal in London, and I mention that with some pride, because, although South Australia has hitherto always been the State which has produced the finest flour, this district secured the gold medal against even South Australia. All kinds of climate may be found in that wide district of the west. After passing the Blue Mountains there is a dip from 200 to 300 feet above the sea and up again to Canobolas, or, rather, to Orange—because Canobolas has an altitude of some 5,000 feet—to 3,000 feet. There is there to be found a magnificent climate and soil, and an abundant water supply. When I am talking to honorable members who are practical men, it is unnecessary to enter upon a long dissertation upon the possibilities of water conservation in a district in some parts of which there is a rainfall of 39 inches, and rivers running in all directions. The honorable member for Eden-Monaro smiles at this, but I am not speaking of Dalgety. I admit that the Snowy River is a magnificent river, but there are possibilities in the western district to which I refer which are not to be surpassed in any other part of Australia. I have heard honorable members ascend to poetry in describing some of the suggested sites; but when one honorable member last night, in speaking about the western district, said it has not the undulations to be found in some other parts, I could not help thinking that Washington and St. Petersburg were established in swamps, and that Amsterdam was also established in a swamp, and that the Royal palace was built upon piles. I might refer honorable members to other great cities of the world that have been built on sites which are not to be compared with any of those in New South Wales which have been brought under the notice of the Committee. I am glad to see that the Postmaster-General approves of what I am saying. The honorable gentleman knows that the garden of Australia is to be found over the Blue Mountains, and that if honorable members desire to possess a Federal Capital which will do honour to the Commonwealth, they should establish it there.

Mr. MAHON.—Put it at Wellington; that is the place for it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The honorable gentleman's lungs are not too strong, and I say that the atmosphere of Wellington would prolong his life by twenty years. We know that Mr. Cecil Rhodes had but one lung when he went out to South Africa with the proverbial half-crown in his pocket, and in time he became a millionaire, and his lung was healed, because he lived in a dry atmosphere, similar to that to be found on Mount Arthur and the mountainous country around Wellington. I do not seriously propose that the Seat of Government shall be located at Wellington, but I have referred to the district round about that town in order to show what magnificent country would be adjacent to the Federal Capital, if it were established on the Carcoar-Garland site. Major C. H. L. Barton, writing on this subject, said—

Keeping in view the all-important part that coal plays in maritime warfare and commercial intercourse with other nations, also the desirability of our chief coaling centres being as near as possible to the point where, in time of war, the Federal troops would be mobilized (viz., the Federal Capital), it is a matter of vital importance, in the consideration of the question of accessibility, that the Wellington proposed site is (viz. Werris Creek) only 272 miles from Newcastle, and 152 miles from Lithgow. Due consideration under this section must also be given to the fact that, under our present arrangement of Colonial Governments, the respective railway systems of the Colonies have been devised and constructed with a view to the development and advancement of each individual Colony; but it is reasonable to conclude that Federated Australia will gradually merge these railway systems into one, and that the future extension of the main trunk lines will become a national undertaking.

I had no intention of speaking at such length; but, in conclusion, I wish to say that the people of New South Wales ask this Parliament to establish the Seat of Government within the western district. That district is just beyond the 100-miles radius provided for in the Constitution. It possesses good land, so that it is likely to become closely settled; a magnificent water supply can be given to it; its climate is excellent; and its selection would give general satisfaction to the people of the State. The Premier of New South Wales is now evincing considerable interest in this matter, and although it is quite possible that he may be routed at the poll, those who are likely to succeed him in office have pledged themselves to place the territory of which I am speaking at the disposal of the Federal Government for the establishment of the Seat of Government. All the Crown land known as the Church and School land within that district will be made available to us. Mr. Carruthers, who is likely to succeed Mr. Waddell as Premier of New South Wales, has stated that he would be willing to place at the disposal of the Federal Government the land to which I refer.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Mr. Carruthers has said that he is strongly in favour of the Federal Capital being established in the Monaro district.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—If the western site is not chosen, I shall be in favour of establishing the Seat of Government at Dalgety, because of the excellence of the land there, the magnificent climate of the district, its scenery, of which Mount Kosciusko is such a glorious feature, and the splendid water supply which can be obtained. Therefore, if the western site is rejected, I shall vote for the next best site, which, in my opinion, is the Dalgety site. That site is within about 100 miles of the coast, and would, I think, be accepted by the people of New South Wales in the event of the western site being rejected. But I shall support the western site so long as I consider that it has a chance of being selected. I do not wish to stand in the way of a settlement of the question. If the roots of the Commonwealth Administration are established in Melbourne, there will be great difficulty in transplanting them elsewhere.

Mr. FISHER.—Is the honorable member only reason for wishing for the settlement of the question his fear of the influence of Melbourne?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—No; but that is one of my reasons. I might keep honorable members here all night if I stated all my reasons. I would point out, however, that the Government now rent a number of buildings in various parts of Melbourne, and they are receiving propositions from various quarters for the renting of other buildings. The result will be that before very long the private individuals and companies concerned will be using all their influence to keep the Seat of Government in Melbourne, and the Ministry will have a very plausible argument for postponing its removal elsewhere, in the fact that they will have entered into leases, having many years to run, of buildings for which they pay very high rents. That reason will, of course, commend itself to honorable members who, on the ground of economy, allege that it is necessary to wait a few years before building Federal offices in a Capital of our own. I am opposed to the Seat of Government remaining in Melbourne, as I should be opposed to its being placed in Sydney, for several reasons, of which the influence of the local press over the Parliament is one of the chief, while the second is the advantage which is given to the State in whose capital the Federal Parliament meets. At the present time the representatives of Victoria could, at a critical moment, be all brought to the House within about fifteen minutes, and distant States, such as Western Australia and Queensland, whose members have to reside in Melbourne almost permanently, are also well represented. But the representatives of South Australia and New South Wales, who go to their homes at week ends, cannot always be recalled in less time than some days. Consequently Victoria has an advantage over New South Wales, which, in my opinion, is equal to an additional representation of three members; and she has a proportional advantage over South Australia. If we had a Seat of Government of our own, however, none of the States would have an advantage over the others in this respect. In conclusion, I urge that the compact made at the Premiers' Conference with the Premier of New South Wales should be carried out, and the Seat of Government located within that State at a suitable site, as near as possible to the 100 miles radius of Sydney. I think that I have shown that the most suitable site available is at Lyndhurst, in the western district.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I regret that this question has apparently been approached by some honorable members without a due acquaintance with the Constitution, and, perhaps, also without a full knowledge of the compact entered into at the time the Constitution Bill was submitted to a referendum. When the first Bill was presented to the people of Australia, no condition was made with regard to the Capital.

Mr. POYNTON.—And yet the people of New South Wales voted in favour of the Bill.

Mr. CONROY.—Yes; but not to the extent of the statutory majority. We must suppose that the condition imposed by the Parliament of New South Wales had the approval of the whole of the people. I quite admit that legislation has been passed in this Parliament which does not represent the will of the people; but if the honorable member were in favour of such legislation, he would contend that it was legislation by the people for the people, and, therefore, we must apply the same rule to the Federal referendum. In order to induce the people of New South Wales to accept the Constitution Bill, a proposal was made that the Capital should be located in that State. It is true that local jealousies prevented the Premiers from fixing upon Sydney, which, as the oldest capital city in Australia, should have been selected. From my point of view, the question should have been left open; but we can deal only with the facts now presented to us. There is no doubt that a great many people in New South Wales thought that the Seat of Government should have been established at Sydney, and I am rather inclined to think that if the question had been submitted to the whole of the people of Australia, that site would have been chosen. However, we are now called upon to select a site in New South Wales, but distant not less than 100 miles from Sydney. I should like to draw attention to the wording of section 125 of the Constitution, which shows what was in the minds of the Premiers of the States who met in conference. I contend that the clear impression was that the Capital would be located at Sydney unless some limitation were imposed, and that, in order to prevent Sydney from being chosen, it was stipulated that the Capital city should be situated not less than 100 miles from that place. If any idea had been entertained that the Capital might be located on the border of New South Wales the section would have been differently worded, and would probably have contained a provision that the Capital should be situated within the State of New South Wales, and be distant not less than 100 miles from the border of New South Wales and Victoria. It was clearly considered that an advantage would be conferred on New South Wales, because provision was made that such portion of the Federal territory as might consist of Crown land should be granted to the Commonwealth without any payment whatever.

Mr. SKENE.—That was in consideration of the Capital being established in New South Wales.

Mr. CONROY.—That was in consideration of the State of New South Wales receiving some advantage from the establishment of the Federal Capital within its territory.

Mr. SKENE.—That is a different interpretation.

Mr. CONROY.—In order to show that it was supposed that an advantage would be conferred on New South Wales, I would point out that it was further provided that, in return for the concession which New South Wales was to receive, the Parliament should sit at Melbourne until it met at the Seat of Government. Why were these two concessions made by New South Wales, unless it was thought that the Capital Site would be chosen as near as possible to Sydney, outside of the 100-miles limit? I think that if we look at the provision in the proper spirit, we shall recognise that that was the idea and intention of those who drafted the section.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does not the honorable and learned member think that it would have been better to establish the Federal Capital at Sydney rather than at some place beyond the 100-miles limit?

Mr. CONROY.—My own opinion is that it would have been infinitely better to establish the permanent Seat of Government at either Sydney or Melbourne. These two cities are undoubtedly destined to become the greatest commercial centres in Australia, and I do not approve of a Federal Capital being created merely as a place of meeting for Members of Parliament. However, honorable members do not accept that view, and I do not think it is necessary to argue the matter.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—We have to abide by the Constitution.

Mr. CONROY.—Exactly; we are bound by the Constitution, and we cannot, except at considerable difficulty, secure its amendment. It is very questionable whether it would be worth our while to incur the dangers to which we should be exposed if we were to attempt to amend the Constitution in order to secure the adoption of Sydney as the Seat of Government of the Commonwealth. We are not called upon to discuss that question at present, because we are proceeding to act in conformity with the Constitution. In return for the concession to New South Wales regarding the Capital, it was agreed that the Parliament should meet, as it has been meeting, at Melbourne, and that all the Crown lands within the Federal territory should be granted by the New South Wales Government free of charge, and it is obvious that it was intended that if any advantage could be given to New South Wales by the selection of the Capital site within her borders, then only such a site should be selected as would confer that advantage upon her. It may be that the advantage will not be a very valuable one. Some honorable members assert that wherever the Federal Capital may be situated no advantage will be conferred upon New South Wales. That, however, is hardly the question. The point is whether, in the opinion of the people of New South Wales, any advantage would be conferred upon them. As they have agreed to pay the price, and are already paying part of that price, they are now asking that in the selection of the site the advantage of locality shall, as far as possible, be conferred upon them. Viewed from this standpoint, the selection of a site, such as Tooma, which, by the shortest means of communication, is situated 430 miles from Sydney, as against only 270 miles from Melbourne, would, in the minds of the great majority of the people of New South Wales, involve a violation of the spirit of the compact.

Mr. SKENE.—The honorable and learned member's figures are wrong. We should have to go round by Cootamundra if we were proceeding from Melbourne.

Mr. CONROY.—Oh, no; persons travelling from Melbourne to Tooma would go by way of Tallangatta. A coach journey would be involved in either case. Even if railways were constructed to bridge the sixty miles from Tallangatta to Tooma, and the fifty-eight miles from Germananton to Tooma, the distances would still be 430 miles from Sydney, and 280 miles from Melbourne.

Mr. SKENE.—Tooma is 368 miles from Melbourne by way of Cootamundra and Tumut.

Mr. CONROY.—But, surely, it is not to be supposed that persons travelling from Melbourne would proceed by rail 100 miles up and 100 miles back again, because a coach journey would have to be undertaken even if the roundabout route were selected. I am taking into consideration the existing lines of railway and the practicable routes by which the mails are now conveyed, and there is a great deal to be said in favour of that system of measurement. If the honorable member had ever been through that country he would know—

Mr. SKENE.—How far is it from Sydney to Tumut?

Mr. CONROY.—It is about 330 miles.

Mr. SKENE.—The exact distance is 322 miles.

Mr. CONROY.—Speaking of this question, Mr. Chesterman says—

The Yass-Tumut-Welaregang loop line would bring the present suggested site within, approximately, 341 miles of Sydney, while the Bowning-Colac-Gadara-Welaregang loop would bring it within, approximately, 360 miles of Sydney.

I have no hesitation in affirming that a railway could not be constructed through that country under £25,000 per mile. If a line were built direct from Yass to Tumut, through that country, its cost would not be less than £50,000 per mile.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Such a railway would be practically impossible.

Mr. CONROY.—Yes. I was engaged in surveying that district for some time, so that I know what I am speaking about. When I mention that surveying work costs 100 per cent. more than the ordinary scale of fees in that country, although it is lightly timbered, and simply because it is so precipitous and hilly, honorable members will understand its character. Consequently, I put railway construction quite out of the question. Nobody who has ever been through that country will imagine that it is practicable to build a railway through it without tunnelling pretty well the whole distance. It is scarcely necessary, therefore, to discuss the matter from that standpoint. I ask those honorable members who are anxious to see effect given to the spirit of the Constitution, to regard it from that standpoint. If any advantage is to be gained by New South Wales from having the Capital established in her midst, that advantage should be conceded as some return for the Parliament having met in Melbourne during the past three years. Whilst I admit that the site upon the Upper Murray is one of the most picturesque which can be found, and that some of the land surrounding it is very rich, I still think that honorable members who speak lightly of the work of constructing a railway from Tumut to Tooma, have not considered the real difficulties to be encountered. I would merely point out that if a line were built from a point situated ten miles to the northern side of Tumut, up the Gilmore Creek, and then down again, it would be running practically the whole time upon an old volcanic range. At one time, no doubt, there was a considerable area of that country, but it has been washed away, so that to-day only the remains of the old volcanic range exist. Starting from an altitude of 1,000 feet, it would be necessary for any railway which might be built to rise to a height of 3,270 feet.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Is the honorable and learned member satisfied that that is the altitude?

Mr. CONROY.—I am accepting the statement of Mr. Chesterman. When I was asked some question in regard to this matter last session, I said that the altitude was about 3,000 feet. Mr. Chesterman, however, declares that the height of the gap above sea-level is 3,270 feet. That altitude was taken by means of an aneroid, and would probably be within 10 feet of the exact height. I repeat that if a railway were constructed it would require to rise 2,000 feet in the short distance of twenty-five miles, and to fall again to the same extent upon the other side. When I tell the Committee that the country to be traversed is all of a volcanic nature—that it is practically a narrow range—honorable members will understand that the work would present difficulties which, whilst not insuperable to an engineer, would involve such an enormous expenditure as would practically place it outside the region of probability.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Would it not be always a slow line?

Mr. CONROY.—I am bound to say that on account of the cuttings and short curves which would be necessary—certainly it would be impossible to have more than ten chains curves—it would be a very slow line to travel upon, and a very expensive one to construct. Speakin' generally, I do not think that such a line could be built for less than the estimated cost of constructing a railway upon the Victorian side. I know that some time ago a rough survey was made of a railway seventy miles in length, starting from Tallangatta, and that its cost was set down at £13,000 per mile.

Mr. SKENE.—I was informed recently by the Railway Department that it could now be constructed for £6,000 per mile.

Mr. CONROY.—If that be so, all I can say is that it is an extremely moderate estimate. Personally, I would prefer to accept the figures which were given in the first instance, because, moderate as is the original estimate in connexion with a railway, our experience is that it is invariably exceeded by the actual expenditure.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member is referring to the estimate of 1884, which is known as our "boom" estimate. It has since been reduced by 50 per cent.

Mr. CONROY.—Of course the honorable member knows that country very well, whereas it is many years since I passed through it. Nevertheless, I think that such a railway would be fairly expensive. Even if it could be built for £13,000 per mile I am confident that a line upon the other side could not be constructed for less than double that amount.

Mr. SKENE.—To which railway, on the other side, does the honorable and learned member refer?

Mr. CONROY.—To the line from Gaddara Gap via the Gilmore Valley, thence round the range by Laurel Hill.

Mr. SKENE.—Would that line cost more to construct than the other?

Mr. CONROY.—Undoubtedly.

Mr. KENNEDY.—One horse will draw 15 cwt. in a team from Tumut to Tumberumba.

Mr. CONROY.—The fact remains that, within a distance of twenty-five miles, the railway would require to rise 2,000 feet, and to fall again. If the honorable member can overcome that difficulty I will enter into a partnership with him, and we shall be able to revolutionize the carrying trade of the world.

Mr. SKENE.—There is a railway over the Alps in Switzerland.

Mr. CONROY.—What was the expenditure per mile upon its construction? I presume that the honorable member does not say that this line could be constructed without tunnelling?

Mr. SKENE.—I should tunnel wherever the gradient rendered it necessary to do so.

Mr. CONROY.—I do not say that it is impossible to construct this railway. All I contend is that it is impracticable, because of the expenditure that would be incurred, and because of the small traffic which it would carry.

Mr. SKENE.—I do not agree with the honorable and learned member.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member will find scarcely any engineer in New South Wales or Victoria to agree with him. I would further point out that if this Parliament decides to acquire any area along the border of Victoria, or any other State, it will be doing something which section 123 of the Constitution clearly prohibits it from doing. That section provides—

The Parliament of the Commonwealth may, with the consent of the Parliament of a State and the approval of the majority of the electors of a State, voting upon the question, increase, diminish or otherwise alter the limits of the State upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed on, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any increase or diminution, or alteration of territory in relation to any State affected.

It will thus be seen that it was never contemplated that any alteration should be effected in the boundaries of a State. In any case, we could not do what has been suggested without first getting the consent of the Parliament of New South Wales; and, secondly, the approval of its people. Nearly twelve months ago I pointed this out to the House when a proposal was submitted to extend the Federal territory from the Murrumbidgee to the Murray. The more I have considered the matter since, the more confirmed have I become in my opinion. Last night the honorable member for South Sydney also pointed out the effect of that provision. We can only overcome that section by refusing to extend our boundary to the Murray—

Mr. SKENE.—By making a chain road between.

Mr. CONROY.—As the honorable member says, by making a chain road between. If we did anything of that character, we should conclusively show that we were violating the spirit of the Constitution. If we left a strip of land between the Victorian border and the Federal territory, it would clearly demonstrate that we were contravening the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If we left such a strip of land, it would be urged that the Federal territory was hemmed in by New South Wales.

Mr. CONROY.—I am certain that it is beyond our power to alter the limits of any State. The Constitution distinctly declares that we cannot increase the area of a State.

Mr. CROUCH.—Neither can we diminish it.

Mr. CONROY.—If we touched the boundary we should also diminish the limits of the State.

Mr. McLEAN.—Even if we selected a site in the centre of the State we should alter its limits.

Mr. CONROY.—I am sure that if the honorable member consults members of the legal profession he will find that my statement is well founded. I have no doubt that the High Court would place this interpretation on the provision. The wording of section 123 is so clear that it cannot be avoided. It was for that reason that it did not appear to me that we ought to enter into the question of the selection of Tooma as fully as we otherwise might have done. A certain price has been paid by New South Wales to secure the advantage of having the Capital within its boundaries.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—A certain price?

Mr. CONROY.—Yes; the price paid was that the Parliament should meet at Melbourne until the establishment of the Federal Capital.

Mr. McLEAN.—Victoria has paid £70,000 for that privilege.

Mr. CONROY.—I do not propose to discuss that question, because I have from the first held that such a provision should not have been placed in the bond. It is in the Constitution, however, and we have to deal with things as they are. We must recognise the compact, not as we, in the light of the fuller experience of to-day, would have made it, but as agreed to by the two great contracting parties. I ask that it should be as far as possible carried out. In my opinion, Tooma is not an accessible site, and many years must elapse before it will be connected with the railway system of the State. Accessibility is one of the chief factors to be considered in making a selection, and the only reason why I do not place Dalgety first in the list in this respect is that, while some honorable members say that it will be connected with the Victorian railway system by a railway line running from Bairnsdale, it does not seem to me that such a railway is within the realm of practicable work.

Mr. POYNTON.—Why put accessibility first?

Mr. CONROY.—I deem it to be the first consideration, and shall give my reasons for that belief. If the Capital be not established in a readily accessible position the whole of the correspondence of the Commonwealth will be delayed sometimes for half-a-day, or more. Are we to subject the people to this disability, merely because honorable members have a love of the artistic, and are anxious to be able, on leaving Parliament House after their day's labour, to survey some beauty spot in the neighbourhood? We are not to make a selection from a purely artistic point of view. Art arises only when a nation has reached a high stage of civilization, and our first consideration should be the interests of the great bulk of the people.

Mr. POYNTON.—Are we to legislate for the convenience of legislators, or for the convenience of the people?

Mr. CONROY.—We certainly ought not to study the mere convenience of honorable members. I for one have no desire to consider the interests of legislators by voting for the selection of a site merely because it would be a pleasant, pretty, and comfortable place in which to reside. My idea of a Legislature is that it should be composed of a body of men who meet together for the purposes of business. If they can carry on the business of the country, and, at the same time, devote a certain degree of attention to artistic surroundings, well and good; but mere beauty of surroundings should not be the main factor in the determination of this question. One of the reasons why I have a liking for Dalgety is that it is fairly accessible, and that if it were selected, New South Wales would have no serious cause of complaint, because she would be called upon to construct only a very short line, forming part of a railway of which the State Parliament has already practically approved. The selection of that site would therefore not be open to the same objection as would attach to the choosing of one of the other suggested sites which the New South Wales Parliament has never even thought of connecting with the railway system of the State. If we consider Dalgety from the point of view of water supply, it unquestionably stands before Tooma, or any other site. No doubt Tooma possesses a fairly good water supply, but its climate is practically the same as that of Table Top, a site which has already been rejected by this House.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Who says that it is the same?

Mr. CONROY.—I do, and the honorable member knows that my statement is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is eighty miles nearer the snow line.

Mr. CONROY.—Its elevation is somewhat less than that of Table Top. Albury is situated in a valley, and Welaregang is just at the entrance to it. I may tell the honorable member that maize and pumpkins and tobacco will grow fairly well in the valley. Tumut is also a place at which tobacco might be grown, but at certain seasons the climate is not that which one would select as the most desirable. I pointed this out when the matter was under consideration last session, but my remarks were not treated as being worthy of that attention which I thought they ought to receive. Subsequently a number of honorable members visited Tumut, and on that occasion found the weather so hot that most of them have since told me that my description of it was a perfectly fair one. We know that that one visit caused a number of honorable members to change their opinion as to the suitability of that site. If honorable members visit Welaregang, or any part of the Upper Murray district, they will find that the valley is very close during the summer season. I spent some time in the district, and found no difference between the climate there and that of Tumut. The mountains are nearer Welaregang than Tumut, but both places are situated in a valley, and during the summer it is very close.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—One trip to Welaregang would have the same effect on honorable members as the inspection of Tumut had upon those who formed the parliamentary party.

Mr. CONROY.—They will find it extremely close at night. That was my experience, although I slept in a tent.

Mr. PAGE.—The same statement would apply to Melbourne.

Mr. CONROY.—In some respects that is so.

Mr. POYNTON.—It would certainly be true of Sydney.

Mr. CONROY.—Quite so; I should not have mentioned the point but for the fact that a number of honorable members visited Welaregang at the most favorable time of the year.

Mr. FOWLER.—It was raining during our inspection; there was not much pleasure about the trip.

Mr. CONROY.—I have referred to the climate at Tooma, because it has been suggested that it is perfect.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—There is not much wrong with any of the sites, so far as climate is concerned.

Mr. CONROY.—I confess that, had there been a ready means of communication with Dalgety, I should have been disposed to favour its selection, although I should have thought that in choosing it we might, perhaps, be going a little beyond the spirit of the bond.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is only thirty miles from Cooma.

Mr. CONROY.—Yes. The construction of a line to Dalgety has, I have already mentioned, been approved by the State Parliament; but when the bond was entered into it was never imagined that New South Wales would be called upon to construct a railway line to the Federal Capital. No exception could be taken of that ground, however, to the selection of Dalgety, because I feel satisfied that a railway will be constructed to it as part of a scheme to eventually connect Bombah with the State railway system. Therefore the objection which I have to the selection of Tooma does not apply to Dalgety. But in spite of the last-named site being pre-eminent in the matter of water supply, I think that it labours under other disabilities which debar its selection. Honorable members coming from Victoria to the Federal Capital would have, for scores of years, to travel on the main line as far as Goulburn and then to travel by the branch line to Cooma.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not for scores of years.

Mr. CONROY.—I am afraid that would be the case. I do not think that if Dalgety were selected a railway line would be constructed, in our time, from Bairnsdale over the mountains to the Federal Capital.

Mr. PAGE.—What would be the cost of such a line?

Mr. CONROY.—Over £20,000 per mile.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I should like to have a contract to make it at that rate.

Mr. CONROY.—I could make such a contract pay, provided that I should not be called upon to run any engines over the line.

Mr. PAGE.—Does not the honorable member think that £20,000 a mile would be quite sufficient to cover the cost?

Mr. CONROY.—Many railways have cost double that amount per mile. I think it would be cheaper in the long run to pay even more than £20,000 a mile for the construction of the line, in order to secure a thoroughly reliable one. If the line were well built, a saving would be effected both in speed and haulage.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—What is the greatest height over which a railway line from Bairnsdale would have to be carried?

Mr. CONROY.—It is not so much one height, as a succession of rises, that would have to be surmounted, whilst the small rivers running down to the coast would also have to be bridged. If Lyndhurst were selected, no expense would be incurred in the matter of railway construction, and that in itself is a very important factor. I agree with the right honorable member for Swan, who said that the climate of Lyndhurst was probably better than that of any of the other sites.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think I said that. I said that they were about equal.

Mr. CONROY.—Then I will take it at that. I would draw the attention of honorable members, who are anxious to secure closer settlement in the Federal territory, to the fact that the area of good land in the neighbourhood of Lyndhurst is certainly greater than in the vicinity of Dalgety.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Is there any good land around Dalgety?

Mr. CONROY.—Some of the land in the neighbourhood is good.

Mr. KENNEDY.—A few garden patches.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There are two stations in the district, which comprise 100,000 acres of good land. Are they garden patches?

Mr. CONROY.—It has been pointed out that, so far as good land is concerned, a greater area can be obtained here than at any of the other sites. The report of the right honorable member for Swan was an extremely fair one, that gentleman appearing to be absolutely free from prejudice or bias. There is another reason why Lyndhurst may be very favorably considered. I think that the right honorable member for Swan will agree that at Lyndhurst there could be obtained a far better water supply than would appear from the reports. The supply has been put at the low estimate of 8 per cent., but this was only calculated on the rainfall of Lyndhurst itself. On the true catchment area, above Lynd-hurst, the rainfall, I should say, is nearly 10 inches more than at the township. The estimate of 8 per cent. is, in my opinion, extremely moderate, in view of the allowance of 32 per cent. at Yan Yean, and 50 per cent. at Prospect. I am informed, however, that the rain gauges are not numerous enough to afford a thoroughly accurate record; and, therefore, I would place the estimate at half, or 25 per cent., which should give an enormously increased number of gallons over the estimates which have been supplied. It seems to me that, under the circumstances, Lyndhurst offers many advantages in the matter of climate, accessibility, and good soil; and I do not know what further advantages are required. I cannot say that I agree with honorable members who favour Tooma simply because of the picturesqueness of the locality. If honorable members wish to have merely a pleasure resort, it would be far better for them to advocate that site merely on that ground, and not attempt to show that it is a place suitable for the transaction of parliamentary business.

Mr. CARPENTER.—That is only one of the claims on behalf of Tooma.

Mr. CONROY.—But in all other respects Tooma seems to fall behind the other sites. It certainly is not very accessible.

Mr. CARPENTER.—It can be approached up the Murray Valley quite easily.

Mr. CONROY.—I have already dealt with that aspect of the suitability of the Tooma site. Under the circumstances, there appear to be only Dalgety and Lyndhurst from which we may make a choice. The Federal Capital ought to be on the main railway line between Sydney and Melbourne—it should be as accessible as possible. Although Melbourne presents all the attractions of a city, we do not find that members of the Commonwealth Parliament make their homes here.

Mr. TUDOR.—What site does the honorable and learned member regard as the best?

Mr. CONROY.—I have just said that the Federal Capital ought to be on the main line; but, as the question has been put to me, I may say that, in my opinion, a site near Lake George could, at a moderate expense, have been made suitable.

Mr. PAGE.—What about Yass?

Mr. CONROY.—That site is also on the main line, and Mr. Oliver, after careful consideration, placed it first in his estimation.

Mr. PAGE.—Then why does the honorable and learned member not advocate Yass?

Mr. CONROY.—Because Yass happens to be in my electorate, and were I to advocate it, honorable members might think that I was particularly interested. I have drawn attention to the advantages of Yass, and we have the reports of the Commissioners; and it is not for me to attempt to unduly influence honorable members. There is no doubt that, failing Dalgety or Lyndhurst, we might fall back on a place like Yass, which is within easy reach of the two great Capital cities, and is a place where the mails can be delivered every day without delay. This matter of mail delivery is most important. There will be a large amount of business at the Federal Capital, owing to the concentration of public offices; and there ought to be no more delay than is actually necessary in the delivery of the mails. Even in Melbourne we find complaints on this score; but to go to a place where there might be further delay would only be to create another cause of dissatisfaction. Once the Capital is chosen, difficulties of the nature I am now indicating could not be removed. If it is necessary to have a picturesque site, we might go to Lake George, a site which, as I have already said, could be made acceptable at a very moderate expenditure. In addition, Lake George would have the advantage of a harbor like Jervis Bay, which is the best on the whole coast of Australia, with the exception of Port Jackson. For these reasons, if there is any difficulty, some compromise might be arranged; and, even at this late stage, we ought to bear in mind that accessibility is the main consideration. Parliament will meet at the Federal Capital for the purpose of very serious business, and it would be wrong to make the selection with regard merely to picturesqueness. We must first consider accessibility and centrality; and having these assured, we ought to select the most pleasant spot available. It is unfortunate that when honorable members visited Lake George there had been a very severe drought throughout Australia, and the lake was dry; but similar conditions had not prevailed since the years 1837-9, when a drought of similar magnitude occurred. So far as I can learn, though I do not commit myself to this statement, there is a feasible scheme for conveying water into Lake George, and thus prevent a recurrence of the drying up.

Mr. FISHER.—That is a very difficult question to determine.

Mr. CONROY.—In the meantime, we might easily get a report, and thus place honorable members in a much better position to decide than they are in at present in regard to, say, Tooma.

Mr. FISHER.—The greatest engineers have been mistaken on such points.

Mr. CONROY.—It is a matter of levels. I have been assured that the levels taken are absolutely correct, and it has been reported by our own Commissioners that a gravitation water supply could be arranged to feed the lake. That, however, is a point on which I do not wish to dwell too much. What I desire to emphasize is that in our eagerness for the picturesque or the artistic, we are getting away from the useful. If honorable members are not disposed to spend the whole of their time in Melbourne, it would be even more difficult to induce them to stay in a place where there are not the advantages of a city. For many years the Federal Capital must be very little more than a village. We must bear in mind that the Constitution distinctly shows that whatever State advantage may attach to the determination of this question should be conferred on New South Wales; and the fact that as a price of Federation New South Wales was asked to give up the claims of the capital city of the mother State to be the place of meeting of the first Federal Parliament, alone shows that every consideration should be given to that State. If we exclude Yass and Lake George, we have Dalgety and Lyndhurst left; but I trust that, even at this late stage, the two former sites will receive consideration.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—I am one who believes that we should not only consider the letter, but also the spirit of the Constitution. I am unable, however, to follow the arguments of some of the representatives from New South Wales in their contention that the proposed Federal Capital should be as near Sydney as the Constitution permits. So far as I can remember, the request by New South Wales that the Federal Capital should be within her territory was almost entirely sentimental. It was not possible, as was apparent during the Convention debates, that the mother city of Australia, Sydney, should be the Capital of the Commonwealth. The concession that the Capital should be in New South Wales was merely made, because of the feeling of the New South Wales people that the older State should be honoured in that respect. I believe that the Federal Capital should not be established in one of the large commercial or industrial centres. In that respect both Sydney and Melbourne have been put out of the question, and very wisely so. Those of us who have been members of the Federal Parliament from its inception, must have found at various times that our presence in this large industrial and commercial centre has not always been fraught with the best results to legislation. No matter where we go, if we settle in a large industrial centre, it will be found that the same circumstances will surround the making of legislation. As a matter of fact, the two countries whose conditions most nearly resemble our own—namely, the United States and Canada—have both been compelled to remove their capitals from the large centres to what appeared at the time of the removal to be remote villages. The people of the United States were obliged to remove their capital first from Philadelphia, and latterly from New York, to a situation that was denounced at the time as being absolutely in the wilderness, and inaccessible. Again the people of Canada were compelled, by force of circumstances—the particular circumstance immediately operative being no less than the burning of Parliament buildings by an excited mob—to remove from Montreal to the present position at Ottawa. Those who consider what the surroundings of a legislative body ought to be, will not, I believe, have any hesitation in adopting the wise view taken by those who drew up our Constitution, which requires the Federal Capital to be somewhere other than in one of our large cities. In determining this question we have—more perhaps than in regard to any other question which we have yet discussed—a very great responsibility indeed devolving upon us. Any legislation that we have yet enacted can be altered by this Parliament. Alterations would necessitate no great sacrifices; and, as a matter of fact, any modification of any of our existing Acts would be undertaken by this Parliament with very little hesitation. But if we decide upon the Federal Capital, and the necessary work is undertaken; and if by-and-by we remove to the selected place and establish the Seat of Government there, the chances are that we shall have taken an irrevocable step in the history of Australia. However unwise the choice may have been, it will be one that in all probability the people of the Commonwealth will have to abide by. Therefore, we ought to be particularly careful to make the best choice possible. I regret a good many of the arguments that have been put forward; they have been too provincial. The honorable member for Robertson incidentally referred to the position of the Western Australian members in this Parliament, and made the astounding statement that those members were in some way responsible for the burden of taxation which New South Wales at present has to carry. That statement does not require any refutation from me. Those who wish to have a refutation of it will find it in the pages of Hansard, where the Tariff was being discussed. I think I can claim for myself, and for the other representatives of the Western State, that we approach this question with minds absolutely free from any State prejudice, or any consideration of conserving State interests. It is a very good thing indeed for the Commonwealth that we are able to approach the question in that way, and I can only regret that our numbers are not stronger, so as to counteract what appears to me to be the provincial spirit manifested by some honorable members—a spirit which may operate to the detriment of the best interests of the Commonwealth. It has been argued that the first consideration ought to be accessibility. I am unable to adopt that view. I have mentioned that Washington was selected as the site for the capital of the United States against the wishes of a large number of people residing in the large centres of population. I hold in my hand an extract from a document that will be found amongst the papers of the United States Senate. It was printed in 1889, and forms portion of a report of a committee of the Columbia Historical Society upon the question of the transfer of the Federal Capital to the Columbian territory. It says—

The national capital was created in the wilderness one hundred years ago. Its magnificent distances were once a name of thoughtless ridicule, but are none too ample for a thronging population in an age when distance is almost annihilated.

Washington, as we all know, is no longer inaccessible.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That passage is poetry; it is not prose.

Mr. FOWLER.—If it be poetry, it is the production of a very prosaic committee, and is simply an indication of the fact that statesmen will occasionally rise even to the poetic level. A hundred years hence, if an Australian Capital is established on some sunburnt uninteresting plain, such as is being argued for on the mere ground of accessibility, I can imagine people who are compelled to traverse that part of the country, asking in astonishment what the reasons were for making that miserable little village the Capital site. I can imagine also their disgust on being informed that what determined the selection was proximity to an existing railway line. I should say that of itself would, in the eyes of future generations of Australia, be a sufficient condemnation of this Parliament. I for one am not inclined to adopt the idea that accessibility should be the first consideration. It is merely a temporary consideration at the very best. Although some honorable members have referred scornfully to the necessity for having flying machines to reach some of the suggested Capital sites, I would remind them that perhaps in another hundred years flying machines may be just as common as bicycles, and that members of the Commonwealth Parliament may be wending their way to and from the Capital on flying machines, with much less danger to the lieges than is at present occasioned by the progress of some of the members of this House through the streets of Melbourne on their motor-cars. I regard other considerations as of much more importance than accessibility. Although I may be, and frequently am, put down as a very prosaic individual, and as belonging to a very matter-of-fact race, I certainly am one of those who think that scenery and natural environment in a Capital city ought to be a very important consideration indeed. We are told that if we require scenery, and a beautiful natural environment, those requirements will take us amongst the mountains. Proximity to mountains is, in the opinion of some honorable members, sufficient to put any site out of court. But I am not sure but that our duty as a national Parliament lies in the direction of establishing the Federal Capital—other things being equal—in mountainous territory. I will give my reasons for thinking so. Australia is usually regarded as a flat country. The more densely populated portions of Australia are undoubtedly flat districts. But an entirely erroneous impression of Australia as a whole is conveyed in this way. We have mountainous districts of very considerable extent indeed; and you would not have to draw a radius to any great distance from Kosciusko as a centre to include a mountainous territory equal to the whole of Switzerland. I think that any one who has read history will admit very willingly the part which the people of mountainous countries have played in the struggle for independence, and in the general advance of civilization. It seems to me, indeed, that if we leave out of consideration the work done by those nations who inhabit mountainous countries, we disregard very much of what has tended to the enlightenment and the freedom that we now enjoy. If that is so, it is a very fair argument that almost a duty lies upon this national Parliament to do something towards opening up our mountainous country, and planting there a population which will have the characteristics of those races who live in such surroundings. It is no mere accident that the people of these mountainous countries possess exceptional qualities.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Is the honorable member referring to the Scotch?

Mr. FOWLER.—I am not at present referring to any people in particular. I am able to give many more instances in support of what I say than the one which the honorable and learned member mentions. Examples are to be seen all over the world. If we take the people of Norway, of Switzerland, of the mountainous region in the magnificent little country of Montenegro, and lastly, but by no means least, if we take the people of Scotland, we shall find characteristics in the people of each of those nationalities that seem specially to belong to races who inhabit a mountainous country—a sturdy independence, a love of freedom, a virility which is not found in the same degree amongst races who inhabit flat areas. Let us take the description of the Bengalee, which is to be found in Macaulay's magnificent essay, and compare it with the well known character of the Gourkabs of Nepaul. We shall find a direct antithesis in the characteristics of those two races. They belong unquestionably to the same type, but the one race inhabiting the flat, low-lying districts of Bengal is but a miserable sample of humanity, while the Gourkabs are noted as possessing some of the finest characteristics to be found in any section of humanity. I think that at the present time we have a particularly favorable opportunity to open up and settle the mountainous country of Australia. If we can obtain what we require in those districts, and if we can succeed in attracting population to them, I, for one, will very readily put aside all other considerations. The mere question of accessibility, viewed in that light, is reduced to very unimportant dimensions indeed. If, in addition to this consideration we can secure natural beauty, a magnificent water supply, and splendid soil, I take it that we have very weighty evidence in favour of the selection of a site in the uplands of Australia. In the last Parliament I gave a vote, on these considerations, for the Monaro Tableland; but on this occasion I intend to alter my vote, without prejudice in the least to Monaro, because I still think a very great deal of that part of the country as a possible Federal Capital Site, but because there is another district which I think ought to be reported on by experts before we come to a final decision. It is a district which I admit has been brought forward at a somewhat late hour, but it is nevertheless entitled to some consideration. It has been said several times in this Chamber that the honorable member for Hume has a great many sites in his electorate, and that he has been particularly adroit in retreating from one to another as each has been discovered to be unfavorable, and that, finally in his selection of Tooma he has been able to secure the assistance of many who went on a picnic with him to that part of the country. I wish to say that I went on a visit to that part of the country, and it was not by any means a picnic. It was a very unpleasant experience indeed, so far as my personal comfort was concerned. I think that even the right honorable member for East Sydney, who designated the trip as a picnic, would have shown a good deal of dissatisfaction with the condition of the elements, and sometimes even with the eatables and drinkables that were placed before us on that trip. I feel sure that if I were to refer to the right honorable gentleman as having enjoyed a picnic on the top of Mount Canobolas on a certain occasion he would very strongly deprecate such a reference. A couple of years ago I saw the right honorable gentleman near the top of Mount Canobolas, sitting with a glass of gingerale in his hand, and a 5½d.-tin of corned beef on the ground in front of him. I am quite sure that that was no picnic for the right honorable gentleman. I can say honestly that the latest trip I took to inspect a Federal Capital Site was much more unpleasant than the one I made to the top of Mount Canobolas in company with the right honorable member for East Sydney. I considered it my duty to look at this portion of the country, but not on the representations of the honorable member for Hume. That honorable gentleman certainly spoke to me on the subject, as he had a right to do; but I candidly confess that if I had had only his word in recommendation of this particular district, I should have taken it with a considerable discount, knowing that the honorable gentleman is naturally interested in that part of the country, and that he would consequently be unconsciously biased in its favour. I went to Tooma largely on the recommendation of the honorable member for Grampians, who, like myself, is perfectly disinterested in this matter. I must say that I am exceedingly glad I took the trip, and saw for myself what is to be seen in that part of the Commonwealth. I have no desire to attempt a description of the visit, but I am bound to confess that in driving up that valley, and on to the rolling uplands of the Tooma site, I found country which, from a picturesque point of view, I never had expected to discover in Australia. The view of Mount Kosciusko to be had from the Welaregang station is one which I think few people, no matter how prosaic their temperament, could behold unmoved. Ridge after ridge rose in a gradual succession of terraces from the river, and above all towered the mighty mountain, his magnificent shoulders clothed with a beautiful mantle of white, which, when we saw it, was glittering in the sunshine, as if sprinkled with diamonds. I say that if a report on that site would show it to be favorable in all other respects, then the beauty of its environment is something of which this Parliament, Australia as a whole, and the future generations of Australia would have every reason to be proud. I do not absolutely pledge myself to that site. I desire to have the necessary expert evidence as regards detail of which no honorable member on an ordinary visit could make himself master. But, so far as I could see, we had there almost every requirement that could be desired for a Federal Capital. The land is magnificent, and the water supply would, I think, beyond question, be ample. Within a few miles we could find an almost tropical climate along the river flats, and on the uplands a bracing atmosphere that I have not experienced since I left Scotland. On the flats there could be produced nearly all forms of tropical vegetation.

Mr. MAUGER.—What is the climate like?

Mr. FOWLER.—There are all sorts of climate in that district. There is a tropical climate along the river flats, and we could rise to elevations where we should have a degree of cold which, as I say, I did not expect to find anywhere in Australia. As regards productions, we could have a corresponding variety. We could have almost tropical vegetation along the river flats; along the slopes we could have sub-tropical products; whilst on the uplands we should be able to grow vegetables and fruits of the colder zones which can only be raised with extreme difficulty in most portions of Australia. I take it that it is a most important consideration for us that, within a very few miles, we could, in that part of Australia, have such a large variety of climate and production. In conclusion I would urge upon the Committee that a further opportunity should be afforded honorable members for a close inspection of the locality. I feel sure that the visit would be one which honorable members would enjoy, and it would, I think, be to most of them the entry into a territory such as many imagine cannot be found in Australia at all. I shall vote as I have already indicated, not because I wish to commit myself to the selection of this site, but because I recognise that in another place a vote has been cast for Dalgety, and that if a majority can be secured for Tooma in this House, there will be that consideration given to the district which it deserves, and which I hope it will receive. I trust that in our deliberations on this important matter we shall continually keep before us our responsibility to the Commonwealth, and to the future generations of Australia.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—I do not propose to deal at any great length with this question, but since I possess a fairly intimate knowledge of the country comprised in the only three sites likely to receive practical consideration—the Murray site, the Tumut site, and the Lyndhurst site—I feel it incumbent upon me to reply to some of the statements which have been made about them. Considerable stress has been laid on the fact that the Tooma site has only recently been brought under notice. But may I remind honorable members that when the last Bill was before us, I, with others, voted for the Tumut site on the clear understanding that the Tooma site would be reported on.

Mr. FOWLER.—Why was not that site reported on?

Mr. KENNEDY.—It may have been because of the native modesty of the then Minister of Home Affairs, in whose electorate Tooma is situated, and who had other sites in his electorate. But, at any rate, he gave us to understand that the site should be reported on. The knowledge which I have gained in regard to the various districts of which I am about to speak is not the result of recent observations, because I had not the privilege of visiting them with other honorable members, but of my experience in travelling through them, generally with stock, more than twenty years ago. The information which I possess has not been gained by a hurried glance. I have spent as much as a month in travelling from Tumut to Welaregang through Tumberumba, and I have been from Welaregang up the Murray towards Mount Kosciusko. I spent as much as three months on the station on which the Dalgety site is situated. I have also travelled repeatedly through the Bombala district, and through the Lyndhurst district. A good deal has been said about the price which was demanded by New South Wales for joining the Union, and some honorable members have gone so far as to claim that the Parliament of that State should select the Federal territory. My reading of the Constitution, however, is that the first step to be taken is for this Parliament to select a territory which will embrace an area suitable for the site of the Seat of Government, and that the site of the city should be afterwards chosen. I understand that what is now proposed is that we shall select the Federal territory, and not the site of the Seat of Government. That, I think, is the proper course to follow.

Mr. BROWN.—All the information which has been laid before us refers to sites, not to territory.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am aware that the information in our possession is incomplete, and that there are conflicting statements in regard to the various sites. I propose to rely for confirmation of the views I shall express on what I hold to be the best and most reliable authority—the report of the Royal Commission appointed at the instance of this Parliament to investigate the matter. It has been remarked that the possibilities of the Tooma site are an after consideration ; but I would point out that the possibilities of the Dalgety site are also an after consideration. When the matter was last dealt with, the honorable member for Eden-Monaro spoke enthusiastically about Bombala. According to him, there was no other spot in Australia so well adapted to be the site of the Seat of Government. Now, however, we hear nothing about Bombala. Instead, a little spot on a bend of the Snowy River, termed the Dalgety site, has been chosen. The Federal Commissioners, however, tell us that the country there is treeless, and that it requires two acres of it to feed a sheep. The only timber within a considerable distance of Dalgety is that growing on a low ridge of hills which somewhat shelters the site from the west.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is not so.

Mr. KENNEDY. — I have for three months at a time ridden against the biting winds which blow over that desert country—and I am not speaking of its mid-winter climate. Even the river flats will not grow timber. At any rate, no timber grows there now.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The proposed site is not situated on the river flats.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Of course not. If the city were placed there, its buildings would be continually washed away by floods. However, let us hear what the Commissioners have to say on the subject. This is a quotation from their supplementary report—

The appearance of the Site, which, even on the river banks, is almost entirely destitute of timber, does not suggest the idea that parks and gardens would flourish; but the local witnesses are unanimous in their belief that all the trees adapted to temperate climates could be grown.

The only belt of timber within twenty miles of the locality is that growing on the ridge of hills between Beloka and the Mowamba River, from which it is proposed to obtain the water supply of the Federal Capital.

Mr. McDONALD.—Why does not timber grow there?

Mr. KENNEDY.—For one reason, the place is too bleak.

Mr. McDONALD.—In Queensland there are vast areas of very fertile land on which no trees are growing.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I account for that by climatic conditions. In the western plains of New South Wales there are also immense areas which, given a good rainfall, would be extremely productive, but there is practically no timber there.

Mr. McCOLL.—The Riverina district is also treeless.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes. But in addition to being bleak, there are also large outcrops of granite in the Dalgety district, particularly to the north and east of it. The site itself is situated opposite the old Buckley's Crossing.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Is Coolringdon all granite?

Mr. KENNEDY.—No; but there is a good deal of granite out in that direction. Of course there is some good country there, because they rear sheep there; but the Commissioners state on indisputable evidence that its carrying capacity is only one sheep to two acres.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Is it not good country between Dalgety and Cooma?

Mr. KENNEDY.—There are patches of good country there.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Is it not good country all the way through?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Certainly not. Country which will carry only one sheep to two acres cannot be described as good. But it is not only the carrying capacity of the country which makes me think it unsuitable for the location of the Federal Capital. The report from which I have quoted expresses the view of local residents that trees could be grown—

Particularly if the hardier trees, such as pinus insignis, &c., were used for shelter from the high winds which prevail at certain seasons. Though protected to some extent from the westerly winds by the high ground along the western boundary, the Site is somewhat exposed.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—How long is it since the honorable member was there?

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member will find my name in large letters on the books of the Marrinumbra station for the year 1884.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member says there is no timber there; but does he know that the late Minister for Home Affairs was lost in the timber within five or six miles of the site?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Some Members of Parliament when they get out into the wilds are very easily lost. The Commissioners place Dalgety second to Tumut in the matter of water supply.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—But consider who appointed the Commissioners.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is not the question, unless the honorable member is prepared to challenge the impartiality and honesty of the Commissioners.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am prepared to do so.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I assume that the Commissioners faithfully performed the duties intrusted to them.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does the honorable member seriously contend that the report with regard to the water supply at Dalgety is a fair one?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do; and my reasons are embodied chiefly in the report of the Commissioners. It is proposed to obtain the water supply, in the first instance, from the Mowamba River, which the Commissioners say is the nearest source of supply by gravitation for a population of 50,000. I know full well, that in order to obtain a gravitation supply from the Snowy River, we should have to go a considerable distance further back.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Has the honorable member read what Mr. Pridham has to say about that matter?

Mr. KENNEDY.—No; I do not know Mr. Pridham in this connexion. If he had been an authority, he would probably have been consulted by the Commissioners.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—But his report is already before us.

Mr. BROWN.—Mr. Pridham supplied the information embodied in the Commissioners' report.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am reading from the report of the Commissioners, who were the properly-constituted authorities to deal with this matter. They say—

This river (the Mowamba River) is said by residents to run strongly throughout the year, and it has a catchment area of about 92 square miles above the point of off-take, which is situated at the lower end of the Moonbah Plain. The land included in the catchment area is used principally for pastoral purposes, but portions are suitable for cultivation, and the whole of it should be resumed to insure the purity of the water. About 32,000 acres have been alienated, the remainder being Crown lands.

The alienated lands would have to be resumed, because we know from experience that where a pure water supply is required it is absolutely necessary to guard against pollution through settlement upon the catchment area. Then the Commissioners proceed to make an estimate, and state that in order to provide a supply sufficient for a given population, an outlay of £328,000 would have to be incurred. The reason why the Commissioners place Dalgety second to Tumut in the matter of water supply is obvious, because at Tumut a gravitation scheme could be provided, and practically the whole of the catchment area would be Crown lands. That is the difference in favour of Tumut. We have heard a great deal about accessibility, and many exaggerated statements have been made with regard to the possibility of constructing a line from the existing railways to Dalgety. Now, what do the Commissioners say with regard to the cost of the lines necessary to make Dalgety accessible? The lowest estimate they give for a line from Cooma to Dalgety is £4,700 per mile. The cost of the line that would be necessary to connect the site with the Eastern railways of Victoria would render its construction quite out of the question. The Victorian Government have refused to extend their eastern lines, owing to the fact that there is no prospect, under existing conditions, of securing any return for the outlay. They would be prepared to incur a small present loss, if there were any possibility of development in settlement and production in the near future.

Mr. KELLY.—Would they be able to run fast trains on such a line?

Mr. KENNEDY.—That would depend upon the route selected. The cost of a line to connect Dalgety with the Eastern railway system of Victoria would amount to very nearly £3,000,000. I now desire to refer to another site which has been extolled as the only place suitable for the establishment of the Federal Capital. I refer to Lyndhurst. I need not deal with the question of accessibility, because we know that the site is already practically connected with Sydney by rail. I was astonished last night to hear several of the advocates of the site admit that within the last two years a drought had prevailed in that part of the country. If we are to build a Capital, it is not desirable that we should select a site in a drought-stricken country.

Mr. KELLY.—It has been shown that even during the drought period the water supply at Lyndhurst would have been sufficient to meet the requirements of 200,000 people.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I asked last night, by way of interjection, whether the Lyndhurst district had been affected by the drought, and I was told that most certainly it had been affected.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Was not the Riverina district also affected by the drought?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Certainly it was; but no one proposes to build the Federal Capital in Riverina.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—One of the sites is not very far from it.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I shall deal with that later on. It is admitted, even by the advocates of the Lyndhurst site, that an adequate water supply is one of the essentials. I admit that, so far as its elevation is concerned, Lyndhurst should be a healthy locality, and I also acknowledge that there is some very good land in the district. It is not like the Monaro country, where people might starve, so far as production is concerned, because it would be impossible to supply a very large population with food. At Lyndhurst, there is country within easy reach, which would be capable of producing all the food required by a large population. The water supply would not, however, in my estimation, be sufficient. Without entering too much into details, I would point out that all the authorities are agreed as to the sources from which the water supply will be derived. They are the Coombing Rivulet, Flyer's Creek, Cadiangullong Creek, Brown's Creek, and the Lachlan River, near Mount Macdonald. Now, what have the Commissioners to say with regard to the Coombing Rivulet?—

The Coombing Rivulet, which is proposed as the primary source of supply, has a catchment above the point of off-take, about one mile and a half south-west of the village of Shaw, of about eighty square miles, consisting of hilly country, in which is included the eastern slopes of Mount Macquarie. At the time of inspection the rivulet was practically dry, so that flood waters only would have to be depended upon. In ordinary seasons, however, there is said to be running water in this creek throughout the year.

Therefore, it is proposed to obtain the chief supply from a rivulet which was dry at the time of the inspection of the Commissioners. The Commissioners were specially appointed to inquire into this particular question, and I regard their report as the most reliable source of information. The honorable member for Lang, last evening, quoted from a private letter. In some Parliaments an honorable member who quotes from a letter may be required to place it upon the table, and unless the honorable member is prepared to place any documents from which he quotes at the disposal of honorable members, he cannot expect us to attach much importance to the sources of his information.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I think that the honorable member is quite prepared to lay the letter on the table.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member stated that it was a private document, and therefore I did not suggest that it should be laid on the table. I am only pointing to the difference between the two authorities. The Commissioners, whose report must be regarded as an honest one, unless honorable members are prepared to challenge it, state that one source of supply, the Coombing rivulet, was dry at the time of their inspection. They say further—

The land included in the catchment area is used partly for cultivation and partly for pastoral purposes. About 46,540 acres have been alienated, the remainder being Crown land. To insure the purity of the water the whole of it should be resumed.

Therefore, the position at Lyndhurst is practically the same as at Dalgety, and a large expenditure would be required for resumptions in connexion with the catchment area. In a case where storm waters only can be relied upon, and the catchment area comprises a large amount of cultivated land, we can imagine what an enormous quantity of silt would be carried into the reservoir. One of the other sources of supply is Flyer's Creek, which is thus referred to—Flyer's Creek, which takes its rise near the Canobolas Mountain, has a catchment area above the site of the dam, at the outlet end of Long Swamp, of eighteen square miles, consisting principally of hilly country favorable for the collection of water. The land is used for both agricultural and pastoral purposes, and would have to be acquired to insure the purity of the water, which would involve the purchase of about 10,750 acres, the remainder being Crown lands.

Therefore, in that case also, we should have to rely upon storm waters. Then the Commissioners say—

Cadiangullong Creek, which was dry at the time of inspection, has a catchment area above the proposed site for the dam, below the junction with Soldier's Creek, of fourteen and a half square miles, including the southern spurs of the Canobolas Mountain, the whole being favorable for collecting water. The land is principally rough and hilly, and used chiefly for pastoral purposes, but to insure the purity of the water, the area would need to be resumed.

It will thus be seen that two out of three creeks were dry at the time of the Commissioners' inspection.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What is the catchment area of the Melbourne water supply?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do not intend to discuss that matter at the present juncture. Everything depends upon the rainfall and the volume of water running off the catchment area. The Commissioners also say—

Brown's Creek, which is also proposed as a supplementary source of supply, has, above the site for the dam, about one mile below Sugarloaf Creek, a hilly catchment area of about 47 square miles, favorable for the collection of water. The creek contained very little running water at the time of inspection.

These are the four creeks from which it is proposed to draw a supply of water for the Lyndhurst site. I notice also that a report has been secured upon the feasibility of obtaining a supply by pumping from the Lachlan, but the cost of that scheme renders it impracticable. I do not intend to say anything regarding the Lyndhurst site, further than that the cost of obtaining an adequate water supply practically condemns it.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member should read Mr. Wade's report.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have read it. I have already stated that upon the previous occasion when this question was discussed, I voted with the Welaregang site clearly in my mind. It is unfortunate that we are not in possession of a full report upon that site. The information which is available, however, places it at the head of the list so far as the possession of all essentials for a Federal Capital are concerned. Of course, if the Committee desire to obtain a site in close proximity to Sydney, it may be possible to get an equally good one. Nevertheless, I venture to say that we cannot obtain a better location for a Federal Capital than exists at Welaregang. The honorable and learned member for Werriwa has declared that from the stand-point of climate it is practically upon an equality with, and is similar to, the Tumut site. Upon that point Mr. Chesterman, who has made a hurried report upon this particular site, and who has been resident in that district for some five years, says—

The Welaregang-Tooma Valley is protected by lower ranges from the cold westerlies, the prevailing winter winds, which blow toward the Snowy Mountains. These mountains, in a direct line, are about thirty miles south-easterly, and their proximity tempers the summer climate, the easterly breezes blowing from them. Though the average altitude of the suggested Site may not exceed about 1,100 feet, the above local conditions contribute to render the climate free from marked extremes, and it will be noticed that the situation is immediately south of the 36th parallel of latitude. With its varying elevations this district offers various climatic conditions. Take, for instance, Tumberumba, about seventeen miles north, where the climate is distinctly more Alpine in character, the winters being severe. Again, about seventeen miles easterly, is the old Toolong Hut, situated in classified snow country—that is, country “usually covered with snow for a part of each year, and considered to be unfit for continuous use or occupation.”

When honorable members declare that the elevation of a particular district governs its climatic conditions, I would direct their attention to the fact that this particular site is within seventeen miles of the snow line in one direction, and twenty-five miles in the other. As a matter of fact, it is within seventy miles of perpetual snow. These conditions, I claim, must materially influence its general climatic conditions. With regard to accessibility, we have been told that it is absolutely impossible to construct a railway into that district. Yet we are aware that Tumut is already connected by a fair railway service with Sydney, and that the line could be made a fast one, if necessary. Twenty years ago, to my own knowledge, teamsters used to haul an average of 15 cwt. per horse over what was practically a bush road between Tumut and Tumberumba. That is sufficient proof that it is not impossible to extend the Gundagai-Tumut line from Gadara to Welaregang. In this report, estimates are given of the cost of constructing a line upon the Victorian side of that site. But I would point out that those estimates were prepared in the boom times of the early nineties. We know that since then railways which were surveyed at the same time have been built for half the estimate which was then furnished. Consequently, we may reasonably expect a reduction of 40 per cent. in the cost of constructing a railway upon the Victorian side of that site. It is fair to assume, therefore, that it could be constructed for about £5,000 per mile. That sum compares favorably with the latest estimate we have of the cost of constructing a railway from Cooma to Dalgety. It is estimated that the construction of that line would involve an expenditure of £4,700 per mile, and I venture to affirm that the cost of building a railway from Welaregang to Gadara would not exceed £5,000 per mile.

Mr. KELLY.—How many miles is it from Welaregang to Gadara?

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is between fifty and sixty miles.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It is just fifty miles as the crow flies.

Mr. KENNEDY.—At a very moderate cost indeed this site could be made accessible to travellers by constructing a loop line from the main line between Melbourne and Sydney. I unhesitatingly claim that from the stand-point of soil and productiveness the Tooma site possesses advantages superior to those of any other site. An immense area, extending from fifteen miles on the south side of Tumut to the Tooma Valley, is available for a Federal territory.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It would cost £15,000 per mile to construct a railway there.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is a figment of the imagination. I have already told the Committee that, of my own knowledge, twenty years ago teams used to haul upon an average 15 hundredweight per horse along the Welaregang to Tumut road.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It always struck me as being particularly rough country.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No doubt there is rough country between Tumberumba and what is known as Lobb's Hole.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Are there any horses of that breed still alive?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes; I can supply the honorable member with plenty of them.

Mr. JOHNSON.—But Tumberumba is not Welaregang.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But the highest point in the journey between Tumut and Welaregang is reached at Tumberumba. From Tumberumba to Welaregang there is a downward grade, because the traveller is then on the watershed of the Tooma River. I repeat that twenty years ago teams used to haul over a road which was not macadamized—practically a bush road—an average of 15 hundredweight per horse. I am not in a position to say whether the whole of that road is now macadamized.

Mr. WATSON.—A good deal of it is.

Mr. KENNEDY.—If a horse can draw 15 hundredweight over any country, I claim that it would not be a difficult matter to construct a railway there. Further, those who have travelled from Welaregang to Tumberumba know that between those places there is an almost perfect road for coaching. It does not require a specially good buggy horse to cover the seventeen miles in an hour and a half.

Mr. SKENE.—The honorable member must keep very good horses.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I did the journey in that time, but did not use my own horse.

Mr. SPENCE.—I suppose it was grown in the district.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is so. It is well known that the Upper Murray has produced some of the best horses in Australia.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not think that any one disputes the productivity of the district.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The possibilities of development would be in themselves a sufficient justification for constructing a railway to the Upper Murray district, even if the Federal Capital were not established there. It is generally conceded, however, that New South Wales, unfortunately, is not yet possessed of a sufficiently extensive railway system to enable rural districts to achieve the fullest possible development.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The Germananton extension does not pay now.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No; but it is well known that it is only a short loop line, passing through country consisting practically of large holdings. I know the district well. Twenty years ago there were large holdings there, and the tendency, if anything, has since been in the direction of increasing the area of those holdings. There is an enormous area of Crown land available in the Upper Murray district. One of the largest forest areas of New South Wales runs parallel with the roadway.

Mr. SKENE.—Is that not the area of the watershed?

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is within the Tumut watershed area. Then, again, the Upper Murray district is within easy reach of the famous Yarrangobilly Caves.

Mr. KELLY.—Are they not something like sixty-five miles distant?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Welaregang is seventeen miles from Tumberumba, and the distance between Tumberumba and Lobb's Hole by bridle track in the olden days was also about seventeen miles, but I am told that a direct road from Tumut to the junction of the Yarrangobilly has since been made, and that it is a very good one. Let me briefly refer to the question of water supply. I invite those who are so enthusiastically in favour of Dalgety because of its magnificent water supply, and who have not yet visited the Upper Murray district, to read Mr. Chesterman's report on the Tooma district. Those who have suggested that the streams contributing to the proposed source of supply have been polluted by mining and sluicing operations should read what Mr. Chesterman has to say on the subject.

Mr. KELLY.—Does not Mr. Chesterman say that they are polluted?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Mr. Chesterman says that some of the streams flowing into the Tooma River below the point of the proposed offtake are polluted.

Mr. KELLY.—And the point of the proposed offtake is twenty-two miles away?

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is something like that. Mr. Chesterman points out that the volume of water available for the supply of a Federal Capital is unquestionably large. There are three rivers to be drawn upon—the Tooma River, the Swampy Plain River, and the Indi River, which are all snow fed. The Tooma River joins the Murray at a point close to the proposed site, and the Swampy Plain and Indi rivers a little above that point.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Doctors say that snow-water is not good for drinking purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is bad when you cannot obtain it. Mr. Chesterman points out in his report that—

The district under reference is undoubtedly a well-watered one. The two main heads of the Murray River (known as the Swampy Plain and Indi Rivers) junction about ten miles above the proposed site, and between the site and this junction the main river is joined by another large stream, known as the Tooma River. In evidence given before the Inter-State Royal Commission on the River Murray, Mr. "Assistant Engineer" H. S. Smail, B.E., stated that he gauged these streams at a time when the river was in a very low state.

His gaugings show that the discharge from the Tooma River is equal to 17,800 cubic feet per minute; and if honorable members take the equivalent of that in gallons they will find that the supply will be ample for a very large population.

Mr. McCOLL.—It is more than 110,000 gallons per minute.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The report continues—

Gaugings of smaller streams are also given, and the Murray River itself at Tintaldra showed a discharge of 947 cubic feet per second.

That was at a time when the river was in a very low state. Mr. Chesterman continues—

Looking at the watershed of the Murray River, so far as shown on plan "Y," with the object of ascertaining what gravitation schemes for water supply are available, it would appear that the upper parts of the Mannus and Tumberumba Creeks could be utilized, and also Paddy's River above the Falls—all draining into the Tooma River.

I come now to a paragraph to which I desire to direct the special attention of the Committee—

Settlement and mining interests on the heads of these streams might, however, prove objectionable, and, moreover, I think a much more effective supply can be drawn from the main branch of the Tooma itself.

In other words, the two streams, whose waters are likely to be polluted by mining and sluicing operations, are to be completely ignored, and a supply obtained, first of all, from the Tooma River, which wends its way through snow country, where sluicing or mining operations are not carried on. The catchment area consists of Crown lands, leased from year to year for grazing purposes. These lands are known as "summer country," and are resorted to when the plain country, which has been carrying a considerable number of stock, has become exhausted.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It is held under what are known in New South Wales as snow leases.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Exactly. Mining and sluicing operations have been carried on along the Mannus Creek and the Tumberumba Creek for many years, with the result that the water has become discoloured, and would be objectionable for domestic purposes; but the water supply of the Federal Capital, if it were established at Welaregang, would be drawn, not from those streams, but from the main Tooma River, at a point above the junction of those streams. The report continues—

From approximate aneroid readings I have been enabled to obtain, it would appear that the junction of Pound Creek with the Tooma River (vide map "Y") is at an elevation of about 1,700 feet, which, allowing a fall of 200 feet in about fifteen miles, would be at a sufficient altitude to permit of water being gravitated to a service reservoir at an elevation of 1,500 feet commanding the site. Proceeding about a mile further up the river a height of about 1,800 feet is reached, and, in order to allow a margin, it is from this point (marked "X" on map "Y"), distant about sixteen miles by pipe line from the city site, that I consider the Tooma River can be tapped for a gravitation scheme.

If the honorable member for Eden-Monaro will give me his attention for a moment, I shall endeavour to draw a clear distinction between the water supply available at Tooma and that of Dalgely. Mr. Chesterman shows that—

The catchment area above this point comprises approximately ninety-three square miles of snow country, and so strong is the stream here at all times that to supply a population of 50,000 inhabitants I do not think a storage reservoir would be necessary. Such being so, the principal expenses would be limited to construction of small impounding weir at offtake, service reservoir near site, and the laying down of about sixteen or seventeen miles of pipe line. A short distance above the proposed offtake the Tooma River emerges from a deep gorge through which it has flowed for some miles with a rapid fall. Consequently it is not surprising to learn that at the old Toolong crossing, about eight miles above offtake, the altitude is given by departmental maps as 2,880 feet.

In this report we have evidence that we should be able to obtain an absolutely pure supply from the Tooma River itself. There is such a large volume of water available that if a small weir were constructed we should not require a large reservoir for conservation purposes, but would be able to convey the water a distance of about sixteen or seventeen miles by pipe line to the service reservoir.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does the honorable member assert that we could not do the same at Dalgety?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member asks the Committee to accept his assertion that the Tooma water supply is not polluted. What about the report of the Inter-State Commission on the Murray River?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have already shown that to my own knowledge the Mannus Creek and the Tumberumba Creek, which flow into the Tooma River, were polluted by mining operations twenty years ago. The report by Mr. Chesterman confirms that statement, but points out that the proposed offtake on the Tooma River is above the junction of those two creeks.

Mr. KELLY.—His report was compiled from notes taken fifteen or twenty years ago, was it not?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I cannot say, but—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — He says himself that he merely writes from memory.

Mr. MCCOLL.—But he lived in the district for five years.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I suppose the honorable member is aware that Mr. Chesterman gave us a glowing account of the water supply for the Gadara and Lacmalac sites?

Mr. KENNEDY.—He might well give a glowing account of their water supply. The water supply to the east or north-east of Tumut is somewhat similar to that available at Welaregang, although the volume is not the same.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I do not understand that —

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! The honorable member is anticipating his own speech on the question.

Mr. KENNEDY. — It will be found from a perusal of Mr. Chesterman's report that the source of our water supply, if Tooma were selected, would not be polluted in any way. I do not propose to further discuss the question, except to say that I regard Lyndhurst as being first on the list from the stand-point of accessibility. I admit that, so far as accessibility is concerned, Lyndhurst possesses an advantage, but in regard to water supply, I do not think it could be argued for one moment, on the evidence available, that that is a desirable place for the Federal city. I can speak from some considerable experience of Dalgety, having been engaged on the Marinumbula Station, which is on the proposed site. I lived there for a considerable portion of two years, and gained some familiarity with the conditions; and my impressions are borne out by the report presented to us. As stated in the report, the country for twenty or thirty miles around Dalgety would carry a sheep to two acres. According to the evidence of some other witnesses, it would be possible, within a radius of fifty miles of Dalgety to grow the food necessary for a population of fifty thousand. That, however, is not saying much for the productiveness of this wonderful tableland on the Monaro. Other witnesses state that within that radius sufficient produce could not be grown for a population of the size I have mentioned; and it is very difficult to grow produce on granite.

Mr. KELLY.—Whence does the honorable member expect to draw supplies? From the southern side of the Murray?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Unless the New South Wales people remain asleep, certainly not. Surely it can be imagined that in a stretch of country, eighteen miles by twenty, it would be possible to grow a considerable amount of produce. Are we to take it that the digestion of the people at Welaregang, when that is made Federal territory, will be impaired by produce grown in Victoria? As to the climatic conditions at Dalgety, I might relate more of my personal experience. In pursuit of my business, I had occasion to take horses from the Riverina country over the hills to Monaro in the early part of November, which ought to be a good time of the year in a mild climate. It turned out, however, that after the animals had been turned out on those beautiful, undulating granite hills around Dalgety, for a week, I did not know them; and I venture to say that if they had been left to find their own food there, nobody would have been able to recognise them as horses. I had to take them from those pastures, and hand feed them in order to save their lives. In those cool westerly winds, tempered by the Snowy Mountains, the honorable member for Eden-Monaro would require to wear "knockers" on his teeth to keep them from chattering.

No doubt, people reared in such a climate might be able to stand the rigorous conditions.

Mr. SKENE.—We should have the "survival of the fittest," I suppose.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No doubt the people there are hardy. But what is the use of inducing Members of Parliament to suffer in such a climate for a few months in the year? The Seat of Government ought to be in a place where normal conditions prevail—not where we shall be parboiled or frozen, but where there are no extremes of heat or cold. Such a climate we should find in those uplands so graphically described by the honorable member for Perth, where, when the thermometer does rise to 85 or 90, it is only a short trip of ten or fifteen miles to the snow line.

Mr. KELLY.—Would the honorable member reach the snow line by lift?

Mr. KENNEDY.—By lift or motor-car, whichever the honorable member for Wentworth might desire. We are now called upon to decide a question not for to-day or to-morrow, but one in regard to which we must look fifty or a hundred years ahead.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the honorable member mean in regard to the buildings?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am speaking of the fixing of the location. It is apparently considered by some honorable members that the selection should be made now; and that may be desirable, if only to allay jealousy and distrust. I have no objection to settling the matter now, but I think honorable members realize that, make what haste we may, a considerable time must elapse before any legislative enactment will be given effect to in the erection of a Federal Capital. A considerable period must be taken up in negotiations of one sort and another; but I would not be one to delay, even for a day, the selection of a site. It is not our own convenience, or the immediate requirements of to-day, that we have to consider. We have to consider the future of Australia, and to do that, a few essentials must be taken into account. I do not think for a moment that the Capital city will ever rival or out-pace the present commercial centres. It may become a centre of population; we do not know what developments there may be in the future. We must, however, consider, first of all, water supply and climatic conditions, and if these are satisfactory, ascertain whether there is a possibility of increased settlement and production. For the reasons I have given I have no hesitation in saying that I shall give my vote for the Tooma site.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—The honorable member for Moira and the honorable member who preceded him devoted themselves earnestly—and, I think it will be admitted, forcefully—to the task of showing the Committee the reasons which led them to advocate the particular site which both of them with singular unanimity urged honorable members to support. But it seems to me that they overlooked the most important fact, which I think really ought to commend itself to us more than any other fact at the present juncture. That is that we are now fulfilling an obligation which the Commonwealth incurred towards New South Wales when that State joined in the Federal compact some years ago. What is the history of this affair? Why is it that at the present time we are confined to New South Wales territory in the selection of a Federal Capital site? The Federal compact was felt by the people of New South Wales to expose them to a very serious risk, to which the other States were not exposed. The fiscal question was considered to be of immense importance. That point may not commend itself to other honorable members, but the fact certainly remains that the people of New South Wales attached paramount importance to the fiscal question, and the risk of sacrificing their fiscal autonomy was so serious as to make them pause before entering that union of the six colonies which every one in Australia desired to see consummated.

Mr. MAUGER.—As a matter of fact, they did not pause; there was a majority in favour of the Commonwealth Bill at the first referendum.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member for Melbourne Ports and some others have thrown a great deal of vituperative eloquence at the State from which I have the honour to come, because she saw fit to take what was, in my opinion, a very prudent step with regard to the first referendum. Her Parliament practically enacted that a majority of 10,000 votes must be recorded in favour of the Commonwealth Bill before it could reasonably be said to receive the support of the people of New South Wales.

Mr. TUDOR.—I think the stipulation was that there should be 80,000 votes recorded for the Bill.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member is quite right; but, with the votes polled, a majority of 10,000 would be a fair equivalent.

As a matter of fact, I do not think that that was a serious condition to impose, and honorable members will agree with me when they consider it. It was not unreasonable that a State with a population of 1,300,000 should have to have 80,000 votes recorded in favour of a change in her whole Constitution.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—How many electors were there in New South Wales?

Mr. KELLY.—I suppose there were considerably over 250,000.

Mr. ROBINSON.—There were over 300,000 electors; we had 250,000 in Victoria.

Mr. KELLY.—Speaking from memory, there were, I think, between 250,000 and 300,000 voters; and surely the Minister of Home Affairs does not think 80,000 votes out of 300,000 too large a percentage.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I am not thinking about the matter at all.

Mr. KELLY.—Then I am sorry that the honorable gentleman in charge of the Bill is doing no thinking about it.

Mr. MCCOLL.—The Minister means only with regard to that particular part.

Mr. KELLY.—Then, I withdraw.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The minimum provision was looked upon as a breach of faith.

Mr. MAUGER.—It was a dodge.

Mr. KELLY.—It was a very prudent step.

The CHAIRMAN.—We are not now discussing the question of the minimum required in New South Wales before the Commonwealth Bill could be adopted. The question before the Committee is the selection of a suitable site.

Mr. KELLY.—I am showing that New South Wales did not at first accept the Commonwealth Bill, because she felt that its acceptance would expose her to the risk of disadvantage.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member was giving his reasons for approving of the action of those who were responsible for the imposition of the minimum.

Mr. KELLY.—I regret that by replying to interjections I have been led to trespass, but now that the Chairman has directed my attention to it, I will desist. There is no doubt, at any rate, that on the occasion of the first referendum in New South Wales, it was strongly felt by those who were in a position to know — by the leaders of opinion — that the Federal Capital question was, in the opinion of the people, of the utmost importance. It was felt that the Premier of New South Wales should be intrusted with the mandate of consulting with the Premiers of the other States, in order to see whether they could arrive at some sort of compromise. The Premiers met in Melbourne. As every one knows, the Premier and the people of New South Wales would naturally have preferred to have the Capital fixed in Sydney, which was the centre of the State.

Mr. MAUGER.—But not the centre of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KELLY.—It was, however, felt by the Conference of Premiers, that New South Wales was not entitled to that unique privilege. Ultimately it was agreed that New South Wales was to have the Capital within her borders, but that it should be shorn of much of its advantage, from the State point of view. The Conference passed the following resolution:—

It is considered that the fixing of the site of the Capital is a question which might well be left to the Parliament to decide.

Mr. MAUGER.—Hear, hear.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member for Melbourne Ports need not applaud until he has heard the whole resolution.

Mr. MAUGER.—I was applauding the sentiment underlying the resolution.

Mr. KELLY.—

But in view of the strong expression of opinion in relation to this matter in New South Wales, the Premiers have modified the clause, so that while the Capital cannot be fixed at Sydney, or in its neighbourhood, provision is made in the Constitution for its establishment in New South Wales, at a reasonable distance from that city.

The people of New South Wales knew what that resolution was when they accepted the Commonwealth Bill. They read it in its broader meaning.

Mr. WILKS.—They read it in every way they could.

Mr. KELLY.—And it is now attempted by some honorable members to read it in any way they can. But I think that the people of the other States will be in favour of fulfilling to the utmost limit the bond entered into between New South Wales and the other States of the Commonwealth. Such being the case, I feel convinced that even the honorable member for Melbourne Ports will try to meet us half way.

Mr. MAUGER.—I will go all the way. I would not repudiate a letter of the bond.

Mr. KELLY.—I also trust that the honorable member will seek to do what I am sure his constituents would be anxious that he should do—to honour the spirit, as well as the letter, of the bond.

Mr. MAUGER.—I am sure that my constituents, in this matter, would do what I should like them to do.

Mr. KELLY.—I hope that the honorable member and others will endeavour to carry out this obligation to its fullest extent, and not seek to take a technical advantage of a deed, which, being made between States which were relations, was drawn not too definitely. Such being the resolution which was carried by the Premiers' Conference, it was only natural that the people of New South Wales reckoned that the Capital would be established somewhere, as the resolution says, within "a reasonable distance" of their capital city. In view of the fact that New South Wales took that view, and that on the strength of it she entered into the Federal partnership, I hold that the question of the locality of the Federal city is one in which New South Wales is peculiarly interested—in which she is interested more than the rest of the Commonwealth. But there is another question, namely, that of the expense incurred in building the Capital, and in making it accessible. I hold that the matter of expense is a Federal question, in which all the States are equally interested. The people of New South Wales having entered into this partnership, their worst fears with regard to the fiscal question were realized. As the result of it her taxation has been increased by £1,500,000 per annum.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! I do not think that the question of the Tariff has anything to do with this matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The people of New South Wales could have reduced their taxation in other ways.

Mr. KELLY.—I want to show that since New South Wales has incurred this increased taxation, she is now more than ever entitled to that consideration which she expected when she joined the Union. It is very significant that whereas the taxation of New South Wales has been increased, taxation throughout the rest of Australia—with the exception of Western Australia—has not been increased. I do not think that any State is better pleased than is New South Wales that the other States have not also suffered increases, but still the fact remains that taxation in New South Wales has been considerably augmented. It is now said that the State Parliament could have reduced the amount of taxation. But the only direct taxation which they could have diminished was to the amount of half-a-million. As a consequence of this heavy increased Customs and Excise taxation, the people of New South Wales now feel that they are bearing the whole cost of Federation. There is not the slightest doubt about that.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is an utter absurdity.

Mr. KELLY.—The New South Wales Customs revenue in 1901 amounted to less than £2,000,000. In 1903 it amounted to nearly £3,500,000. In other words, there was an increase of slightly more than £1,500,000. In Victoria the result of Federation has meant a decrease in taxation from this channel of £71,000 and in Queensland a decrease of £238,000.

The CHAIRMAN.—Has this anything to do with the matter under discussion?

Mr. KELLY.—It shows the reasons for the spirit in which this question is regarded by the New South Wales people.

The CHAIRMAN.—I am sorry to have to rule that it has nothing to do with the question before the Chair.

Mr. KELLY.—Can I raise a point of order upon that issue? I am showing reasons for the bitter feeling prevailing amongst the New South Wales people—feeling which in itself should necessitate our honouring the bond to the fullest extent.

Mr. CARPENTER.—What have we to do with their feelings in regard to this question?

Mr. KELLY.—I think that the feeling of the New South Wales people forms the most important Federal question at the present time. I was giving what I considered to be a pertinent illustration, but if the Chairman rules that it is out of order I will bow to his decision. Our duty obviously is to render to New South Wales a fulfilment of the obligation which induced her to enter the Federation. To render that obligation we ought not to choose a site that will be of no benefit to her, but a site which will satisfy the people of New South Wales that the Commonwealth Parliament is endeavouring to honour the obligations entered into in their liberal and true sense. I propose to consider the different sites from a double aspect—that of location, which is the serious aspect from the New South Wales point of view; and that of expense, which is the Federal aspect. Considered in the light of those two aspects, it seems to me that the Welaregang site is altogether a bad one for the running. The benefits that would accrue to New South Wales from the location of the Capital at Welaregang are absolutely nil.

MR. CARPENTER.—Is that the honorable member's stand-point?

MR. KELLY.—No, not altogether. As I have explained, I am considering the matter from two stand-points. I know that honorable members from Western Australia are very airy in their views about expense; but I can assure the honorable member that it is necessary to consider the various sites from the point of view of expenditure. I am dividing the aspects of the matter into two—the view which the people of New South Wales might reasonably take, and that which the people of the Commonwealth as a whole might reasonably take. The first is the question of locality, which is peculiarly of State interest; and the second has relation to expense, in which the whole Commonwealth is directly interested. I hold that on the first of these two points the Welaregang site is altogether out of the running. It is inaccessible from the point of view of New South Wales. It is on the border of that State. It is a place which would draw all its supplies from a neighbouring State. In this I am merely putting the New South Wales point of view. I do not expect some of the members from other States to attach more importance to the point than they are predisposed to do, having regard to the interests they represent. The State of New South Wales would derive no advantage whatever from the establishment of the Federal Capital at Welaregang. As a matter of fact, its establishment there would place that State in a worse position than that in which she is at present, because it must not be forgotten that New South Wales must supply all the Crown lands free, and forego all taxation on the alienated lands. The establishment of the Capital at Welaregang would therefore render the fulfilment of an obligation, from which New South Wales expected to derive an advantage, only a new means of irritating the people of that State; it would mean a fresh sacrifice, and a new source of unfederal feeling. At present New South Wales is in a state of unrest, because the settlement of this question has been delayed for some years. It is now our duty, not only to at once secure its settlement, but to allay the irritation that exists. In Welaregang we have a site which is distinctly unsatisfactory to the mother State, and one about which we practically know nothing. It has not been surveyed, and we are being asked to take a leap in the dark which may afterwards expose this Parliament to the ridicule of the civilized world. We have before us an extremely scratchy report on the Tooma district. That is not the fault of its author, because he was asked, without making a survey or examination of the district, to sit down in his office and furnish Parliament with a report on which we are supposed to decide for all time the Federal Capital of Australia. In this connexion I may say that I am very much surprised at the attitude assumed by the honorable member for Perth. That honorable member told the Committee that he intended to vote for the Welaregang site, because that would mean deferring the question for a further period. He explained that if we decided upon Tooma the Senate would not agree to our choice, and that would probably mean the relegation of the question to a session of Parliament—might I say—five or six years hence, until within the fifty-mile radius suggested by the honorable member for Hume a site might be discovered possessing all the advantages which are now claimed for the Welaregang site.

MR. BATCHELOR.—To what site is the honorable member referring? To the Lyndhurst site?

MR. KELLY.—The Minister of Home Affairs would appear to be confusing the places. For his information I may say that Welaregang is a place on the Upper Murray near the border between New South Wales and Victoria.

MR. BATCHELOR.—Which is the site, the choice of which is likely to delay the decision of the question?

MR. KELLY.—I was referring to the attitude assumed by the honorable member for Perth, who told the Committee that he intended to vote for Tooma, because he knew that another place would not accept that site, and consequently the settlement of the question would be delayed pending an examination of the scenic beauties and other advantages of the district.

MR. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member must have meant Lyndhurst, not Welaregang.

MR. KELLY.—I presumed that the honorable member meant Welaregang, because he said Welaregang, but if the Minister of Home Affairs assures me that his followers do not mean what they say, I must bow to his superior knowledge of them. In connexion with the Tooma site, we are told, amongst other things, that the district is undoubtedly well watered. We were told this afternoon by the honorable member for Moira that the Dalgety site is not well watered. I might remind honorable members that when the Commissioners inspected the Bombala site they thought there would be no difficulty whatever in securing a gravitation water supply, because they saw some thirteen streams descending from the hills in its vicinity.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Did they say thirteen? That is a very unlucky number.

Mr. KELLY.—It is; but this was at Bombala.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for Macquarie wishes he had one of the streams at Lyndhurst.

Mr. KELLY.—Although they assumed that there would be no difficulty in providing the Bombala site with a gravitation supply, when they came to make a closer examination of the country they found that they could not supply water to a city of any size at the Bombala site without pumping. With respect to the Tooma site, we have the same report that it is a well-watered district, but when it is examined closely honorable members may find that in order to supply the Tooma site with water it may be necessary to pump it from the Murray. The officer who furnishes us with a report about Tooma says —

Looking at the watershed of the Murray River, with the object of ascertaining what gravitation schemes for water supply are available, it would appear that the upper parts of the Mannus and Tumberumba Creek could be utilized, and also Paddy's River, above the Falls—all draining into the Tooma River. Settlement and mining interests on the heads of these streams might, however, prove objectionable, and, moreover, I think a much more effective supply can be drawn from the main branch of the Tooma River itself.

I wish to be perfectly fair to this site, and I therefore admit that the honorable member for Moira told us this afternoon that a gravitation scheme might be secured from the Tooma River, above its junction with these two streams, which, according to this report, are impregnated with dangerous ingredients. The honorable member, however, forgot to tell us that the point to which he refers is twenty-two miles from the proposed site of the Capital city; that there is no estimate of the cost of such a scheme before the Committee; and that fifteen or twenty miles of piping might mean an expense which the Federal Parliament would not be prepared to sanction, if the whole of the facts and figures were before it. This officer also says—

It would be very difficult at this stage to attempt a definite determination of the actual population it would be likely to supply.

Surely a statement of that sort from a responsible officer should make honorable members pause before deciding in favour of the Tooma site! He goes on to state the expense of constructing the railway lines that would be necessary to connect the Tooma site with the railway systems already in existence. He mentions three surveyed lines from the Victorian side, and his estimate of their cost, without building the bridge across the Murray necessary to complete the connexion, and without rolling-stock, would be respectively £620,000, £703,000, and £861,000.

Mr. ROBINSON.—And it would cost many thousands more to bridge the Murray.

Mr. KELLY.—On the other side, with respect to the railway necessary to connect with the Tumut line, this gentleman, in his report, says—

Between Tumut and the Victorian border I believe a practicable, though hilly, route is obtainable, but between Tumut and Yass I understand a flying inspection disclosed some difficulties.

This is the very favorable report of which we have been told concerning the line between Welaregang and Tumut!

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yass does not come between Welaregang and Tumut.

Mr. KELLY.—The surveyor, after making this report, takes this particular view of what he speaks of as a "practicable route."

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is for a shorter route between Sydney and Tumut than the railway now existing.

Mr. KELLY.—No; the surveyor's proposal is one to connect Welaregang with Tumut.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No; to get a more direct route from Sydney.

Mr. KELLY.—We should not want a more direct route than that.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member will find that Yass is between Tumut and Sydney, and not between Tumut and Welaregang.

Mr. KELLY.—I am now speaking of the more economical route, to which the surveyor refers as the only practicable route.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Not the most economical, but the more direct route.

Mr. KELLY.—He says that he believes that the route between Tumut and the Victorian border is practicable, though hilly. He does not say that it is practicable, because he knows nothing definite about it. We have had Royal Commissioners inspecting the other sites, and special surveyors making contour surveys of them, but we are asked to accept this site in the dark, unless we adopt the suggestion of the honorable member for Perth, and vote for it in order to shelve the whole question for a further period. I do not think that honorable members will take that view, because I believe they are prepared to settle the question now, knowing that sufficient time has already been wasted in deciding this matter. I think I have now shown that not only from the New South Wales point of view of locality, but also from the Federal point of view of expense and accessibility, this Tooma site is absolutely out of the running. I have now a word or two to say about the Dalgety site. It holds a distinctly stronger position than does the Welaregang site. Whilst the Tooma site would require a large expenditure to connect it with either Sydney or Melbourne, the Dalgety site is more or less accessible from Sydney, and railway communication between it and Sydney would be completed by a short extension to Dalgety of the line from Goulburn to Cooma. Consequently, from the point of view—

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Of Sydney.

Mr. KELLY.—I am sorry that the Minister should be so prejudiced against Sydney. I hope that the honorable gentleman will bear with me, as I am considering the question from both points of view.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What is the Minister's view? He does not appear to have any on this matter.

Mr. KELLY.—Yes, I think the Minister has made up his mind.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why does not the Minister of Home Affairs tell us what it is?

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable gentleman is in charge of the Bill, and must assume an impartial attitude. I have been accused of taking an entirely provincial view when I say that Dalgety is more accessible to Sydney than is Welaregang. I look upon Sydney as the heart of the State of New South Wales, and I have tried to make it clear that I am regarding the question from the point of view of the State of New South Wales, as well as from the point of view of the Commonwealth, since they are both parties to the compact. I say that the question of locality is of supreme importance to the State of New South Wales, whilst the question of expense is of Federal importance. I have, I think, proved that Welaregang is barred on both these considerations. I am now endeavouring to show that from the point of view of locality alone, Dalgety is superior to Welaregang. From the point of view of expense it is also preferable to that site, and it has this further advantage that it has been surveyed, reported on, and subjected to criticism, to which we have had no time, so far, to subject the Tooma site. However, when compared with Lyndhurst, I hold that the Dalgety site must give place.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Nonsense!

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member for Eden-Monaro no doubt thinks that I should have stopped at the previous sentence, but the people of New South Wales desire that the Lyndhurst site should be chosen out of the three I have mentioned. If we take the State point of view only into consideration, Lyndhurst should receive our unanimous support. There is still the Federal point of view to be considered—the question of expense and accessibility. On that consideration, I maintain that Lyndhurst again has first place, because, for one thing, it is situated on a main line of railway already completed. At the present time Lyndhurst is equally accessible by rail from Melbourne and Sydney, and when the New South Wales railways are continued from Cobar, through Wilcannia, to Broken Hill, and from Wellington to Werris Creek, without expense to the Commonwealth—because we have it on the authority of the honorable member for Hume that they will be constructed by the Government of the State solely for the development of its own territory—the site will be in direct communication with Adelaide and Brisbane as well. Lyndhurst will then be really the heart of the railway systems of Australia, and the most accessible of all the sites.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is marvellous to me that any Western Australian should be in favour of any other site.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member for Moira this afternoon made a great point of the alleged want of water in the Lyndhurst district; but he surely cannot have read the official report furnished by Mr. Wade, the Chief Engineer for Water Conservation in New South Wales, and the officer whose capacity was so admitted that he was intrusted by the Government of that State with the work of reporting on irrigation in the United States. Mr. Wade, in a report based upon that of the Capital Sites Commission, and his own personal and intimate knowledge of the district, says—

The Federal Royal Commission appointed to report on the proposed sites for the Seat of Government considered that the Coombing Rivulet of eighty square miles catchment area, together with the Flynn's Creek, of eighteen square miles catchment area, were capable of supplying by gravitation a population of 54,000 people, at an average consumption at the rate of 100 gallons per head per diem.

They also mentioned that the Cadiangullong Creek, with a catchment area of fourteen and a half square miles, and Brown's Creek, with a catchment area of forty-seven square miles, were capable of supplying by gravitation an additional population of 35,000 people on a similar basis of consumption, or, in all, a total by gravitation of 89,000 people.

I am personally acquainted with all of these catchments, and am in accord with the Commissioners in their views as to basis of run off, and consider that, by amplifying the storage, a population in round numbers of 100,000 people could be supplied with 100 gallons per head per diem. The consumption of Melbourne is about 58½ gallons per diem per head of the population, while that of Sydney is about 43 gallons, and of London, speaking from memory, less than 40 gallons, so that the estimated available supply at Lyndhurst is calculated at, per head, about twice that provided for Melbourne, more than twice that provided for Sydney, and still greater proportionately than that of London. In addition to what can be obtained from a gravitation scheme, provision can be made for a pumping scheme.

Mr. KENNEDY.—At what cost?

Mr. KELLY.—Since the gravitation scheme would give such a liberal supply for a population of 100,000 people, it is hardly necessary to take the pumping scheme into consideration, beyond mentioning it as a possible augmentation of the other. The cost of supplying the city by gravitation would be about 7½d. per 1,000 gallons.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is exclusive of reticulation.

Mr. KELLY.—Yes. The cost of reticulation would bring the price of water up to 10d. or 1s. per 1,000 gallons, whereas in Melbourne it costs 1s. 6d. per 1,000 gallons. Furthermore, it must be borne in mind that that rate provides a sinking fund which would pay off the whole cost of the work within twenty-eight years.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—And there would be a supply of 126,000,000 gallons a day for irrigation purposes.

Mr. KELLY.—Yes. In view of these facts, which have been placed before honorable members on the authority of the Chief Engineer for Water Conservation in New South Wales, it was distinctly ungenerous of the honorable member for Moira to say that if the Lyndhurst site is chosen, the people living in the Capital may occasionally suffer from droughts.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I quoted from the Commissioners' report. They say that the creeks were dry at the time they visited the place.

Mr. KELLY.—The city of Sydney, which has a population of over 500,000, depends for its water supply on a storm-water catchment area.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The rainfall on that area is more than 15 inches per annum.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The average rainfall at Lyndhurst is 29·54 inches per annum.

Mr. KELLY.—Yes; and that is probably a higher rainfall than is enjoyed on the Camden catchment, because it is just inside the coastal range, and between it is the dividing range.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Mr. Pridham puts the aggregate cost of the Lyndhurst water supply at over £2,000,000.

Mr. KELLY.—Even that is nothing like so much as it would cost to connect Dalgety with the Gippsland line at Bairnsdale.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What is the total capital cost of Mr. Wade's scheme?

Mr. KELLY.—£581,000, which is less than it would cost to connect Tooma with the Victorian railway system, and about one-fifth of what it would cost to connect Dalgety with Bairnsdale. From the Federal point of view, Lyndhurst is quite the best of the proposed sites. The people of New South Wales place great importance upon the immediate settlement of this question. The feeling in that State—I do not now go into the question of whether it is justifiable—is that she has been tricked into the Federation for a consideration which is now being withheld from her. I am sure that honorable members are eager to honour the constitutional obligation to New South Wales, and if they could realize that if some of the proposed sites were chosen the people of that State would not regard it as an honouring of that obligation, because no benefit to them would result, they would act differently. If, after a delay of so many years has occurred, such a site is chosen, the feeling of irritation and discontent now smouldering in the mother State may burst out into a flame of indignation which would be prejudicial to the State, to the Commonwealth, and dangerous to the Union, which we are all bound to uphold.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro).—It is not my intention to speak at great length, because so much has already been said on this subject. Had it not been for the statements of some honorable members, I should hardly have deemed it necessary to say anything at all. The advantages of adopting the district which I favour are so apparent that the place has only to be seen, or to be spoken of, to commend itself to all who view the question from the national rather than the provincial standpoint. I was rather surprised to hear the honorable member for Wentworth follow the line of argument which has been used by a number of other representatives of New South Wales, by maintaining that the people of that State expected to receive, as the price for joining the Union, the location of the Capital within its borders. The honorable member stated that at the first referendum fewer than 80,000 persons voted for the Bill, and that the requisite majority would not have been obtained had it not been promised that the Seat of Government of the Commonwealth would be situated in New South Wales. I deny that that is so. No doubt, in the mother State, there was a strong feeling that the Capital should be situated within its borders, and many persons supported that view when urging the acceptance of the Constitution. But to-night we must deal with this matter from the Federal standpoint. We have to select a site where the Capital will remain, not for a few years, but for all time. Consequently, we must choose the best site available, observing the provision in the Constitution, not only literally, but in its spirit as well. The meaning of the Constitution is so clearly expressed that it does not require explanation, and, therefore, I do not propose to deal with it. I intend rather to address myself to some of the speeches which we have heard regarding certain of the proposed sites. In the first place, I ask the Committee to remember who they are who made those speeches.

The remarks of the honorable member for Moira are fresh in our memory, and, therefore, I shall commence with them. His objection to the Dalgety site is that it is too cold, and he had a great deal to say of the miserable weather and the snow which he met there. Yet, in the next breath he told us that the Snowy Mountains are nearer to Tooma—which he favours—than to Dalgety; and he had so much to say about the beauty of the Tooma climate that I almost expected to hear him recite the poem entitled "Beautiful Snow." He did not, however, give us to understand why the snow on one side of Mt. Kosciusko should be colder than the snow on the other side of it. That has not been made clear. Then again the honorable member told us, with the same cocksureness that has characterized him throughout, that he questioned the sufficiency of the water supply at Dalgety.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I quoted the report of the Commissioners.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I do not propose to answer the statement of honorable members, who, bereft of every other opportunity of traducing the Dalgety site, express doubts with regard to the water supply.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am glad the honorable member is getting a "turn" about the water supply.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The great sorrow of the honorable member's life is that he cannot show us any water at Lyndhurst. The honorable member is reputed to be a great temperance advocate, and he knows that unless an expenditure of upwards of £2,000,000 is incurred, it will be impossible to provide an adequate water supply at Lyndhurst. Mr. Pridham is my authority for that statement. No temperance man ought to advocate the adoption of the Lyndhurst site, because water will be so scarce that it will be necessary to lock up the water, and leave the whisky outside. We can fully understand that the honorable member is very touchy about any reference to the question of water supply. The honorable member for Moira stated that there was no timber at Dalgety; but he informed us that he had not visited that part of the country since 1884.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There was more timber there then than there is now.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The interjection made by the honorable member reminds me of the fact that he has now submitted his sixteenth site. He started with Lyndhurst ; then he raved about Tumut, became enthusiastic about Gadara and Lacmalac, afterwards advocated the claims of Albury, and finally urged that Tooma and Welaregang should receive favorable consideration. The record of the honorable member's performances in this respect will prove as interesting reading as Leaves from an Office Boy's Diary. So rapid has been his progress, that it reminds us of the entries—"Monday, hired out ; Tuesday, tired out ; Wednesday, fired out." I shall have something to say with regard to the honorable member, whose statements upon this Capital question entitle him to be regarded as the New South Wales Jack the Giant-Killer. The honorable member for Moira referred to the very large expenditure that would be involved if our present railway systems were extended to Southern Monaro. He forgot to tell us that, according to the figures given in the report recently quoted by the honorable member for Wentworth, at the very lowest possible estimate, an expenditure of £500,000 would be entailed if railway communication were established between the Victorian system and Welaregang. That money would have to be spent for the sole purpose of connecting Welaregang with the Victorian system. The same authority states that it would only be practicable to construct a railway from the New South Wales side, at an outlay that would amount to at least £300,000 or £400,000, unless a detour were made by way of Albury. I am quoting from the report, and propose to allow honorable members to decide for themselves.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That information is not contained in the report.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I have obtained my information from the reports presented to us. I am endeavouring to show how the honorable member for Moira has been induced to act upon information supplied by the honorable member for Hume, or some one else. I give the honorable member credit for good intentions, but he should remember that the way to a warmer place than Tumut is paved with good intentions, and should be more careful in accepting statements made to him by interested parties. The honorable member for Moira said that it was very questionable whether the Southern Monaro tableland could produce sufficient food to supply the requirements of a population of 50,000.

Mr. KENNEDY.—There again, I quote from the report of the Commissioners.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Let us see what one authority has to say with regard to that district. His statement reads as follows:—

I think if there is a district in which a railway should be constructed it is from the tableland to the port of Eden. There is no finer port in the Colony, and there is no finer country at the back of it. It is certainly to be regretted that the construction of the line has been left so long in abeyance. There is no possible doubt that the port must become a great shipping port, and will become a great centre of population.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Who was that authority?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for Hume.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I spoke of the Bega district.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The Bega country is close at hand, but it is not at the back of Eden.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Oh, yes, it is quite close to it.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Since that time—within the last five years—the honorable member for Hume has advocated the construction of a railway through the Southern Monaro tableland. He has said that it was a shame that there was no railway there, and has described the glories and wonders of the district. Now he tells us a series of Munchausen stories with regard to other sites. The words I have quoted represented the opinion of the honorable member five years ago, but now he expects him to hold that opinion now.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I had not seen that district. What I was referring to was the Bega country.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Bega is on the coast, and cannot be described as situated at the back of Eden. It is of no use for the honorable member to endeavour to escape from his dilemma in that way.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am not endeavouring to escape.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I know that the honorable member frequently wishes that Hansard had been burnt, because he knows that by its means he could be confounded out of his own mouth.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No ; I like Hansard. I was acting on the statements of the honorable member, and had not seen the place.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The statement I have quoted was made in 1891, before I had the pleasure of the honorable member's acquaintance.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No, no.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Politically, I mean. I believe that the honorable member was quite right in the statement he then made. I desire now to quote another statement made at the same time by a man who did a great deal for Federation, and whose name has not been mentioned in connexion with this debate. All those who believe in Federation should remember his name with respect. I refer to the late Sir Henry Parkes. He said—

It does not follow that because this very fine port has, from one cause or another, been neglected, that it will continue to be neglected. When that district is opened by railway communication, to which, in my judgment, it is richly entitled, Eden, which has a very fine harbor, will become the site of a very important maritime city. I have that faith in the progress of this country that I have long foreseen that, although retarded by unfavorable circumstances, this result is certain by the very force of growth from without. . . Twofold Bay has been the victim, if I may so term it, of singular neglect. I do not say whose fault it is. It is very difficult to distinguish; but, certainly, before many years, Twofold Bay, where the town of Eden is situated, will become one of the most important places in New South Wales. I have no doubt whatever of that. As far back as 1873 I advocated the construction of a railway to the port, to bring the traffic of Monaro to the bay.

That was the honest opinion of a man who knew the country, and it was backed up by that of the honorable member for Hume.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That railway has not been constructed yet.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—No, and if the honorable member has his way, it will probably be some little time before the railway is built. The time, however, for log-rolling in connexion with railways on the part of the honorable member has gone by.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member tried to log-roll one or two railways with me.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It is fortunate that we have such a publication as Hansard. Its records are such that it induces us to accept the statements of the honorable member with not the proverbial grain, but a bag of salt. The honorable member, when he spoke last night, made an attack upon the late Mr. Alexander Oliver.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not attack him.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member expressed regret that the late Mr. Oliver had made a certain report.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes; I regretted that he had issued his last report.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Because it did not suit the honorable member.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not say that.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—No; the honorable member did not say so, but we know what the honorable member's policy is. He has openly announced it to be win, tie, or wrangle.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am going to win.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member will neither win, tie, nor wrangle. He may walk about and boast that he will be able to turn a number of honorable members, that in fact he has their votes in his pocket, but he will find that other honorable members have opinions as well as himself, and that whilst they may, as I do, entertain a very warm personal regard for him, they will not sacrifice their principles in order to please him, by voting for his latest fad. I would remind the honorable member, who has boasted that he will be able to turn round a number of honorable members, that he should not "halloa" before he is out of the wood.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have never made such a statement.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I confidently appeal for the support of honorable members who knew Mr. Oliver, when I say that no man in New South Wales was better fitted for the task intrusted to him. The honorable member for Hume appointed him. He is very clever in selecting good men for certain work, and he often gets into great trouble over them. He selects good men, and whilst everything goes to suit him they are all right. After appointing Mr. Oliver, with the approbation of the people of New South Wales, he has turned round and accused him of having found fault with the conclusions of the Royal Commission appointed by the Commonwealth Government. I have nothing to say against the Commissioners. As I told the honorable member for Moira, no one doubts their honesty; but a great many persons doubt the impartiality of one member of the Commission.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is a very unfair thing to say.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I intend to say what I think.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is very unfair even to think it.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I intend to prove it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member cannot prove it.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Perhaps not to the satisfaction of the honorable member. The late Mr. Oliver was appointed by the New South Wales Government to report upon the various sites suggested for the Federal Capital. About sixty sites were offered. Mr. Oliver went round the country and made patient inquiry into the respective claims of about thirty of these.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—He inquired closely into the merits of fourteen sites.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—He made a general inquiry in respect of about thirty sites, but he examined the claims of fourteen of them very carefully. What was the result? He advised that Bombala was the best site available, with Yass and Orange coming next in that order. He also added that if Tumut were connected by rail he would have to include it in his list of the most eligible sites. The honorable member for Hume has declared that the late Mr. Oliver had a peculiar habit of selecting men who were incapable of doing the work which was assigned to them.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not say that.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member said that he did not select men who were at the top of their profession.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member has no right to make what he knows to be misstatements.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Mr. Oliver singled out the sites which I have mentioned. What do we find? That after three or four years of inquiry the most suitable sites have been practically narrowed down to those which the late Mr. Oliver selected in the first instance. That is a great compliment to that gentleman, and it is a pity indeed, now that he is in his grave, that comparisons should be made between him and some of the other Commissioners. The honorable member for Hume has found fault with the late Mr. Oliver for taking exception to the appointment of Mr. Kirkpatrick to the Capital Sites Commission. I have no desire to say anything derogatory to Mr. Kirkpatrick, but I do hold that to compare him with the late Mr. Oliver, from the stand-point of ability to sift evidence, is like comparing a 6 feet by 8 feet tent with the Parliament House in which we sit. In justice to his memory, I claim that the honorable member for Hume indulged in a most unfair attack upon him. The honorable member has been going round the country talking about the blizzards experienced at Bombala. No doubt he thought that the cry would catch on; but, as a matter of fact, it has become such a standing joke that when people see him approaching the exclaim, "Here comes Bombala's blizzard Bill." It may be an interesting sort of joke, but, unfortunately, this is not a question to joke about. Personally I do not mind the honorable member's statements, but I feel that it is my duty to point out how misleading they are, lest some honorable members who are not acquainted with the facts might be disposed to believe them. Who does the honorable member know about Bombala? He went there, and was upon the sick-list. He immediately obtained special coach, and asked to be driven home as fast as possible. When he arrived at Cooma, he declared that it must be a God-forsaken place, because it contained no refreshment-room.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No; the honorable member for Perth was with me at the time.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Yes; and the honorable member has pictured the terrible misery of the honorable member for Perth. No doubt he was very much disgusted with that honorable member when he found that, despite all that had been to him during this sick coach journey, he had voted for the selection of Bombala. I say that we should get along much better if honorable members would rely upon the merits of the sites which they advocate, instead of attempting to traduce other sites in the hope that some honorable member will be foolish enough to believe their statements. The honorable member for Hume has been going about affirming that neither the Dalgety nor the Southern Monaro has any chance of being selected, in the hope that some honorable members will support the Tooma site.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—What did the honorable member say about typhoid at Tumut?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—What did the Capital Sites Commissioners say? The evidence taken by them was to the effect that one creek supplied a number of typhoid cases for a period of seventeen years.

Mr. WATSON.—Oh, no.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I say that my statement is correct.

Mr. WATSON.—I should like the honorable member to quote the particular passage from the evidence. It was stated that there had not been a single case of typhoid for seven years.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It is hardly the province of the Prime Minister to chime in, with a view to helping the honorable member for Hume. He has given him sufficient help in the past. It is a fortunate thing for me that, to a certain extent, the honorable gentleman is muzzled. Some of the statements which he has made against the Monaro district will not bear analysis.

Mr. WATSON.—I have never spoken upon the subject.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—But during the last Parliament the Prime Minister made desperate efforts to prevent the Monaro site from being selected. He made it a personal matter against the Monaro district.

Mr. WATSON.—A personal matter against the honorable member?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—No, but the Prime Minister used his own personal popularity with honorable members to prevent the Monaro district from being selected. He has sworn a sort of vendetta against that district. However, I do not mind his opposition, because he fights in the open. The honorable member for Hume has stated that trees will not grow in the Monaro district.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There are very few trees there.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—If honorable members will peruse the report of the Commissioners, they will find that it contains a reference to the "inexhaustible forests" of Bombala. That, I think, is a sufficient answer to the statement of the honorable member. When he was asked where all the opossum skins came from if there were no trees at Bombala, he solemnly declared that they were ground opossums. Had they been under-ground opossums, he might have been an authority upon the subject.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Will the honorable member produce a few more inventions?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I know what is responsible for this wonderful change on the part of the honorable member. The other day the Age published a copy of a letter which had been written by the honorable member to a newspaper in his district, in which he declared his conviction that a majority of honorable members were in favour of selecting the Bombala site.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think I said that.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member did say it. His letter is headed: "The New Idea," and it appeared in the Age of the 4th July last. That journal says—

A Riverina paper has received a letter from Sir William Lyne, stating that there is no doubt that a majority in the Federal Parliament is against the sites near the town of Tumut. Sir William Lyne states that he is now endeavouring to get the area selected for Bombala so extended that it will take in Tumut. Members who visited the Murray site with Sir William Lyne have impressed others with the suitability of that locality, and it is likely there will be a sufficient number to support the new idea. He says that any amount of underground engineering is going on in favour of Bombala, and some of his colleagues in the late Ministry are the principal movers.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not my letter.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Not only is it the honorable member's letter, but the Gundagai Independent, which is published in his own constituency, reprints it, criticises it, and frankly declares that if a Tumut site cannot win by the adoption of other tactics than these, it is preferable that it should be left out in the cold.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is the honorable member's paper.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I have never been in Gundagai. That is the statement made by a newspaper which is published in the honorable member's own district.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Will the honorable member read the statement from the Gundagai Independent?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I will read it for the benefit of the honorable member presently.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That was Mr. Reid's letter.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member induced Mr. David Reid to come to Melbourne to be exhibited as a product of the Tumut district, but he sent him home very rapidly when I discovered that all his early life had been spent in the Monaro district. The Gundagai Independent takes the honorable member to task for having made such a fatal blunder. A little while ago, Mr. B. R. Wise affirmed that the Monaro tableland was a very suitable place for the establishment of the Federal Capital. The honorable member for Hume immediately denounced him for having interfered. He said that Mr. Wise had no right to indulge in any such criticism. Apparently, nobody has a right to criticise. I have no desire to say anything against the Tooma site, because I have not seen it. But I have seen the Albury site, and there is not much difference between the two. The former is a little closer to the snow line, but its altitude is about the same as is that of Albury. It is between 1,100 and 1,600 feet above sea level. The last Parliament decided that no site should be eligible for selection which had an altitude of less than 1,500 feet, but that provision has been carefully eliminated from this Bill. Why? In my opinion, because its omission suited the district represented by the honorable member.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member has been told that I knew nothing about the matter, and consequently it is not fair for him to make that statement.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I do not say that the provision was eliminated at the instigation of the honorable member, but I believe that it was omitted to suit his district. Otherwise, how is it that when one of the surveyors discovered that the sites in the Tumut area, which had an altitude of more than 1,500 feet, were not suitable for the Federal Capital, inquiries were immediately set on foot in respect of sites with a less altitude. Was it merely a remarkable coincidence?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is a very unworthy insinuation.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—In view of the suggestions made last night by the honorable member as to trickery having been resorted to, I am not much concerned about his complaint. There is certainly reasonable ground for inquiring what was the reason for this change.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not know the reason. The honorable member should ask the Prime Minister; the honorable member knows that I was not aware that the alteration had been made until he mentioned it to me.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member will have an opportunity presently to refute my statements if he can. Is it not singular that even to-day we have no information showing whether Tooma has an elevation of 1,100 feet or of 1,500 feet.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Had the honorable member taken the trouble to look at the map he would have gained the information for himself.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It has an elevation of between 900 and 1,100 feet.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for South Sydney, whose word will be readily accepted, states that Tooma has an elevation of between 900 and 1,100 feet.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If he makes that statement after looking at the map his word is not worth much.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I shall not comment on the honorable member's statement as to the old lady who died a day or two ago at the age of 102, after living in the Upper Murray district for fifty years. That is a very feeble way to attempt to bolster up the merits of a particular site. The honorable member has been examining the list of deaths in the district, in order to discover such cases, and is welcome to any evidence of that kind that may be forthcoming. I have no objection to bolstering up the claims of Tooma in that way, but I certainly object to his making an assertion about the Southern Monaro district which he is unable to prove. I told the Committee last night that a cousin of mine had been sent to the Upper Murray district, with a view to influencing honorable members against its selection. I can only say that I have inspected the sites in company with other honorable members, who know the country as well as, if not better than, the honorable member for Hume. I was not aware that I had a cousin living in that district; but if I have, he shows his good sense in speaking against its selection. The reason why I doubt whether the man in question is a cousin of mine is that I do not think it possible that he would leave Southern Monaro for that part of New South Wales. Then the honorable member has made various suggestions as to timber resources of the Southern Monaro district. It has been drummed into our ears to such an extent that there is no timber in that district that we are constrained to examine the reports of the Commissioners who were appointed by the honorable member to ascertain the real facts. And what do we find? We find that they refer to the inexhaustible forests to be found there. We have also statistics as to the output of saw-mills in Southern Monaro.

Are those saw-mills engaged in cutting up blocks of ice?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Possibly granite.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It is, to say the least of it, somewhat singular that the honorable member for Hume should assert that there is no timber in the neighbourhood of Dalgety or Bombala, when there are three saw-mills in the district, and they carry on a thriving and lucrative business. Another assertion made by the honorable member for Hume was that Cooma was supposed to comprise the best lands in the Monaro district. Every honorable member who comes from New South Wales knows what reliance can be placed on such a statement. It is said that the railway constructed to Cooma does not pay. But what are the facts associated with the construction of that line? In New South Wales a Public Works Committee, consisting of Members of Parliament, deal with every proposal to build a railway. They analyze the reports, consider the estimates, and having gone closely into all the facts make a recommendation to Parliament. The Prime Minister was at one time a member of that Public Works Committee, and will be able to tell the Committee that it invariably makes an exhaustive inquiry in regard to all the proposed works submitted to its consideration. One of the boasts of the Committee is that it has saved the State many millions of pounds by refusing to recommend many works which have been suggested. After the Public Works Committee have inquired into a proposal to construct certain lines, the Railway Commissioners are asked to make a report on the lines selected for construction by the Public Works Committee. That Committee, however, while the honorable member for Hume was in office, in New South Wales, reported in favour of the construction of the Cooma line, and the Railway Commissioners subsequently stated that they were amazed to find so great an area of good country stretching away from Cooma farther south. On commercial grounds—quite apart from any suggestion as to the establishment of the Federal Capital in that district—they recommended the construction of the line. That is my answer to the honorable member's assertions. The railway estimates are open for inspection, but it is unnecessary for me to deal fully with the figures, because honorable members are already familiar with them. I would point out, however, that an old estimate of the cost of constructing a railway from Cooma to Dalgety is £127,000. We are told that we may take off 20 per cent. from many of the old estimates, so that in round figures the construction of the line to Dalgety, which is half way between Cooma and Bombala, would involve an outlay of about £100,000. To carry on the line to Bombala would require the further expenditure of a similar amount.

Mr. KELLY.—What would be the cost of constructing a railway line from Bairnsdale to Dalgety?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I might as well ask the honorable member what it would cost to construct a railway line from Lyndhurst to Fremantle. All these railways will be made in due course. Surely the honorable member knows that it is not proposed to do everything at once. Much has been said about the cost of a water supply for Dalgety or Bombala, but we have Mr. Pridham's report that an outlay of over £2,000,000 would be necessary to secure a water supply at Lyndhurst. We have a further estimate as to what the cost would be per head, provided that the population of the Capital were sufficient to pay the cost of every gallon of water brought to Lyndhurst. Honorable members who favour that site have carefully refrained from mentioning the aggregate cost of a water supply, but I shall give the Committee some facts bearing on the question. I have nothing to say against Lyndhurst, all that I desire is that honorable members shall be in possession of all the facts, and that they shall consider them.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Has the honorable member Mr. Pridham's report as to the cost of a water supply for Lyndhurst? The £2,000,000 is the cost with working expenses capitalized.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It is remarkable that the honorable member for Macquarie has not seen fit to give the Committee the estimate of the total cost.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There is a running river flowing by the Dalgety and Bombala sites, and if either of these were selected, the only expense which would have to be incurred to secure a water supply for the Capital would be in providing a tank or a pump or something of the kind. If we selected Lyndhurst it would be almost impossible for the residents of the Capital to obtain a drink of water. When I visited that site we could not obtain one. The honorable member for Hume also told us a story about the Bairnsdale railway and the zigzag.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have the plans here.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Some of the honorable member's plans in regard to the settlement of this question will fall to the ground. I am prepared to accept the opinion of the Chief Victorian Railway Commissioner in preference to that of the honorable member for Hume, in regard to the extension of the railway from Bairnsdale to the border. The Commission appointed by him report that the Chief Victorian Railway Commissioner stated that a railway from Bairnsdale via Orbost would have to be constructed for State purposes, quite apart from any question as to the establishment of the Federal Capital at Bombala or Dalgety. The honorable member is very ingenious in endeavouring to saddle the sites in the Southern Monaro district with all the expense of building such a line. If we established the Capital at Dalgety or Bombala, the first expenditure necessary would be incurred in supplying railway communication; but there would be no occasion to spend any money in securing a water supply. We should have a pure stream of running water at hand, and practically every other requirement would be available, so that no additional expense would be incurred. On the other hand, it would be impossible to construct a railway to Tooma from Victoria, or to connect that site with the railway system of New South Wales, without incurring a very heavy outlay. We have also to consider whether we should for all time have to rely on a railway for the carriage of heavy freights to the Capital, or whether we should avail ourselves of the great highway of the world—the ocean waterway—which is within fifty miles of Bombala. Comparisons are odious, and I should not make them, but that I desire to answer some of the statements of the honorable member for Hume. The Commissioners appointed by him when Minister of Home Affairs report that the Chief Railway Commissioner of Victoria said that a railway from Bairnsdale via Orbost would have to be constructed for State purposes. That should be a sufficient answer to his assertions in that respect. When speaking last night the honorable member referred to tricks and strategy and other like methods, which he said had been resorted to; but any one who gets the best of him when fighting on these lines should be welcome to his victory. He stated that Bombala and Dalgety were further south than is Welaregang, but I have had the map measured, and find that Dalgety, in a direct line nearer Sydney than is the Upper Murray site. The honorable member is not very sure on that point, but the Upper Murray site were nearer Sydney than is Dalgety, he would have no hesitation in mentioning that fact. If a railway were constructed to Tooma it would have to strike in at Queanbeyan, and would be necessary to tunnel under Mount Kosciusko, and, indeed, right through the Australian Alps. On the face of it, the suggestion that such a railway should be constructed is too absurd to receive a moment's consideration. The honorable member admits that for three years—during the life of the first Federal Parliament—I was of opinion that the selection of the Upper Murray site would be unfair to Sydney, and he credits the honorable member for Grampians with having introduced that site into the arena. We know that the honorable member for Grampians, and the honorable member for Moira spoke out for the Upper Murray site when this question was before us last session; but what assistance did they receive from the honorable member for Hume, who was the Minister of Home Affairs? He might very well have granted the inspection which they asked on behalf of the Upper Murray site, just as he granted my request that Dalgety should be inspected. I desire to acknowledge that in that respect the honorable member treated Dalgety very fairly.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am glad to hear that I did something right.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—If the honorable member for Grampians, and the honorable member for Moira thought that the Upper Murray site was such an excellent one, why did they not take action? What were they doing? Were they asleep?

Mr. SKENE.—We were not quite as clever as was the honorable member.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—When those who favoured other sites succeeded in obtaining reports from the Commission, they sat quietly by, and it was only at the last moment that they were able to secure the consideration of the Upper Murray district. If Tooma is to be seriously considered, why should it not be scrutinized closely as other sites have been?

Mr. KENNEDY.—We shall be delighted to have it examined.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member became rather heated this evening when he was referred to a statement in the report of the Commission on the Murray River, that the water was slimy. What position should we occupy if, without any information as to the altitude of the Upper Murray site, the area available, the cost of providing an adequate water supply, and the characteristics of the climate, and only a hazy notion of whether it could be connected with the railway system of New South Wales—with nothing before us save that snow-capped hills can be seen in the distance—we selected that site? If it went forth to the world that we had selected that site, in the absence of any information in regard to all these important points, would not our proceedings appear farcical in the eyes of the people? The honorable member for Hume raked up one or two photographs of the Upper Murray district, and exhibited them in this House. I should like to know whether they are not photographs of country on the Victorian side of the river.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—One of them is.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I invite him to inform the Committee how far the site which he now so warmly advocates is from the River Murray, and what he has to say as to the unearned increment about which he waxed eloquent last session, when he submitted a map of Tumut to the Committee, and pointed to the large area of Crown land which we might secure there. It would be interesting to have an explanation on that point, and to know why he has changed the opinion which he held for three years that the selection of the Upper Murray site would be unfair to New South Wales.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It would be just as fair as would be the selection of Bombala or Dalgety.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—But Bombala and Dalgety were in the list originally submitted to us in the last Parliament.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And I objected to both of them.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—In the first report made by the late Mr. Oliver on something like thirteen different sites, Southern Monaro was placed first for water. The Commissioners which the honorable member appointed objected to go to Dalgety.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Only one member of the Commission objected.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am not going to attack any of the officers.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Only one objected to go to Dalgety, and it was not Mr. Kirkpatrick.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The report of Mr. Kirkpatrick, against whom I say nothing, was a most remarkable one, as coming from a Commissioner who put the Bombala and Dalgety sites, whatever their faults may be, nearly last on the list in regard to water supply. The honorable member for Hume possibly knows that the absence of a water supply is a strong objection, and that is why he thought it necessary to say something unkind about Mr. Oliver, who merely repeated what his engineers had told him. Mr. Oliver only said what he thought, and what was thought by a great many people in the country, namely, that Mr. Kirkpatrick, no doubt unconsciously, was biased in favour of two particular sites. It is remarkable, however, that both of these sites happen to be in the district represented by the honorable member for Hume. I am sorry that the honorable member for Hume should drag these remarks from me. No one knows better than that honorable member what the honorable and learned member for Balaclava and Sir Alexander Peacock said in regard to Albury. Both of these gentlemen expressed the opinion that to select Albury would be unfair. We remember the desperate efforts made by the honorable member for Hume in support of Albury—how he stood on the hilltop there, in the midst of one of the regular daily duststorms, and said, "Gentlemen, there is a lovely site here if we could only see it." The honorable member for Hume knows that it was the visit of honorable members to Tumut which killed the chances of that site. Tumut was regarded as a compromise, but that visit, as I say, put it "out of the running." We can remember the honorable member for Hume standing on the Tumut site, and as the perspiration poured off him, remarking—"This is a most invigorating climate." What has made the honorable member change his mind as to Albury? What is the difference between Tumut, Tooma, and Welaregang? Why did he not stick to Gadara, Lacmalac, Tomorroma, or one of the other sites on which he was previously so keen? Did not Mr. Chesterman make an enthusiastic report in favour of Tooma? But in that report he was like Mr. Kirkpatrick, not speaking from official records, but from memory. The honorable member forgets that Mr. Chesterman enthused about Tomorroma and Batlow.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It was the Prime Minister who discovered Batlow.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Possibly Mr. Chesterman thought that he was following a pretty good judge, and would get a strong backing. The honorable member for Hume is clever enough to know that the Prime Minister would not think of voting for the Upper Murray site. The Prime Minister, however, is in favour of Batlow, and by including Lacmalac, Tumut, and Tomorroma all in one district with Batlow, the honorable member for Hume has been clever enough to "gather in" the Prime Minister. The worst of it is that when the Prime Minister makes up his mind he sticks to his determination, whereas I should be very glad to see him change and give his support to the Monaro sites. I do not wish to say anything more about the honorable member for Hume's tirade of abuse in regard to Monaro, nor do I want to say anything against the site which he favours. The honorable member's statements are in cold type, and in my own simple way I have endeavoured to analyze them. Judging by the lightning changes on the part of the honorable member for Hume, those honorable members who propose to rely on his judgment will have to make changes equally dazzling.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Is this an attack on the honorable member for Grampians?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for Grampians has consistently advocated the Upper Murray site; he has never said that the selection of such a site would be unfair to New South Wales, or that any place under an altitude of 1,500 feet is unsuitable. I have, however, a private grievance against the honorable member for Grampians, who has not only endeavoured to defeat the selection of the site which I favour, but has now stolen my leader. We hear nothing now from the honorable member for Hume about the wonderful maize and tobacco crops at Tumut. The honorable member used to tell us of maize which topped the fence, and of tobacco crops which were so strong that the product was unsaleable. The honorable member was, however, reminded that where such tobacco and maize can be grown—although the soil may be fertile—is hardly a place in which men can live with comfort. The honorable member is in possession of about half-a-dozen maps, but guarantee that amongst them we could not find that large map which he used to talk around amongst honorable members in order to show the immense area of Crown land available at Tumut. We all know that there are plenty of experienced men looking for good land—that many are four balloting for one area—and it is nonsense to tell us that there are now any great areas of good Crown land available. As a matter of fact, there is no such land available; it is all locked up in reserves, or is so far away from markets as to be of no use. This Upper Murray site is to be seriously considered by honorable members, then, in justice to the country, and in justice to ourselves, we ought to have some further information regarding it. We ought not to be such arrant fools as to select a place about which we know nothing.

Mr. KELLY.—We do not want any further delay.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Nor do I, but delay is preferable to a crime; and would certainly be a crime to select a place without full knowledge. I am told by honorable members who have visited the Upper Murray site that the land is very fertile, that there is plenty of water, and that the climate is good. I have no doubt that these statements are true—that honorable members honestly believe that the climate and the water supply are all right. But we must remember what the honorable member for Wentworth said to-night when he told us of the thirteen running streams which could be seen from the Bombala site coming down the hillside like so many streaks of silver. The report of the engineer was that a water supply could be got by gravitation, and a nice case was built up for Bombala, until the mistake in this connexion was discovered. Mr. Oliver, who has been taken to task by the honorable member for Hume, frankly admitted, like an honest man, that a mistake had been made, but he did not admit that water could not be brought to Bombala by gravitation. Such a work is only a question of money. We should have to go further back for the water; and the same remarks apply to all the sites. No doubt water can be seen flowing through the Upper Murray territory, but it is a question of the distance it would have to be carried to the Federal Capital.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Sixteen miles.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—No doubt the honorable member honestly belie-that that is the distance. I was under a similar impression in regard to Bombala, but I now admit that it would be necessary to go further back in order to obtain water by gravitation. Indeed, if we go back far enough we can get water from the Snowy River; and, according to the reports we have received, there are great falls half-way between Bombala and Dalgety, which could be utilized for the provision of cheap pumping power. Let us look at the question from another aspect. Let us leave the Royal Commission which made the peculiar report to which I have referred, and ask ourselves what was done by the late Parliament. The late Government have been taken much to task for not expediting this matter. It seems to me, however, that a great deal of expedition was used. The reports which were called for took a long time to prepare, and when they had been supplied, certain votes were given by honorable members, and changes took place in this House. We fixed on an altitude of 1,500 feet as necessary for the Capital, and further reports were called for. And what happened when the House proceeded to vote? At first Bombala was at the head of the poll, but by degrees other sites were dropped out, and at last Tumut defeated Bombala by one vote, the supporters of the Bombala site then transferring their support to the former. The Bill was sent backwards and forwards between the two Houses, but we came to no conclusion. It was then determined to get further information, and the right honorable member for Swan was asked to make an inspection with a view to a report. Who is Sir John Forrest?

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! The honorable member must not address other honorable members by name.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I was speaking of the right honorable member for Swan in connexion with the report he made. The honorable member for Macquarie has told us, what is perfectly true, that Mr. Wade is a great engineer, to whom, on a question of water supply, we should pay much attention. We all know the late Mr. Oliver's reputation, and read with respect any report he may have written. But if there is one man who is fitted more than another to make an inspection of the kind—who, by his past experience in exploration and his known impartiality in the matter, is capable of giving an unbiased opinion—it is the right honorable member for Swan. That is not merely my opinion, a similar expression having been used by the honorable member for South Sydney. It is possible that the honorable member for Darling and others behind the Government might not be inclined to accept the opinion of the right honorable member for Swan on arbitration or other industrial matters—although in Western Australia the right honorable gentleman showed his liberality in these directions—but his greatest political opponents must admit that it was a very happy idea to ask him, as Minister of Home Affairs, to visit this part of the Commonwealth and make a report.

Mr. KELLY.—The right honorable member was "personally conducted."

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—No doubt the right honorable member was "personally conducted" by Colonel Owen; but I cannot understand why the honorable member for Wentworth should take exception to that fact.

Mr. KELLY.—I take no exception.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Why does the honorable member remark, with a sneer, that the right honorable member was "personally conducted"?

Mr. KELLY.—There is no sneer.

Mr. WATSON.—I think the honorable member for Eden-Monaro went part of the way with the right honorable member.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I did not go round with the right honorable member on that occasion. I did accompany him in May, two years ago, on a visit to the Monaro sites. The Prime Minister, I am very glad to say, is now to a certain extent muzzled, but I can remember the wild statements which he made in regard to Eden-Monaro, and which he was unable to prove.

Mr. WATSON.—I can prove every statement I made.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Why should the Prime Minister suggest that the fact that I accompanied the right honorable member for Swan would influence the opinion of that gentleman?

Mr. WATSON.—I do not think that the presence of the honorable member for Eden-Monaro would make any difference to the right honorable member for Swan.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—We have heard a good deal about the blizzards in the Eden-Monaro district, but it must be remembered that honorable members made their visit in winter—in May or June.

Mr. WATSON.—In May.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—April.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member's statement as to the visit being paid in April is very like his story about the blizzards. At any rate, I did not make the mistake which the honorable member made when he took honorable members on a visit to Tumut in the summer time, with the result that the chances of that place were killed "in one act." We have to ask ourselves what were the qualifications of the right honorable member for Swan to make a report of the kind desired. In his report he laid down the essentials for a Capital Site, looking very carefully into the facts connected with the whole of the sites; and it is remarkable that a large majority of those who made personal visits of inspection are in favour of Monaro.

Mr. SKENE.—The right honorable member for Swan has not seen Tooma.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—In my opinion if the right honorable member for Swan were to see Tooma and believed that it was a better site than Dalgety, he would have no hesitation in saying so. I am sure that every other honorable member believes the same of him. It is an insult to him to say that he gave his opinion with regard to Dalgety simply because I went with him. He also had with him Colonel Owen, the Inspector-General of Public Works, a very able engineer, who probably has no axe to grind. He knows the Monaro country well. He has been camping there.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Trout fishing.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—If honorable members want fish stories they can get them from the honorable member for Hume. What does Colonel Owen say? He reports strongly in favour of Southern Monaro. I point to these as the opinions of disinterested experts, whose reputation, to a large extent, hangs upon their judgment of these various sites. They stand by Southern Monaro thoroughly. Is it not a remarkable thing that the bulk of the Victorian members and the bulk of the New South Wales members respectively are supporting either the Upper Murray or the Lyndhurst site? I do not say that they are not honestly supporting those sites. I give all honorable members full credit for honesty, and believe that they will vote for the site which they consider to be best in the interests of the Commonwealth. But, nevertheless, is it not remarkable that the Upper Murray vote will be principally given by Victorian members, whilst the Lyndhurst vote will be principally given by New South Wales members? Is it not also a remarkable fact that the bulk of the members from other States who have no personal interest to serve in favouring one site more than another, are supporting the Southern Monaro site? I should be quite prepared to take the decision of honorable members representing the other States, and to let the representatives of Victoria and New South Wales stand aside altogether.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is very rich.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I know what the verdict would be. Of course, I do not propose to take such a course; but still it is remarkable that the bulk of the independent opinion of this House is in favour of the Southern Monaro site. A great many speeches have been delivered with regard to the Federal Capital. It has been considered from many stand points. We had a very glowing speech from the honorable member for Richmond. He dwelt upon the beauties and the glories and the grandeur of a Capital such as Australia should possess, assured us that the site for which he intended to vote was most beautiful, and urged that it was necessary that we should consider picturesqueness. But is it not a peculiar thing that the honorable member was not able to assure the Committee that he had even seen the site which he proposes to support? The honorable member for Gwydir also made a very able speech. It was a fine descriptive speech, and any one who heard it must have admired very much the earnestness with which he entered into details. In the course of his remarks he read a long letter which he had sent to the Sydney Daily Telegraph, in which he set forth some facts which had been given to him—probably by the honorable member for Hume—showing that during the drought the Upper Murray site was able to maintain fifteen sheep or one bullock to the acre.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Daily Telegraph reported the honorable member as making two hours' speech in favour of Tooma.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The fact is that the honorable member for Gwydir, after making a very able speech in support of the Southern Monaro site, dwelling strongly upon the reports of the expert declared that he intended to vote for a site which he knew nothing about, except that he had been there for a very short time, in company with the honorable member for Hume. That was a remarkable position to take up. It does some credit to the honorable member's imagination that I should attempt to arrive at a conclusion such slender evidence. The right honorable member for East Sydney has assured the Committee that the finger of destiny is pointing to Lyndhurst. All I can say is that, if we were to select Lyndhurst on account of its accessibility, we should be taking a very short-sighted view of our responsibilities. It would be very peculiar if we were to select a site for the Capital on account of the conveniences which at present prevail in regard to the conveyance of Members of Parliament, and were to ignore the fact, which I take to be certain, that within a very few years, wherever we fix the Capital Site, the district will be riddled with railways. It is taking a short-sighted view to say that we should dump down the Capital at some place where there is a railway at present, whilst ignoring the means of communication that are bound to be provided in the future. The honorable and learned member for Wannon has urged that the Capital ought to be located in Sydney, on the ground that that would lead to a saving in expenditure, but I would remind the Committee that there could then be no return whatever to the Commonwealth in the shape of unearned increment. The effect would simply be to make the corner blocks and the good sites that are now held by private individuals worth far more money, without the Commonwealth receiving any return. We ought to put the Capital in the bush, on the score of economy. It does not need any argument to show that a "bush Capital," as it is called, would be very much cheaper for the people of Australia than a Capital situated in one of the great cities. I venture to say that of the three western sites Lyndhurst is the worst. Its supporters may bolster it up as much as they please, but it seems clear to my mind that if any western site is to be chosen, Lyndhurst certainly ought not to be favoured. Either Orange or Bathurst would be preferable. The strong feeling in favour of Lyndhurst is simply a reflex of the opinions expressed by the Sydney daily newspapers. Honorable members get a good deal of their politics from these journals. Their views are drummed into us every morning. I do not, however, question the honesty of the supporters of the Lyndhurst site. I am quite sure that the honorable member for North Sydney would not support it unless he believed in it. I can also quite understand the anxiety of the honorable member for Macquarie to see it selected. I feel like that myself sometimes regarding Monaro.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Is the honorable member supporting Bombala or Dalgety?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I will tell the honorable member if he will answer a question which I put to him. I am quite prepared to take the area that was selected by the Senate. I think we ought to have a large area. I wish to have a gateway to the sea, and also an entrance from another State. It is in my opinion for Parliament to select the area, and the choosing of the actual site is rather a matter for experts.

Mr. ROBINSON.—But what about the honorable member's constituents?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Probably the honorable and learned member for Wannon is one of those who consider the desires of their constituents a good deal. Personally, I have no hesitation in saying that I like the Bombala site, and believe in it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Which site is the honorable member going to vote for?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I believe that Bombala is the best site.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Is the honorable member going to vote for it?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I will vote for a district or territory, not a particular site. I have made a careful analysis of the opinions of honorable members, and I know that very few of them are prepared to vote for Bombala. I am not fool enough to throw away my vote. I am not prepared to follow the course which the honorable member for Hume took on a former occasion. I am not going to urge honorable members to vote for Dalgety, while I myself vote for Bombala. I urge them to vote for Monaro district, and leave the selection of the exact site to experts. In this way all selectors of Monaro will stand solidly together. I strongly resent the inference of the honorable and learned member for Wannon; and as for the honorable member for Hume, he should be one of the last to make the insinuation which his question implies. He, himself, on the occasion of the first ballot, voted for Albury, whilst he urged other honorable members to vote for Tumut, deserting one site after another, and afterwards trying to placate the supporters of Tumut by talking vaguely of a railway. An honorable member who pursues such a course should be the last to ask a question. I ask the honorable gentleman now to com-out from his ambush. I ask him if he is prepared to tell the Committee for which site he intends to vote. I pause for the honorable gentleman's reply. There is no fear that I shall get an answer to that question. This is but an instance of what the honorable member for Hume will try to do. I tell the Committee frankly that I believe Bombala is the best site; but as a large number of honorable members have assured me, in a perfectly straightforward way, that they believe in Dalgety, and will vote for it, while they will not vote for Bombala, I say frankly that when we come to the question of the selection of the exact site, I shall vote for the site in the Monaro district which I think will win.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Does the honorable member think he ought to do that?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for Macquarie has done some funny things himself. He was at one time very much concerned as to how he should vote, but I believe he has come to a conclusion on the subject at last. I am free to admit, however, that in little matters of this kind, if we required any one to watch the honorable member for Hume, no one could do it better than the honorable member for Macquarie.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Has the honorable member made a careful analysis of the voting that is likely to be recorded for Tumut and Tooma?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I have been asked a question, and I have had no hesitation whatever in answering it. I should like to know whether there is any other information I can give honorable members. I am acting entirely above board, and I am saying exactly what I think on this matter.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Is that something unusual?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It may be the opinion of the honorable member for Moira that it is something unusual for me to say what I think, but if I desired an opinion on that subject I should not go to the honorable member for it. The honorable member usually speaks his mind pretty frankly, and I can well understand why he is not prepared to accept my analysis of his statements. He realizes now that he has had a lot of absurd statements pumped into him by some one else, probably the honorable member for Hume, and he has given them out here like a phonograph. The honorable member now wishes to take it out of me, because I have shown that there is nothing in those statements.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have not stolen the honorable gentleman's leader.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It is rather hard for the honorable member for Moira to have to renounce the honorable member for Hume, but I can well understand why he should do so when he finds that that honorable gentleman led him astray at the start.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable gentleman never mentioned the subject to me.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for Moira now admits that it would be better that he should not follow the honorable member for Hume in the future. We have heard a great deal of the productiveness of the different sites. When the honorable member for Gippsland quotes certain figures, showing the productiveness of the Monaro district, the honorable members for Hume and Macquarie pooh-poohe the idea of anything growing in that district. They at once stated that what Mr. Coghlan said could not be correct. His statistical records of the wheat and maize grown in the Monaro district are not accepted by the honorable member for Hume.

Mr. WATSON.—In garden plots.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Garden plots are not troubling the Prime Minister at the present time. There are other plots that are worrying the honorable gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Preference plots?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I have ascertained that one of the mills at Bombala has refused to take any more of the wheat grown in the district because it is blocked up, and we know that there are mills also at Coom and at other towns in the district. I think honorable members should ask why settlers in the Monaro district cannot grow wheat for export, the answer is because they are so far from the railway. I need not give merely my own assertions, or the figures of Coghlan. I am prepared to accept the statistics quoted by the honorable member for Gippsland. That honorable member is very careful in submitting figures in this chamber, and I am prepared to accept the figures he has quoted without entering upon an argument with the honorable member for Hume as to whether Coghlan had not some reason or other to falsify his statistical register in order to show that the productiveness of the soil was greater in the Monaro district than in other districts of New South Wales.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—What is the birth rate?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am referring to the productiveness as regards wheat and maize. I know that Bombala and the district around it can hold its own with any of the other districts of New South Wales. I can state as a fact that on the coast below Bombala, and within ten miles of the radius fixed by the Senate, land required for growing maize brought at public competition £100 per acre.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is at Bega, on the coast.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Yes, at Bega; but the honorable member for Hume contended some time ago that the Monaro district could not furnish food supplies for the Federal Capital.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not in the Monaro district.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am glad that the honorable member is finding something to which he can take exception. The honorable gentleman would not accept the statistics quoted by the honorable member for Gippsland, nor would he accept Coghlan's statistics; and I now ask him why people should give such high prices for land in the district? If the honorable gentleman asks me why they do not give similarly high prices for land in other parts of the Monaro district, the answer is that it is because there is no means of getting the products of the land to market.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Because there is no good land.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable gentleman may make that bald assertion if it pleases him, but he knows that it is because there is no means of getting the products of the land to market. The honorable gentleman must be aware that on Bibbenluke and Gunningrah there are 100,000 acres which are supposed to be suitable for close settlement, and they are only waiting for a railway to the district. He must be aware that at Nimityhelle, with an elevation of 4,000 feet, the Mount Cooper estate was recently inspected by New South Wales Government experts, who recommended the Government to purchase the estate for purposes of closer settlement.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is not fit for closer settlement.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable gentleman has seen it only when dashing through in a coach, but Government experts, after an inquiry extending over eight or nine days, have decided that it is fit for closer settlement, and have recommended that the New South Wales Government should buy it for that purpose. That is looked upon as one of the poor places in the district. Honorable members may take exception to it, because the value is fixed at £2 10s. per acre. The reason for that again is because there is no railway communication to this land. There are 60,000 acres on Bibbenluke, 40,000 acres on Gunningrah, and 30,000 or 40,000 acres on Maharatta. I can appeal to honorable members, who know as much about country as does the honorable member for Hume, and who were driven out before breakfast to look at these places, to say whether these estates are not suitable for closer settlement. The country is pooh-poohed because a high value is not put upon it, when we know that the reason is that at the present time no one can do anything with the land but graze sheep or cattle there. The honorable member for Moira has stated as one of his own experiences that he took his horses to Monaro, and they could not live on the grass there; that he had to stable-feed them. I can appeal to the honorable members for Grey and Capricornia, who drove from Cooma south for seventy miles, and returned by the same route for twenty miles, when they made a detour of fifty miles to get back to the station, to say whether in that journey they saw any country on which horses could not live. I need not say anything about the record which the Monaro district has for horses. The district is renowned for its horse-breeding establishments, and what object the honorable member for Moira could possibly have in making such an absurd statement I am at a loss to understand.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have stated hard facts.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member can have only one idea in his mind in making such a statement, and that is, to endeavour to persuade honorable members that the country around the Monaro district will not keep horses.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is too sour.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for Hume, who has pumped a lot of absurd statements into the honorable member for Moira, says that the country is too sour. I give the honorable member credit for honesty of purpose, but I can appeal against his opinion to honorable members who know as much about country as he does, and who have been through the Monaro district for over 100 miles.

Mr. POYNTON.—I know that we saw some fine fat bullocks there.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I appeal to the honorable member for Moira to say what object he could have in making such a statement as he has made.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have had to live there; the honorable gentleman has not.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I do not dispute the fact; but I must question anything said by an honorable member who will make so absurd a statement as that to which I have referred. I have no hesitation in saying that there is no honorable member who has visited the Monaro district, no matter how much he may condemn the Monaro sites, or how anxious he may be to secure the selection of a site in another district, who will give any credit to a statement of that kind.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No stock-owner on Riverina will take stock from Riverina to Monaro to thrive. That can be proved.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—All I can say is that the honorable member is welcome to prove it if he can. The honorable member for Moira is usually very careful, but he destroys our confidence in him when he makes a statement of that kind. The honorable member for Grampians knows something about country, and although he has said some unkind things of the Monaro district because he does not like it, and because he favours the Upper Murray site, he would never have asserted that horses would not live in the district.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No stock-owner on Monaro would take stock off Riverina and put them on to Monaro to thrive.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—If that be so, how is it that during the last two years, when we had a drought, nearly all the stock from the Riverina side were brought to the Monaro district? I have figures here to bear that out, if the honorable member cares to see them.

Mr. SPENCE.—I did 300 miles through the district in a fortnight with a pair of horses that were fed on grass all the time.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It is hardly worth while to answer such statements, but if honorable members will consider the statistics of stock in the Monaro district they will find that during the drought, men on Monaro made nearly the freehold prices of their land by renting it to people who brought starving stock from the Riverina country. Mr. McCaughey paid thousands of pounds in rent for Monaro country for his stock.

Mr. WATSON.—For country just above Tumut.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—On which side of the mountain were the sheep?

Mr. WATSON.—Mostly on the western side. I saw his stock there, or, at any rate, thousands of them.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That statement is like the honorable gentleman's story about the unfortunate boy whom he found asleep beside a milk-can. We all know that there is some good country on the Tumut side; but does the Prime Minister say that Mr. McCaughey's stock was not chiefly on the Monaro side?

Mr. WATSON.—I do.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am acquainted with most of the men in the Monaro district. I know the size of their runs, and in many cases the rentals which they received. I drove through Mr. McCaughey's sheep, and I say that most of them were in that district. I was not in the Tumut electorate at all. Many men on the Monaro country got nearly as much, and some of them quite as much, for taking starving stock from the plains during the eighteen months' drought, as the freehold of their land could have been purchased for prior to that period.

Mr. WATSON.—In many cases high rents were paid for land on which ordinarily people would not dare to place their sheep.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—When I tried to pin the honorable member for Moira down to his statement about horses, he began to speak of cattle and sheep; and now the Prime Minister has come to his rescue by saying that a good many of Mr. McCaughey's sheep were, during the drought, placed on the Tumut country. I do not dispute that. He had sheep all over the country.

Mr. WATSON.—He had more sheep on the Tumut side than on the Monaro side.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There were five times as many sheep on the Monaro side as on the Tumut side. It is not that the country is so much better, but that there is so much more of it.

Mr. SKENE.—At Tooma he had five sheep to the acre.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for Gwydir spoke of there being fifteen sheep to the acre, so that the honorable member for Grampians has come down ten. Perhaps if I commenced to whistle he would make a reasonable statement.

Mr. SKENE.—What I say is true; and the sheep were brought away fat.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — I have seen 100 sheep to the acre; but they were in a yard. If the honorable member can gull the honorable member for Maranoa, who has said that he will support the Monaro site, with that sort of garden stuff, his statements may do him some good; but otherwise they cannot be expected to influence any one who knows a miner's right from a homestead lease.

Mr. SKENE.—I spoke from personal experience. There were 15,000 sheep on 3,000 acres.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The Prime Minister had a brother-in-law in the Monaro district, against whom I have nothing to say, because he was a very good constituent, and voted for me every time; but the honorable gentleman has stated that he is strongly opposed to the selection of the Monaro site, because of a fearful time which his brother-in-law had in a snow-storm.

Mr. SKENE.—Is that where they have churches with chimneys?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member must be mending his ways to know anything about churches at all. The Prime Minister has made a great deal of the statement of his brother-in-law that Monaro is a very cold place.

Mr. WATSON.—At any rate, I have never mentioned it in this chamber.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member has mentioned it privately to many.

Mr. WATSON.—Incidentally, I told the honorable member about the occurrence.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—No doubt it is awkward to have these stories raked up again. I hope that the men of the Monaro district, and the men of the Moira district, will hear that the honorable member for Moira has stated that horses will not live on Monaro. Let honorable gentlemen listen to the following statement about Tumut, which appeared in a newspaper dated 3rd February:—

Earth tremors were felt here about 1 o'clock this morning, and some residents assert that they were the most distinct ever experienced. Houses were shaken violently, and apparently some portions of the town were affected more than others. The current travelled south. One distinctly audible shock, with vibrations and rumblings, lasted over a minute. It was elicited at the Observatory this afternoon that a slight shock had been felt at Adelong at 1.15 this morning. No other stations reported any disturbance.

That paragraph is, in my opinion, a legitimate answer to the story told by the brother-in-law of the Prime Minister. The honorable member for Lang also spoke about the cold. He said that he had had a very cold trip when passing through Nimitybelle one summer's night.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, and I have also had a very cold drive through Nimitybelle during a summer's night.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Those are the sort of statements which I have to combat. The Prime Minister wishes it to be inferred that it is distressingly cold in the Monaro country in the middle of summer, and those who believe such extreme statements will, of course, hesitate before going there. I regret that the honorable gentleman should thus go back to his old practices. In many respects it has improved him to have more responsibility and less liberty; but he should not, even as a joke, say that the climate of Monaro is so bad as to be distressingly cold at night in the middle of summer. Such absurd stories are an insult to the intelligence of honorable members. The honorable member for Macquarie also spoke about the cold of the Monaro district; but let him listen to the following paragraph from a newspaper dated 9th June, 1903:—

ORANGE, Monday.—There was a heavy fall of snow this morning, the ground being covered to a depth of three inches. It was much heavier at the Canobolas. Light rain has been falling all day, with a cold westerly wind. There are no indications of the weather clearing, and another snow storm to-night is probable. All holiday sports had to be postponed.

Similar reports came from Blayney, Lithgow, and other places in the district, while the Observatory records show that, on the same day, the weather in Monaro was perfect. I do not seriously contend that therefore the Monaro climate is warmer than the Orange climate. I quote the statement to show the absurdity of some of the statements made by the honorable member. The following article, however, is one to which I think the Committee generally would do well to pay attention:—

It was in some measure unfortunate that the Australian Federation was not cradled in time of war or other great national stress. The easy and comfortable conditions under which the union came to birth—the only difficulty being the petty and undignified one of soothing the squabbling jealousies of various provincialists—deprived the new nation of much that would have been valuable in forming a character. Australia began federated life too much under hot-house conditions. The evil effects of this have shown themselves on various occasions, but never so conspicuously as in the discussion as to the location of the Federal Capital. From many sides comes a clamour against a "bush capital," and plaintive arguments as to the "discomfort" and "inconvenience" to legislators if the Federal Parliament sits anywhere outside Melbourne or Sydney. In other quarters, whilst there is a grudging acquiescence to the proposal that the Legislature should move away from the flesh-pots of the great cities, there is an eager desire to veto any proposed site which has real or fancied hardships of climate or access. The time has come to remark to those gentlemen of the Federal Parliament who are desirous of staying in one of our great cities, and to those who are so querulously anxious that a site should be chosen with prompt access by Pullman car, and with a soft and complaisant climate, that the whole purpose of the Federation is not to provide comfortable hotel quarters for those who chance now to be its legislators. The Bulletin wishes to say this firmly, if a little reluctantly. This paper has never joined in that cheap and nasty adulteration of Radicalism which seeks the favour of the unthinking by belittling the representatives of the people and attacking their so-called "fat salaries" and "enormous perquisites." That is a Tory game to cripple the service of the public so that the public may be the more easily victimised. But, whilst Australia should give the best that it can to its Parliament and Ministers, concession must stop short of keeping back the development of the nation in the interests of the marble bath and the civilized cocktail of the Legislature. So soon as these things can be provided, consistently with the national interests, they should be; the legislator is worthy of his bath and his cocktail. But if the nation needs it, the Legislature should be content with a bullock-dray capital. It must be the nation's interests first and those of the nation's servants second.

It is ridiculous to hear, as one may hear, members of the Federal Parliament arguing that the Bombala site for the Capital—the only truly national site so far proposed—is impossible, because, for a while, members would have to travel some of the distance by coach, and because the climate there is sometimes cold. This is an old woman's attitude. These "dainty affettuosos" who would sacrifice a nation's interests rather than submit to a little jolting or an occasional sharp blast of wind, show themselves in a wholly contemptible light. It is their misfortune, perhaps, rather than their fault, that such paltry ideas should infect their minds. The daily papers, with their draper souls, constantly preach paltriness and cowardice in national affairs, and there has been in Australia of late no stirring deed to rouse the mind from sluggishness. Federation was born in peddling times. The very Capital site location was made matter of degraded huckstering by George Reid. Eureka and the Anti-Transportation movement are far remote from these days, and the spirit aroused by those great outbursts of national feeling has, to a great extent, faded away. Else it would be impossible for an Australian public man to balance against the arguments in favour of a truly national Federal Site his personal liability to catch a cold in his nose.

Ignoring the cold-in-the-nose issue, the conditions which a locality must satisfy to make it truly suitable for an Australian Capital may be briefly recapitulated as follows:—

The area must be the sole property of the Federation, and must be sufficiently large to secure for the Australian people all the increments in land values which the building of the Capital will give. An area of 100 square miles would be inadequate even for the building of a city; and it would leave the larger share of land value increments to the private landlords outside the area. Greater Melbourne has an area of 250 square miles, and that area by no means embraces all the land which has largely increased in value by the mere building of the city. If an area of 100 square miles, dedicated for a Federal city were an exact square, and the city were built in its exact middle, it would only be a distance of five miles from the Federal G.P.O. to some private landlord's area. If, as it is more reasonable to suppose, this exact mathematical regularity were not obtainable, it might be only half-a-mile from the Federal city to the outside area where the private landlord annexed the profits.

The area must be of such a character as to permit of a real city arising, with good agricultural lands contiguous, with room and facilities for factories and arsenals. Either an easy coal supply or water power must be available.

A bracing and sturdy climate is desirable. The Federal area should be a nursery for the Federal soldiers and sailors and public servants.

A Federal port is absolutely essential. The present humiliating tribute agreement with Britain cannot be endured for ever. In time the Commonwealth must have its own navy; it will then want its own dockyards and harbor. Further, the Federal Capital should not be surrounded on all sides by the area of any one State, and be dependent solely on that State for its means of communication.

Of the various sites under consideration there is only one that meets all these requirements—the Eden-Bombala area. In view of the necessity for economy—the Commonwealth cannot very well buy up Newcastle and the Hunter River valley—it is probably the only site available in the whole Commonwealth. And it answers to the natural needs in a fashion almost absolutely complete. An area can be secured stretching from an excellent harbor on the coast towards fine, bracing high lands, where might be bred men who could beat Maorilanders at football or steal cattle from Highlander of the 16th century. Railway communication with the great State capitals can be effected without any enormous difficulty. There is a splendid water supply—the only really genuine hall-marked, never-failing Australian river, the Snowy, passes through the land, and water fulfils every requirement, from the generation of electrical power for running factory machinery to the dilution of the politician's whisky, is available. It is fitted, by reason of its cheap water power, to be the greatest and most economical manufacturing site in Australia—water is even cheaper than coal. A harbor suitable for the naval and trade necessities of a Federal Capital is in existence. There need be no cramping of the area resumed, 5,000 square miles, of mostly Crown lands, can be obtained. On the Eden-Bombala site, in short, the Federation may found a city and a State which will serve every national purpose, and wield a great influence in breaking down those provincial jealousies which are the chief obstacles to the progress of the Union.

Then the Bulletin appeals to the Labour Party as follows:—

The Bulletin in particular appeals to the Labour Party to stand to the national and patriotic attitude on this great issue. That party has, so far, shown itself the most consistently Federal and Australian of the three organizations in the Parliament; it would be a fitting crown to its work in the first Australian Legislature if it were to stand unitedly for the national, as opposed to the provincial, or the personally selfish, view in the selection of the national capital.

These statements were published in the Bulletin of 1st October, 1903, and I think that they afford honorable members plenty of food for reflection. They indicate what we require.

MR. WILKS.—The article reads like a circus poster.

MR. KELLY.—It is absurd.

MR. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member for Wentworth and the honorable member for Dalley may think that this is a subject for joking; but I regard it as very serious. I do not suppose that the honorable member for Wentworth will be prepared to go back to his constituents and tell them that the national platform laid down by the Bulletin is an absurd one.

MR. KELLY.—Who wrote the article—some authority?

MR. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The statements I have read are contained in a leading article published in the Bulletin, and I dare say the writer is as good an authority as is the honorable member for Wentworth, with all his cocksureness and his great political experience. No matter who the writer may be, he has presented hard facts, which cannot be gainsaid. Now, I desire to deal with the claims of some of the other sites, which have been put forward. The honorable member for Macquarie does not care about the Bulletin statement, but I would ask him to follow me whilst I refer to Mr. Pridham's report. The honorable member has asserted that Mr. Wade's report, upon which he relied, was based on Mr. Pridham's figures. I have just as high an opinion of Mr. Wade as has the honorable member for Macquarie, but I took exception to his being called upon to give evidence as a special advocate of a particular site, unless we also obtained the testimony of Mr. Pridham and other officers of high standing. Now I shall refer to some of the figures contained in Mr. Pridham's report, which was presented to this House in May, 1904. The right honorable member for Swan in his report says—

None of the creeks I saw were running when I visited Lyndhurst on 5th April. The Belubla River was dry at Carcoar, the Mandurama, the Grubbenbong, and the Coombing Creeks were also all dry. It must, therefore, be clearly understood that should the Capital be established at Lyndhurst, the water supply must be obtained by conservation, and not from perennial streams. The principal water-course—the Belubla River—is not perennial, and runs through an inhabited country, including the towns of Blayney and Carcoar. It is, therefore, under existing conditions, out of the question for a pure water supply. The proposals to obtain from conservation by placing dams across four separate water-courses, viz., Coombing Creek, Flyer's Creek, Cadiangullong Creek, and Brown's Creek, sufficient water for a population of 89,000, and when the population increases beyond that number to pump water twenty-two miles from a large storage reservoir in the Lachlan River, does not seem to mark out this site, so far as water supply is concerned, as one amply favoured by nature for the Seat of Government of Australia. The enormous cost of this water supply (vide Mr. Pridham's report, herewith, marked Appendix B), namely, £2,728,030, is, in my opinion, a serious handicap to this site.

We gather from this that an outlay of nearly £3,000,000 would be involved in providing an adequate water supply at Lyndhurst, and it remains for the honorable member for Macquarie to show us that such an expenditure would be justified. The right honorable member for Swan says further—

As there is no perennial stream near Lyndhurst, there is no reasonable possibility of generating electricity to any large extent by water power. Mr. Pridham's report, herewith, Appendix B, paragraph 5, shows that no adequate power would be forthcoming from the Lachlan River; this factor may, therefore, be considered as practically non-existent.

There is the statement of Mr. Pridham, together with the cold analysis of the right honorable member for Swan, which speaks for itself. I ask why an endeavour should now be made to ram down our throats a supplementary report by Mr. Wade? Mr. Pridham is a tried and trusted official, who is supposed to be the best authority on water-power in the Commonwealth. The honorable member for Macquarie knows that there are no running streams in the Lyndhurst district, and that the statement recently made by the honorable member for Maranoa in regard to the inadequacy of the water supply there was perfectly correct. We have had glowing descriptions of the possibilities of conserving water at such places as Orange, Albury, Bathurst, and Goulburn. The New South Wales Government provided the money for carrying out some of these schemes, and yet during the dry summer of eighteen months ago the inhabitants of the town of Orange were placed upon a half supply, whilst at Bathurst they were driving tunnels, with a view to obtaining additional supplies of water.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—They have been doing that for years.

Mr. PAGE.—The water is highly mineralized.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Exactly. The honorable member for Macquarie has stated that there is copper to be found all over the district. It is for him to explain how the difficulties which now present themselves are to be overcome. To my mind it is unfair to cast an aspersion upon Mr. Pridham. He tells us that the cost of providing an adequate water supply at Lyndhurst would be over £2,000,000.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Read his full statement.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I have not his full report before me.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It does not suit the honorable member's purpose to read it.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! I would point out that standing order 280 expressly forbids interruptions, and also lays it down that every honorable member addressing the Chair has a right to make his speech in his own way.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I admit that I have infringed the rules of the House, and I am very sorry for having done so. At the same time I should like to point out that when I was speaking the honorable member did not hesitate to ask me a number of questions, which I answered in the most civil way.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Mr. Pridham gives the following details in reference to supplying Lyndhurst with water for a further population of 90,000 by pumping by steam from the Lachlan:—Estimated cost of works (one-tenth cost of dam, pipe line, pumping, machinery, &c.), £581,200; estimated annual cost of pumping 9,000,000 gallons per day, 1,600 feet, at 3d. per 1,000 gallons, 100 feet high, £65,696, which, capitalized at 4 per cent., means £1,642,400; maintenance of main, capitalized at 4 per cent., £9,250; total, £2,232,850.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That result is obtained by capitalizing the working expenses.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Exactly. Water will not run up hill a distance of 100 feet. If we selected the Lyndhurst site it would be absolutely necessary to make provision for a pumping scheme, unless we were prepared to depend upon a system of driving and tunnelling for water. The honorable member for Macquarie has cleverly endeavoured to delude honorable members. Personally, I am content to let them decide this matter for themselves. The honorable member has stated that at Lyndhurst a supply of 135,000,000 gallons per day could be utilized for purposes of irrigation. I really think that the honorable member has made a mistake.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—They are not my figures, but those of Mr. Wade.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Mr. Wade has just returned from America, where he has been reporting upon the Mississippi, and I think that the honorable member for Macquarie has mixed up the two reports. Is it not absurd for the honorable member to contend that while Orange, which contains a population of a couple of thousand, had to be put upon half supply last summer, Lyndhurst could be provided with 135,000,000 gallons per day?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Of what river is the honorable member talking?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There is no river there. In the first instance the honorable member relied upon the Macquarie River, but when all the punts there got stuck up he fell back upon the Lachlan. I look upon his statements as absurd. He cannot explain away Mr. Pridham's figures. This is not an Age story, but Mr. Pridham's story. I think that upon this matter the Committee will prefer to accept the opinions of disinterested men who have no axe to grind, rather than the assertions of the honorable member. To make statements which they could not prove, would be worth more than their reputations. That is why I was anxious that Mr. Wade should be heard at the bar of the House. There is no running stream at Lyndhurst, and there is no chance of obtaining an efficient water supply there. To attempt to make honorable members believe that water would be cheap at so much per gallon is utterly ridiculous. Any such argument must necessarily be based upon the assumption that all the water which falls during a great storm can be conserved and sold. In conclusion, I wish to say that I am content to allow the Eden-Monaro site to stand for itself. That district has held its own unaided by the daily press. With the exception of the Adelaide Advertiser, and the Launceston Telegraph, which supports the selection of a national site at Bombala, it has received no assistance from the daily newspapers. It is true that it has had the powerful support of the Sydney Bulletin.

Mr. WILKS.—In the early days it had the support of the Sydney Morning Herald.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That is so, but that organ has since withdrawn its support. No doubt the advocacy of its claims by the Bulletin has been of great assistance to it. No matter how impartial we may desire to be—no matter how careful we may be in making any statement in regard to a site which we favour—there can be no doubt that in regard to any site which is in his own electorate, or in close proximity to it, an honorable member is inclined to think what he hopes, and cannot be classed as free from prejudice. But the great majority of honorable members representing other States, and those possessing expert knowledge, are in favour of Monaro, and have supported it from the first. What is the position taken up by the Senate? That is a States' rights House, and it seems to me that it is a good thing that we have such a Chamber. When listening to the debate on this question one would be inclined to imagine that there were only two States to be considered. Tasmania is rarely mentioned, unless one of its representatives rises to protest that it should not be left out of consideration, and we hear very little about Queensland in the course of these acrimonious discussions. The whole question seems to be New South Wales versus Victoria.

Mr. FISHER.—New South Wales against New South Wales.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — Many men would imagine from the debate that there was no Golden Mile, no Coolgardie, no great State of Queensland, and no State of South Australia to be considered by us in making a selection, and, in these circumstances, it is well that we have a States House. One is prone to think that the members of another place should be more likely to be free from local prejudices than are honorable members of this House, who come into very much closer contact with those directly interested in the various sites, and the fact that the Senate has from the first supported the selection of the Monaro district should carry some weight. The great majority of honorable members representing other States also support that district, and, unlike the honorable member for Hume, the honorable member for Macquarie and myself, they cannot be accused of having an axé to grind. This should be an indication that the Monaro district has much to recommend its selection. Another point is that the majority of honorable members, who have inspected the various sites, are in favour of the Monaro district, although I have yet to learn that those who have made a personal inspection are better qualified to determine this question than are those who have not done so. An honorable member may say, "I have seen such and such a site, and I think that it should be selected," but, after all, many questions associated with the selection of a site can be dealt with only by experts. Experts must furnish us with information which they are specially qualified to give, and it is for the clever men in the House to dissect their reports, to analyze them, and to determine, on the information before them, which of the sites dealt with possesses, in the most marked degree, the main essentials for a Federal Capital. It is for this reason that I do not lay any special stress on the fact that the majority of those who have inspected the several sites suggested are in favour of the Monaro district. An important point in favour of the Monaro district is that it will be connected, sooner or later, with a main line of railway. No one would be so foolish as to suggest that the Prime Minister is in favour of the expenditure of an enormous sum in the establishment of a bush Capital. No one would accuse him of proposing to immediately spend millions on securing railway communication and an adequate water supply for the Capital; but as the city grows, various estimates of expenditure will be submitted to our consideration, and we shall gradually provide all that is necessary. Dalgety could be connected with the railway system of New South Wales at a cost not exceeding £100,000, while Bombala could be connected with it at a cost of about £200,000; for many years, little or no expenditure would be necessary in order to secure a pure water supply. Men have secured a supply that would be sufficient for all requirements from the Snowy River, by means of a miners' race, their only capital being their pluck and their faith in the ground to which they have carried it. We have the evidence of the Chief Victorian Railway Commissioner that a line will have to be constructed from Bairnsdale via Orbost for State purposes alone, and there can be no doubt that Bombala will be connected by-and-by with Eden. If the Capital be established in this district, those who travel to it oversea, via Eden, will have a chance to enter it through the Federal gateway. That is a very important factor. By means of a railway it will have its own gateway to the sea. We may pooh-pooh the suggestion at the present time that there is likely to be any trouble between the Commonwealth and the State, but any one who has given this question serious consideration must recognise that there is a possibility of friction, and that it is therefore desirable that the catchment area of our water supply should be within Federal territory, and that there should be an entrance to the Capital from two States. Monaro has its own water-shed, and its great expansibility is also a great factor in favour of its selection. In the Monaro district we have a State in itself—a territory which has never been developed, but is capable of vast improvement. If we select this district, we shall hear the school-bells tingling where to-day the sheep bells ring, and with a railway bringing a market to our door, we shall have many happy families and homes, where to-day there are but a few boundary riders' huts. That is a point which we have to consider. We must have a good climate, a reasonable water supply, and the opportunity for great development, so that as the city grows, and the people desire more room there will be ample scope for expansion. With these essentials the Capital will become the centre of a great population and the home of a great people. We should select a site that will not be on the verge of inferior country. We do not wish to select a site merely because it is a beautiful spot that can never become anything more than a glorified village. The climate of the Monaro district speaks for itself; the records of the temperature are open for inspection. It has been said that the cold is more intense in Monaro than in any other part of New South Wales; but it has a bracing climate, cold frosts, days of sunshine, and nights of brilliance unknown in foggy regions with their forbidding desolate chills. There is no damp chilly atmosphere in Monaro, and we ought to hesitate

before we pass by such a district. I would point out that many honorable members visited it not in mid-summer when everything is beautiful, but during the coldest months of the year, when they could not see Monaro at its best. That fact should be borne in mind when we are dealing with this question. Should we not ask ourselves whether the Federal Capital is not likely to develop into a great sanatorium if a suitable site be selected? Every visitor to Australia will journey to the Federal Capital to see what it is like, and if it possesses a bracing climate, and is surrounded by beautiful scenery, magnificent caves, sparkling waterfalls, and snow-capped mountain ranges—if it be a district in which to spend a pleasant holiday—it is likely to attract a large population. It is extremely probable that the Parliament will meet in the summer months, so that honorable members will practically go for a change of air to the Federal Capital. Honorable members who are in good health are likely to do much better work in a district where the climate is good and the air is bracing than in one in which the atmosphere is as humid as is that of many of the big cities of Australia. The fact that the Monaro district has so fine a climate is an argument in favour of its selection. Its scenery is magnificent. Some of the finest caves in Australia are to be found there; Kosciusko is in sight, the great Snowy River flows through the territory, and the snow-capped hills are to be seen in the distance. The allegation as to extreme weather on the Monaro may be answered in many ways. The other day I wrote asking for how many days the schools at Dalgety and Berridale had been closed on account of bad weather, because I regard that as a very good test of the climate. The reply I received shows that the school at Berridale, which is a little township near the Snowy River, between Dalgety and Cooma, had never been closed one day on this account. Dalgety is a small hamlet, to which children have to come, perhaps, five or six miles, and on wet days some no doubt are kept at home. If only two or three children attend, school may be closed; but I find that during the past fourteen years this has happened only on two occasions. Similar facts may be related of Bombala, where, some honorable members assert, the climate is worse than in other parts of the Monaro. I think honorable members are satisfied that the Commission would not, without foundation, have reported on what they term the "inexhaustible forests" of the Monaro; and there is not the slightest doubt that in the area may be found some of the finest timber in Australia. That report, coupled with the fact that there are three saw-mills at work at the present time, renders quite absurd the statement that there is no timber. No doubt there are rolling plains without timber, but so there are in Queensland and other States, and I have yet to learn that such country is avoided as worthless. We have to consider how products and merchandise can be conveyed to and from the Capital. I hope that the Federal city, especially when water power can be obtained, will become a great manufacturing centre, and, that being so, the cost of freight must be taken into account. Other things being equal, ought we to select a place like Lyndhurst, which would mean a tremendous train haulage over mountains, or a place like Tooma, which would mean railway carriage of 400 or 500 miles? Or, should we select a place within fifty or sixty miles of a good port? Water carriage, as we all know, is cheaper than railway carriage everywhere.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It would cost £1,656,263 to build a railway from Cooma to the port of Eden.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—At any rate, I simply put this suggestion forward as worthy of consideration. I am not endeavouring to ram my convictions down the throats of honorable members. I am not making bald statements; I am merely putting forward facts which may have been overlooked. By spending millions, Lyndhurst could no doubt be provided with that water on which I lay so much stress. In Western Australia, the dry, arid country around Kalgoorlie reminded me very much of Lyndhurst; and yet the right honorable member for Swan, when Premier of that State, conveyed water over a distance greater than that between the Snowy River and the site which the honorable member for Macquarie advocates. Therefore, if Lyndhurst were selected, the matter of a water supply might be an objection, though not a fatal one. A water supply can be obtained from the Snowy River by the expenditure of millions, though such an expenditure cannot, of course, create good country, and it would be very difficult to justify the cost.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Would the heights permit the flow?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I hardly think the heights would; at any rate, the expenditure of money would provide a water supply. The Eden-Monaro site would be close to our own sea-gate; and as to the statement that Twofold Bay would not make a good harbor, I should like to read the following quotations from Mr. Oliver's report, to which I have previously referred:—

Dropping the part of critic with pleasure for a more congenial rôle, I may, perhaps, be permitted to point out that, without surrendering just claims to favorable consideration in respect of features such as climate, fertility of soil, and building materials, Southern Monaro holds an exceptional, and, indeed, an unique position in respect of—

1. A Federal harbor in Twofold Bay. This means access by sea for passengers and goods from all States of the Australian Union by the Commonwealth's own port. At a cost, now calculated by the Hydrographic Officer of the Public Works Department at £150,000, for a breakwater half-a-mile in length, and two jetties to cost £30,000 each, this harbor will be as secure an anchorage as Port Jackson. In the future it will be capable of being an effective naval base.

2. Federal railways from the port of Twofold Bay to the Capital, and from the Capital to Cooma. These would be Federally owned and worked, and thus all friction with State-owned railways would be avoided.

In the same report Mr. Halligan, New South Wales Government Hydrographer, writes as follows:—

In accordance with instructions received from the principal Engineer for Harbors and Rivers, in response to a request from you that an officer should be sent to Eden to report on various matters concerning the establishment of a Federal port at Twofold Bay, I beg to report having visited Eden on the 22nd ultimo, and returned to Sydney on the 4th inst.

During this time I made a careful examination of Twofold Bay and the surrounding district, to enable me to express opinion—

- 1st. As to the necessity for improving the existing harbor accommodation;
- 2nd. The best position for a breakwater (if necessary);
- 3rd. The quality and amount of stone available for harbor works and town buildings, &c.;
- 4th. The disposition, lengths, and sizes of wharfs, docks, &c.;
- 5th. The best position of a town, having regard to drainage, water supply, &c.;
- 6th. The quality and amount of timber, clay, &c., available for buildings; and
- 7th. The best means of supplying the new town with water.

It is difficult to understand how the existing township of Eden came to be placed in its present position. Weecoon Bay, or Snug Cove, is shallow and small, and is not protected from the south-east gales, or the prevailing south and south-west winds; the access to the wharf from the town is bad, and must remain so; the majority of the houses in the town are exposed to every wind that blows, and the steepness of the ground makes the site about the worst that could be chosen for a town. The difficulty, if not the impossibility, of finding a suitable site for a railway station, is also a serious objection to the adoption of Eden as the site of a future town. A much more favorable site exists at the south-east corner of the bay, known as East Boyd. This part of Twofold Bay is sheltered from all but the north-east winds, which do not raise the same amount of sea as a southerly or south-east wind of equal strength, for reasons which it is not, perhaps, necessary to state here. My own observations go to prove that, with a light south-east swell coming into Twofold Bay, there was much less range at East Boyd than at the wharf at Eden, and the pilot and others informed me that this was the case in all weathers, except, of course, when a "black north-easter" was blowing.

On account of the sudden alteration in the trend of the coast at Gabo Island, the north-east winds which prevail on the coast of New South Wales during the summer months, are changed to S.S.E., south, and S.S.W. winds on the Victorian coast, and the small strip of coast between Gabo and Twofold Bay is a neutral zone, in which the north-east winds do not blow with the same regularity as they do further north. Still there are times when they attain considerable strength, and in order to afford protection from them, and to deflect the south-east swell, I propose to run a breakwater in the position shown by blue lines on the attached helio. Its length need not exceed 2,640 feet ($\frac{1}{2}$ mile), and at the outer end there is 9 fathoms of water. With a breakwater 15 feet wide on top, and 16 above high water, with inner slope $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 1, and outer slope $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 1, the cost would be £150,000, and it would insure protection in all weathers over an area of '8 of a square mile with a depth of over 4 fathoms. This area could be increased, if necessary, by the construction of training walls, and by dredging, as shown by blue lines on helio, to $1\frac{1}{2}$ square miles.

He goes on to show how this tremendous area might be increased. He deals with the timber supply for engineering purposes, and shows that there are great forests in the immediate vicinity. But I am dealing particularly with the bay, and with the benefits that must accrue to the Federal Capital if built in the proximity of a great harbor. Sooner or later these breakwaters must be constructed, and the harbor will be made perfectly safe. It must become a great naval base. Being situated half way between Melbourne and Sydney, it will have to be fortified at some time. Are there not great inducements for us to fix the Capital at a place like that? No doubt the construction of a railway would be costly. It might even amount to £8,000 or £10,000 a mile. But sooner or later that line will have to be built. We do not expect all these things to be done at once. It is idle to suppose that the whole of the cost of erecting the Federal Capital will be saddled upon the early years of Federation. I look at this matter from several stand-points. Naturally, as a New South Wales member, I pay great attention to it from the stand-point of the interest of that State. New South Wales is anxious to have the question settled. How can we best arrive at a settlement? The honorable member for Perth told the Committee that he intended to change his vote from Monaro to Tooma, because he knew that that would mean delay. Perhaps there will be some delay, but not much. We certainly want further information before we can think of choosing the Tooma site. The honorable member for Wentworth showed from the estimate from which he quoted that the railway to Tooma on the Victorian side alone would cost at least £500,000. On the New South Wales side there is a great distance to cover, and it is doubtful whether it is practicable to connect the site with Sydney unless we come down to Germanton and make such a wide detour as would be absurd. We have to consider what inducement the Commonwealth has to offer to New South Wales to build that railway to the border. There is a feeling that a great injustice will be done to New South Wales if Tooma is selected. There will undoubtedly be great turmoil and trouble about it. There will also be great dissatisfaction if there is protracted delay. On the other hand, we know that Lyndhurst is not likely to be accepted by the Senate, which has an equal right with this House to express its opinion with regard to the selection of the Capital. It certainly would be a very difficult matter, indeed, to induce the Senate to come round to that way of thinking. But if we select the Monaro site, there will be no delay whatever. Beautiful as the Upper Murray site may be, and eligible as it may be, its selection is likely to cause not only months, but years, of delay. It will stir up all the old provincial feeling in New South Wales. We have had full information with regard to only three districts, those of Lyndhurst, Tumut, and Monaro. Of those three only two are now in the running. Tumut is dead, so far as this House is concerned. Of the two districts which are left, and about which we have full information, the Monaro is the only one the selection of which would lead to an immediate settlement of the question. I do not wish to delay the Committee longer. I thank honorable members for having listened to me so patiently. I do not very often take up their time, and the importance of the question must be my excuse for having occupied more time than I intended. I have not tried to decry other sites. I have simply pointed to hard facts. I have been asked by the honorable member for Hume which site I intend to vote for. I presume that he has asked that question to try to put me in an awkward corner with regard to my constituents. I have no hesitation in giving an answer. I do not admire the spirit that prompts the question, but I will reply frankly and honestly. I believe that Bombala is the best site, though it will cost more money to bring the Snowy River water there than to Dalgety by gravitation. But sufficient water can be brought from the Delegate River by going higher up for the offtake. I recognise that the best land is around Bombala. I am a great believer in territory. We want a large territory. We cannot think of putting the unearned increment into the pockets of a few private land-holders. I have told the land-holders in my electorate that they will not get a pound more than they are entitled to out of the Commonwealth Government if I can help it. If we were going into this matter as a private speculator, should we not take a large area so as to secure the unearned increment? Why should we not get some recompense for the money which we have to spend? I have yet to learn that those who are in favour of the Commonwealth taking a small area have the support of the people of New South Wales. I am prepared to fight that battle in any electorate in the State. When the question is put to the people, "Are you prepared to put the unearned increment into the pockets of the land-holders or into the coffers of the Commonwealth?" there can be but one answer. Consequently I have no fear as regards the proposal put forward by the present Government. I hope that whenever the selection is made, the Government will see that the area required is sufficient to enable us to recompense ourselves, and in time to get back more than the establishment of the Capital will cost—sufficient, in fact, to provide a source of considerable income to the Commonwealth. I have said that I believe Bombala to be the better of the two sites mentioned in the Monaro district. Although I hold that the selection of the actual site is a matter which must be left to experts, I am in favour generally of taking the territory defined by the Senate, with the exception that I think there is no necessity to go right into Pambula, and the rich country where the settlements are. They might be avoided by skirting the mountain range, and then striking down to the coast. We might also go a little further west to take in the full catchment area of the snow country, which is of very little value. If that were done, we should have a reasonable area of 5,000 or 6,000 square miles, on which there is very little settlement at the present time, which is of very little value to New South Wales, and from which that State is now obtaining very little revenue. Settlers are paying a few pounds a year for areas of 20,000 acres in what is called the "snow country," which would be valuable as a part of the catchment area, if required for the Federal Capital. The real reason why there is so very little settlement in the district is the want of railway communication. I recently drove about thirty-five miles from Bombala to Bungarbay, and passed through two or three houses on big stations. They said to me that the town was quiet, and I replied that I wondered it was not dead. Until people are given an opportunity of getting access to these lands, we cannot expect to have settlement in the district.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Senate did not recommend that we should take over the whole of the area to which the honorable gentleman has referred.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—They have recommended that we should take over a great portion of it. I have carefully analyzed the votes likely to be recorded. I am satisfied that a majority of honorable members will vote for Dalgety rather than for Bombala. I think we should select the district, and leave the exact site for experts to decide; but I am prepared to bow to numbers. I am not prepared to prejudice the interests of my district because a majority of honorable members are not of my opinion. I still maintain, however, that we should take a fairly large territory, and allow experts to select the actual site of the Federal city after close investigation. That is the only way in which we can arrive at a proper conclusion. Above all things I hope that we shall now arrive at some conclusion which will settle this question. Honorable members must give and take, and agree to compromise in this matter. If they cannot get their first choice, they must fall back upon their second. I repeat that I regret that we are about to take a vote in such a way that a district favoured by only a minority of honorable members may score a win. I would again urge, if it were possible, that Mr. Speaker and two other honorable members should be appointed to look carefully into some scheme which would result in the pitting of one district against another, so that the site favoured by an absolute majority might win. Strongly as I hold that the Monaro sites are the best, I have no desire to win by any unfair tactics, or unless there is a majority of the Federal Parliament in favour of one of those sites. I say that we should gravely consider the Bill as it has come down to us from another place, embodying practically the unanimous opinion of men who come not only from New South Wales or Victoria, but also from the great State of Queensland, from Tasmania, Western Australia, and South Australia, men who have no personal interest to serve, and who cannot be biased to the extent that honorable members of this Committee may be biased in thinking what they hope. I trust that we shall now select the site of the Federal city, and select it in the best place in Australia for the purpose. I hope that in a very short period of time we shall be enabled to get there, and that we shall start, as I understand the Government propose, in a very small way, so that the Parliament House, public buildings, parks, streets, roads, and water supply will grow gradually with the requirements and necessities of the place. Let us establish the city in a good spot, I say, in Southern Monaro, and if we do I am satisfied that future generations will recognise that we have decided upon the best spot in Australia for the purpose, and one of which we can always be proud.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume).—More in explanation than anything else, I desire to say a few words bearing upon the long speech just delivered by the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, in which the honorable gentleman has scattered about a great many statements. The honorable gentleman has said that I made an attack upon the late Mr. Oliver. He told me beforehand, privately, that he intended to make those remarks, and I told him that such a statement was not true or fair, because what I said last night, in reference to the late Mr. Oliver, was but a repetition of what I said last session. All I said was that I regretted that Mr. Oliver had issued his second report, which appeared to me to be a petulant criticism upon the report of the Commission.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—De mortuis nisi bonum.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is not my intention to say anything ill, but I have no desire that what I have said should be wrongly interpreted. I also said I did not think that the late Mr. Oliver would have written the second report had he at the time enjoyed the robust health which I knew him to possess for the greater part of the time during which I was acquainted with him. The general comment at the time was that it was rather a scolding report. I thought that the late Mr. Oliver had been very unwise in writing it, and that is what I said last night. I made no attack upon that gentleman, whom I held in the highest respect. I should not have selected him to make the first investigation of the sites suggested for the Federal Capital if I had not had a very high opinion of him. In regard to the other statement made by the honorable member for Eden-Monaro that I had accused the late Mr. Oliver of having made mistakes what I said was that he had not gone to the heads of Departments to obtain the best officers to assist him. I said that he had taken certain officers who, I was told by the heads of the Departments, were not the best for the purpose, and in consequence of his not having secured the assistance of the best officers, recommendations were made to him which caused him to fall into error. I do not think that one word which I uttered can be construed into an attack upon the late Mr. Oliver, whom I knew for twenty-five years, and whom I held in the highest esteem until the day of his death. But in issuing his second report he made a mistake; I regretted it at the time. I said so last night, and I say so again now. There can be no doubt whatever that, so far as his lights went, and on the information placed before him, the first report submitted by the late Mr. Oliver was a very able document. I wish now merely to deny the accusation that I made any attack upon him, as I should not think of doing anything of the kind.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—I have one remark to make with reference to the criticism passed by the honorable member for Eden-Monaro upon my speech. The first statement was that the country in and around Dalgety was forest country. In the course of my remarks I quoted from the Commissioners' report, which, I said, confirmed my own observation—which confirmed my personal observation of twenty years ago. I will repeat the quotation which I made from the Commissioners' report in regard to the situation of the Dalgety site—

The greater part of the area consists of undulating treeless country, of similar character to much of the Monaro plains. . . . The appearance of the site, which, even on the river banks, is almost entirely destitute of timber, does not suggest the idea that parks and gardens will flourish.

With regard to the productiveness of the soil, I would again quote the Commissioners—

Some witnesses thought that the district within a radius of fifty miles of the site could produce all the foodstuffs necessary for a city of 50,000 inhabitants, but others were of opinion that a wider area would have to be drawn on, at least during the winter months, in which view we are disposed to concur.

Those passages of the report bear out the conviction which I hold as the result of personal knowledge of this granite country. The honorable member for Eden-Monaro said that my statement that horses have to be hand-fed there is absurd; but I repeat it as absolutely true in every particular. No sane stockholder in Monaro to-day would buy stock bred in the Riverina district, and attempt to keep it in the Monaro country all through the year. It is true that stock, and particularly young stock, are, in summer time, taken from the Riverina district and western New South Wales to the hill country; but no sane man in the Monaro country would buy Riverina stock to fatten there.

Mr. BROWN.—No Riverina man would leave his stock on the Monaro country all the year round.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No. I also stated that, in November, I took horses bred in Riverina to the Monaro country, and that, in order to keep them in condition, I had to hand-feed them. I believe that that would be the experience of any man taking horses from Riverina to Monaro at any time of the year, except in the middle of summer, which means practically in the months of January and February.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Where was the animal bred upon which "the man from Snowy River" rode?

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is too late to go into that question now, but I think that I am justified in showing that my statements, which have been challenged, relate what are purely hard facts.

Mr. SPENCE.—Do not the sheep get foot-rot up there?

Mr. KENNEDY.—No. So far as I am aware, there is very little foot-rot in that country.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I understand that there are still several honorable members who wish to speak, and I have also something to say upon this very important question, so that I think that the Minister of Home Affairs would do well to grant an adjournment.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I support the honorable member's request for an adjournment. I know that he is prepared with a lot of valuable information which will be of interest to honorable members, and will show that the honorable member for Eden-Monaro must have taken up the wrong report when he submitted certain figures to this Committee. The honorable member for Eden-Monaro, however, had the manliness to say for which site he will vote, whereas the honorable member for Hume seeks to induce other honorable members to vote for the southern district, and when they have done so they will find that he has simply used them to obtain support, not for the Tooma site, but for the site to which he previously owed allegiance. The Committee will also receive some information regarding some interesting speeches made by him on former occasions when this matter was under discussion. I shall not detain honorable members further than is necessary to show that the honorable member for Eden-Monaro misled the Committee by stating that the capital cost of the additional water supply at Lyndhurst would be about £2,000,000.

Mr. FISHER.—He said that if the working expenses were capitalized it would amount to that.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—He made that explanation only after his first statement was questioned. I have shown that Mr. Wade's figures are practically the same as those of Mr. Pridham. To supply 50,000 people, the Lyndhurst gravitation scheme would cost about £427,000, and the Bombala pumping scheme £617,000. The capital cost of the scheme reported on by Mr. Wade is only about £600,000, instead of £2,000,000, as the honorable member for Eden-Monaro stated. It must be remembered that the people to whom the water is supplied will pay for it, just as the inhabitants of Sydney and Melbourne pay for their water. If a man were thinking of going into a business the working expenses of which were £10,000 a year, while the return was expected to be £20,000 a year, he would not capitalize the former in order to ascertain what the speculation would cost him. I shall not detain the Committee any further, but shall leave the honorable member for Canobolas to deal with the honorable member for Eden-Monaro.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—The honorable member for Eden-Monaro, in his eloquent advocacy of the site which he favours, has passed strictures on a number of honorable members, and has referred to the few remarks which I made with regard to Twofold Bay as quite absurd and extravagant. My contention was that Twofold Bay is not a port in the sense in which the honorable member refers to it. The soundings on the chart show clearly that there is only a narrow channel through the Bay, and that an enormous expenditure would be required to make anything like a port. Three-quarters of a century ago a well-known man, named Ben Boyd, wrecked the whole of his fortune and those of many of his friends in his efforts to make Twofold Bay a rival to Sydney. All his efforts resulted in lamentable failure. When I recently paid a visit to Twofold Bay I made a sporting offer for a billiard table which had been set up by Ben Boyd in the expectation that Twofold Bay would become an important shipping centre. It can however, never be anything of the kind. The honorable member for Eden-Monaro has pinned his faith to Dalgety, and he was not called upon to go out of his way to make statements with regard to Bombala, which cannot be substantiated. It is an effort to get the credit of his opinion respecting Bombala and the credit of his vote for Dalgety.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Twofold Bay is now called "Boyd's folly."

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Exactly. It is a historic fact that Twofold Bay stands condemned as a port, and that nothing could be made of it except by the expenditure of a very much larger sum than the Commonwealth will ever be prepared to devote to such an undertaking.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby—Minister of Home Affairs).—I would direct the attention of honorable members to the fact that we have been debating the Federal Capital sites for five days, and that we have been occupied for thirty hours in the present discussion. Whilst the Government desire to give every opportunity for full and free discussion, we must bring the session to a close at some time or other, and it will be necessary to conclude the debate before our labours for the session are ended. I would, therefore, ask honorable members to assist the Government in closing the debate if possible to-morrow. If we can do this, it will not be necessary to ask honorable members to attend on Friday, and then we could take a vote without further discussion on Tuesday next. I would ask honorable members to assist the Government in keeping a House to-morrow in order to bring the discussion to an end.

Progress reported.

House adjourned at 11.16 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 4 August, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DEAKIN presented a petition from the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Australasia, praying the House to prohibit the introduction, sale, and manufacture of intoxicating liquors in British New Guinea.

Petition received and read.

Mr. CARPENTER presented a similar petition from the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Western Australia.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a similar petition from the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Queensland.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS presented a similar petition from the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Tasmania.

Petitions received.

VICTORIAN LETTER-CARRIERS.

Mr. MAUGER asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

1. Is it a fact that the letter-carriers of Victoria were paid a salary at the rate of £112 per annum for the month ending 31st of July?

2. Are they not entitled to receive a salary at the rate of £150 per annum, equivalent to £12 10s. per month—in accordance with the decision of the High Court of Australia in the action of Bond v. The King, which provided payment of a certain salary in accordance with State legislation, and which was deemed by the Court to be a right and privilege in accordance with the Constitution Act?

3. If not, what are the reasons?

Mr. WATSON.—The following replies have been furnished by the Public Service Commissioner:—

1. A number of the letter-carriers were paid at the rate named.

2 and 3. No; pending the adoption of the re-classification scheme, these officers have been paid for July at the rate of £132 per annum only, which was the maximum rate allowed under the Victorian State regulations. The balance due at the rate fixed by the new classification will be paid when the Appropriation Act has been passed.

MEDICINE CHESTS: PORT DARWIN TELEGRAPH LINE.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Are medicine chests supplied to the outlying stations on the Port Darwin telegraph line, as was the case when the line was under the control of the South Australian Government?

2. If not, why were they withdrawn?

Mr. MAHON.—The answer to the honorable member's questions is as follows:—

Yes, except at Port Darwin and Pine Creek, where medical services can be obtained.

NAVY AND ARMY RATIONS.

Mr. CROUCH asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. What amounts do the Government pay for rations daily per head in—

(a) The Navy, at Port Melbourne.

(b) The R.A.A., at Queenscliff.

(c) The R.A.A., at Melbourne.

(d) The Lady Loch steamer.

(e) The V.P.E., at Queenscliff?

2. What allowances are made to men living away from their quarters, in lieu of rations in each case?

3. Has the ration allowance of the V.P.E. been recently reduced from 1s. to 9d. daily, and, if so, why?

Mr. WATSON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. (a) 12^s 8d.

(b) 8^s 6d.

(c) 9^s 5d.

(d) The State Government, it is understood, pays 1s. 9^s 3d.

(e) 8^s 6d.

2. (a) 1s. 1d.

(b) 9d.

(c) 9d.

(d) No allowance, it is stated, is made in lieu of rations.

(e) 9d.

3. Yes, the rate for the last financial year was 1s. per diem, but for the year 1904-5, it is 9d.

In accordance with the regulations, and with the practice for years past, the rate of commuted allowance in lieu of rations is determined by the contract price of rations; and such contract price for the year 1904-5 is 8^s 6d.

BOULDER CITY LETTERS.

Mr. FRAZER asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether letters addressed to residents of Boulder City and its immediate neighbourhood (and despatched from the Eastern States for conveyance by coastal steamers) are forwarded to Kalgoorlie instead of being sent direct to Boulder, thereby causing considerable delay in the distribution of letters?

2. If so, will the practice be immediately stopped?

Mr. MAHON.—The answer to the honorable member's questions is as follows:—

The Postmaster-General is not in possession of any information respecting the matter referred to, but inquiry is being made with a view to obviate any unnecessary delay in the transmission of correspondence addressed to Boulder City.

TARIFF RE-ADJUSTMENT.

Mr. HUME COOK (Bourke).—I move—

That, in the opinion of this House, the existing Customs Tariff is unscientific in its operation and mischievous in its effects; and that, with a special view to the promotion of the agricultural and manufacturing industries and the more settled employment of all classes of workers, a re-adjustment of its incidence on some of its leading lines is highly desirable.

In submitting the motion to the consideration of honorable members, I desire, in the first place, to draw attention to the declaration which it contains as to the unscientific and mischievous character of the Australian Tariff. That declaration I propose to prove by the submission of evidence which I trust will convince the most exacting, while I shall, at the same time, point the way to corroborative facts which earnest inquirers may easily discover for themselves. But before doing so, I wish, for a moment or two, to recall some of the most noteworthy circumstances under which the first Tariff was framed. When the members of the first Federal Parliament assembled, most of us were unknown to each other. We had each been used to the particular business methods of the State from which we came, and were inclined to regard with more or less suspicion those adopted by the other States, while mutual concession was almost entirely absent. Some honorable members represented a State which had practically no Customs Tariff, others represented States whose Customs duties were said to be very low, while the Tariff of the State a constituency of which I have the honour to represent was declared to be a high Tariff. Thus we had a House composed of free-traders, revenue-tariffists, and protectionists, each and all jealous of the other, and each striving to impress upon the Tariff their particular views. The result has been what might have been expected, namely, dissatisfaction to every one concerned. We had free-traders asking for revenue only. Then there were farmers' representatives who were quite content that duties of 60, 70, or 80 per cent. should be imposed upon the products from their districts, whilst they were willing to give the manufacturers of the implements used by their constituents the benefit of only 10 or 12½ per cent. duties. We had labour representatives who advocated a White Australia policy, and objected to the introduction of contract labour, but who were at the same time quite prepared to agree to, and, indeed, helped to bring about, conditions which permitted of the introduction of the products of black labour and sweated workmen. Under these circumstances, I think I am correct in saying that the Tariff ultimately became a thing of shreds and patches, which no one was willing to father, or disposed to speak of with anything like pride. The effect of whittling away what little protection we had by the combined operations of the labour free-traders on the one side, and of the ardent free-traders on the other, who forgot, if they ever sought to keep, the compact, "revenue without destruction," has been to bring about a most unsatisfactory condition of affairs. The farmers' representatives, who thought that they would help their constituents by imposing high duties upon the products grown in their district, whilst cutting down the duties upon the implements they used, have succeeded only in injuring the home market. The advocates of a White Australia, who were opposed to the introduction of contract labour, have failed to provide work for those whose interests they sought to advance, because, as I think I shall prove, the result of their policy has been to provide additional employment for Japanese, Javanese, and other foreigners, whom we should least desire to support. The motion affirms that the Tariff is unscientific in its operation. I say that advisedly, because when the Tariff was under consideration, we did several things which, in my judgment, tended to make it unscientific. For instance, we attempted to levy duties in accordance with the ultimate use to which imports were to be put. An article which might be used as a medicine was admitted free of duty; whereas, if it could also be used as a food, one rate of duty was imposed, and, if it could be used commercially, a different rate was levied. The duties were not fixed according to the essential character of the articles, but in the manner described, and the result has been chaos. Then we imposed duties upon raw material, as well as upon finished products. If the duties had been placed upon raw materials such as could be produced here, our action might have been justified, but in many instances imposts were levied upon raw materials which had to be obtained from abroad. By also imposing duties upon the finished articles, we placed our manufacturers at a double disadvantage. In that way, also, we helped to make the Tariff unscientific. Then, again, we levied what might be termed sentimental duties; and I might mention, as an instance, the action taken in regard to spirits. Some honorable members thought that it did not matter very much whether we imported the spirits we used, or produced them locally. The industry was one in which no one took any great pride, and moreover it was pointed out that some of the persons engaged in it were making large fortunes at the expense of the consumers. We whittled away the protection that had previously been enjoyed by the distillers, with the result that their business has been most detrimentally affected. If we had reduced the consumption of intoxicants, improved the moral tone of the people, provided further employment for our own citizens, or cheapened the article to the consumer, the action taken might have been justified. But no good result has followed, whilst the industry has been practically ruined, and a number of men have been thrown out of employment, the business of making spirits for our own consumption has gone by the board, and nearly all we use are imported. As a further instance of the unscientific character of the Tariff, I would point to the very large number of decisions which have been given by various Ministers in connexion with its administration from its inception up to a few weeks ago. These decisions run into hundreds, and even thousands. In such a small matter as bags, in regard to which almost any one would think the administration would be very simple, no less than sixty decisions have been given; in respect to bicycles, eighty; and in connexion with drugs, with which I admit it would probably be a little more difficult to deal, 150 decisions. In the case of oils, nearly 200 decisions have been recorded, and so on ad infinitum. As a matter of fact, three Ministers have registered over 2,000 separate decisions in connexion with the Tariff, and I do not know that I could deduce any stronger proof of its unscientific character. Of these decisions, many are in conflict, and help to aggravate the troubles of our merchants, and the worries of the shipping clerks. We were told that the Tariff was so simple that anyone could understand it, whereas it has required the combined efforts of three Ministers to make it plain.

Mr. FULLER.—Does not that show the absurdity of the whole business?

Mr. HUME COOK.—Yes, that is what I am endeavouring to demonstrate. I have also affirmed that the Tariff is mischievous in its operation, and I propose to prove that assertion in two ways. I shall not weary honorable members with any more figures than are necessary, but I desire to direct attention to the facts connected with six or seven cases in which industries have been injuriously affected by the Tariff. One firm, engaged in making axles, which in 1899 employed sixteen men, now has only five hands in its factory. That, I admit, is a very small industry, but still the reduction has been very large comparatively. Another firm which manufactures springs for vehicles had fifty men employed in 1899, as compared with only sixteen at present. Then, again, a firm which makes machinery connected with the leather trade, had sixty men employed, as contrasted with only twenty to-day. I have already referred to the distilling business. Messrs. Joshua Brothers have published some figures which show that prior to the introduction of the Tariff they employed seventy-two hands, to whom they paid £8,000 per annum in wages; whereas to-day they can find work for only twenty-seven hands, who receive in wages £2,300 per annum. The Geelong tanners have issued a circular in which they state that in 1899 they employed 500 hands.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order; will the honorable member take his seat. It is necessary for me to again call attention to the fact that numerous conversations are proceeding in various parts of the chamber, and consequently it is difficult for the honorable member to proceed. I would ask honorable members to discontinue conversing aloud or to continue their conversations elsewhere.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I repeat that in 1899 the Geelong tanners employed some 500 men, whereas to-day they employ only sixty. They formerly paid wages at the rate of £40,000 a year; they now pay at the rate of £5,000. Similarly in 1899 the Austral Otis Company, which is referred to in the newspapers this morning, employed 600 men, whereas at present it employs only about 100. That company previously disbursed £75,000 a year in wages; it now pays only £21,000. These are a few instances which illustrate the influence which the Tariff has exercised upon certain industries, which, I admit, have been affected to a greater extent than have any others.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—How is it that in Sydney the iron industry is poorly employed notwithstanding that the duties were increased?

Mr. HUME COOK.—There are very good reasons, I presume, for that, and before I conclude my remarks I will show why industries might have been expected to do a little less business this year than they would do at other periods. I prefer, however, to put my argument in my own way. I find also that there has been a reduction in the number of hands employed and the amount of wages paid in a number of other industries. For example, in the brush and broom trade, the furniture trade, rope and twine factories, and clothing factories—indeed, in almost every industry affected by the Tariff—I learn from official figures that the number of workmen employed has decreased, with a consequent shrinkage in the amount of wages paid. As a typical instance of what may happen under the Tariff, I propose to cite some figures in connexion with the leather trade. If there is any industry which is natural to Australia, I think it is that connected with leather—the tanning trade. But what is its present position? As the result of the unscientific and mischievous Tariff at present operating, the leather business of Australia has very considerably decreased. In Victoria alone, between the years 1899 and 1903, the value of tanned leather exported has decreased by £170,956. That in itself is an enormous decrease, and largely accounts for the figures which have been put forward by the Geelong tanners, who say that, whereas they formerly employed 500 men, they now employ only 100.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS. — How can the operation of the Tariff affect exports?

Mr. HUME COOK.—The duty upon leather has been reduced, with the result that, instead of tanning the leather locally, Victoria is exporting the raw hides. A return which was presented to this House, at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corio, goes to show that whilst the tanned leather business has declined, the export of the raw material from this country has increased. For instance, in 1901, 143,961 hides were exported from Victoria, and 687,970 skins, valued at £831,931. In 1903, the number of hides exported had increased to 430,066, the number of skins to 1,123,256, and their value had increased to £1,553,322, a difference in two years of £721,391.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS. — Most of those skins were taken from starving stock.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I admit that a very large number of them had to be taken off stock, because they were starved to death, but that is no reason why the skins should not have been tanned in this country, instead of being exported to undergo that process. In connexion with the iron and steel industry, too, I learn that imports are increasing to a very large extent. Unfortunately, I have not been able to obtain the official figures for 1903, and, therefore, I cannot make the comparison which I desired to institute. Honorable members, however, are aware that the imports of iron and steel goods into Australia, represent, roughly speaking, a value of £7,000,000 annually. The value of the imports of metals and machinery—the finished articles—is increasing very rapidly, owing to the fact that firms like the Austral Otis Company, and other great engineering establishments, are not now manufacturing the goods which they formerly manufactured. But the most significant circumstance in connexion with the whole position is the rapid decrease of our population since the present Tariff came into operation. This remark applies more particularly to Victoria. Up till the time when the Tariff was imposed, it is true that Victoria had been losing population. That fact was largely due to disasters of various kinds which this State had experienced, in the shape of drought, the land boom, and the banking crisis. But, prior to the imposition of the Federal Tariff, Victoria had been steadily overcoming these disasters, with the result that, in 1899, the loss of population, which had been gradually diminishing, was less than it had been for some time previously. Immediately following the imposition of the Federal Tariff, however, the loss of population began to increase, and in 1901—according to the figures supplied by the Government Statist of this State—the emigration loss was 1,428, of which number 1,100 were adults. In 1902, that loss had increased to 13,716, including 11,864 adults. In the following year it had still further increased to 16,570, of which the adults numbered 12,885.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Do those figures relate to Victoria alone?

Mr. HUME COOK.—Yes. Between 1901 and 1903 the loss by emigration increased from 1,428 to 16,570, whilst the total loss for the two Tariff years, 1902-3 runs into 30,286 persons, of whom 24,744 were adults! The bulk of these people have gone to New Zealand and South Africa. During 1901, the immigration increase for the whole of Australia was 9,492, in 1902 it was only 2,094. In 1903 our population decreased by 6,692, of which number 6,000 were adults. Probably my statements will be met with the objection that there has been an increase of population in Australia. That is quite true, but it is accounted for by the circumstance that the births have been greater than the deaths, and also greater than the loss by emigration. To increase the population by the addition of infants only is very poor satisfaction for the loss of grown-up persons. If this kind of thing continue indefinitely, the population of Australia will consist mainly of women and babies. The males will all have gone elsewhere. I wish it to be distinctly understood, therefore, that I am dealing only with those coming to or leaving this Continent, and not with the population figures as a whole. In the case of Victoria, I have shown that the loss of population since the Tariff came into operation has become exceedingly serious, whilst in the case of Australia, during 1903, there was an actual loss of 6,000 adults. This sort of thing must be attributable to some cause. I it is not attributable to the fact that we are not now employing our own people to do our own work, I am unable to assign any reason for it. I think that under these circumstances I have fairly well succeeded in proving that the Commonwealth Tariff has been mischievous in its effects, and is unscientific in its operation. But further justification—if it were necessary—for the opening up of this question at the present time, arises from the fact that those who are proclaiming most loudly the necessity for fiscal peace, are those who are not prepared to accept it.

Mr. WILKS.—Did not the honorable member's party go to the country on the cry of fiscal peace?

Mr. HUME COOK.—When we went to the electors some eight months ago, we asked for four things. We asked for fiscal peace and preferential trade, which is not the same policy as fiscal peace alone. Then we asked for a bonus on iron and other potential Australian products, and for the continuance in existence of the then protectionist Ministry. We have not any one of those four things to-day.

Mr. WILKS.—There is another thing which the honorable member wants, and that is loyalty to his leader.

Mr. HUME COOK.—So far as fiscal peace was concerned, we were prepared to abide by it if we secured preferential trade, the effect of which would have been to help us in the line which I am now advocating. Preferential trade would not have involved a re-opening of the whole Tariff any more than giving effect to my motion would involve a general re-opening of it. My motion merely seeks a re-opening of the Tariff with regard to those lines of industry which are affected most detrimentally, and in connexion with which men are losing employment, and capitalists are being driven out of industries. As I have just said, however, those men who speak so loudly of fiscal peace are not themselves prepared to observe it, and in fact are not observing it. Those who won the battle have a right, I think, to do as they please afterwards with regard to the re-opening of the question.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Oh!

Mr. HUME COOK.—Would honorable members say that after the South African war Great Britain was to be dictated to by the Boers as to the terms of the occupation. We won the battle at the last elections, and now we propose to dictate the terms of the peace. Moreover, however much we knew about the Tariff eight months ago, we know more about it now, and whatever were the circumstances connected with finance and trade at that time, we know that the circumstances connected with them to-day warrant us in re-opening the question in the way I have suggested.

Mr. WILKS.—The Tariff was the work of the honorable member's own party.

Mr. HUME COOK.—It was not our own work. On the contrary, the symmetry of the Tariff was entirely spoilt by a certain party of which the honorable member who interjects was one. As I have said, those who now wish us to observe a fiscal truce make that request in order that they may play their own particular game. What that is may be readily gathered from a statement I now propose to quote. I have here an article from the Argus newspaper, published on the 29th June last—I am not quite sure as to the date; it can be verified—which reports an interview with the honorable member for Lang. The article proceeds as follows:—

Excellent organizing work was done by the New South Wales Free-trade Party at the last Federal elections. A concise outline of the movement was afforded in a recent chat with Mr. W. E. Johnson, a member of the Federal House of Representatives for Lang, an electorate which covers a number of Sydney suburbs. Mr. Johnson and Mr. Sydney Smith, M's.H.R., were joint organizing secretaries of the movement.

Mr. Johnson then gives a detailed account of the work of the Free-trade Party at the last Federal election; and this significant statement is added—

"We are preparing now," Mr. Johnson continued, "a new Constitution, with a view to thorough organization of the electorates and sustained effort."

We hope in this way to form a permanent fighting force, which may be used with effect when election day comes round.

If honorable members read between the lines, as I think I can do, the desire of the free-trade section of this House, and of this community, is to lull the protectionists to sleep while they themselves keep up their organization, so that at the next election they may win every seat they possibly can, and in that way get an advantage which they would not secure if the protectionists were alert. I will go further, and say, emphatically, that they are promulgating their views all over Australia, and that those who are asking for fiscal peace are asking for it for their own political ends, in order that they may organize to our disadvantage. I do not know that I need touch at any greater length on that particular head. I personally am satisfied, whatever other honorable members may be, that no matter what the free-traders in this country may say, what they propose to do is quite another thing. Under these circumstances, we also propose to do something. We propose to do that which we think will be in the best interests of the people of this country, and will do most to promote industry and to develop the natural resources of Australia. I now desire to draw the attention of honorable members to the next portion of my motion—that which has regard to the promotion of the agricultural and manufacturing industries of Australia. I know of nothing that is looked upon as being more important in this House and outside of it than the promotion of the agricultural and landed interests of Australia. But, whilst that is so, those who urge the promotion of those particular industries take divergent views. Some suggestions have been put forward as to what should be done to improve the condition of the farmers and settlers generally. In this House we have proposals for the insertion of special provisions in the mail contracts as to the carriage of frozen produce, fruit, and commodities of that kind. We have had discussions as to the necessity for providing schemes of water conservation and irrigation. We have had an exceedingly good and wise proposal for the establishment of an Agricultural Bureau. Some other suggestions, which I do not for the moment recollect, have also been put forward. Outside the House we are told that the proper thing to do is to provide cheap land, and plenty of it, together with easy terms for the acquisition of it; that there should be narrow-gauge railways to open up the back country for the benefit of those who wish to take up land; and, above all things, that there should be low railway freights and bonuses. The Argus newspaper, and other journals, are now beginning to say that the proper thing for the farmers to do is to form co-operative societies, and by means of co-operation to gain concessions from the shipping companies which they cannot obtain otherwise. The farmers are also urged to establish special agencies in London and elsewhere—mostly out of Australia—for the advantageous selling of their produce. All these things are in their way good enough; but I think that some of the essential first steps have been missed those who make these proposals, and I tend to give my views in respect to that matter at a later stage. In the meantime, I may say that those who think that land settlement is the beginning and end of all progress in Australia make a serious mistake. Land settlement is not, and cannot be, the cure-all. No country, however great which depended wholly and solely on agriculture; no country which has ever yet become a world power without developing manufactures and providing diversified occupations for its people. The rise of the German Empire may be said to date from the time when the policy was adopted of importing from Great Britain competent workmen in various lines of industry to teach the German artisans. At Japan, a little while ago, followed the example set by Germany, and imported British and American workmen with the same object in view. The rise of Japan dates from the time when she commenced to adopt western methods and ideas, not merely in regard to civilization generally but also in regard to the arts and manufactures. Primary production must, of course, play a large part in the development of a country such as Australia, but it must of every country where there are huge areas of land. But unless we also do something to promote manufactures we shall find, as, indeed, we have already begun to find, that we cannot make that material and substantial progress which we should under other circumstances. We are told that if we promote agriculture manufactures will flourish; and I only wish that that were true. We have promoted agriculture and land settlement of people in Victoria for years and years; and I have before me a table of figures which show that every year for ten years past, and for long before, the number of persons going on the land has been steadily increasing. For the period 1894-8 there were 6,985 approved applicants who took up 869,130 acres in Victoria under the residence section of the Land Act; between 1899 and 1903, 16,341 applicants took up 4,825,877 acres; in the year 1902-3 there was a still further increase. According to the census returns of the Government Statist of Victoria, it appears that in 1891 there were in that State 85,138 persons engaged in producing from the soil, and in connexion with the land interests; and in 1901 that number had creased to 95,920. It will be seen, therefore, that a great deal has been done, and, to a large extent, successfully, to promote land settlement in Victoria. Very much the same conditions apply to Australia as a whole. In the year 1899, 531,580 acres were granted in Australia, and those figures had in 1902 increased to 1,184,618.

Mr. FULLER.—What has this to do with the Tariff? The same Tariff has not hitherto prevailed all over Australia.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I am talking at present of land settlement, and, if the honorable member will allow me to proceed in my own way, I shall show how my arguments affect the Tariff. There are those who say that the only way to make Australia prosperous is to have land settlement; and I am showing that people have been encouraged to go on the land and engage in primary production. I am going to show that, in spite of those efforts, we have not helped the people of the country to the extent we might have done.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Surely the honorable member does not say that the rate of land settlement is adequate?

Mr. HUME COOK.—I would not say that, because there is no doubt that the rate of land settlement might be greater than it is. Land settlement cannot be greater than at present, but will certainly be less in future if we do nothing to provide home markets, instead of as at present compelling producers to export a large proportion of their produce, and dispose of it at the world's price.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Increased land settlement and decreased population, after thirty-five years of protection!

Mr. HUME COOK.—The argument, that increased land settlement brings in its train increased manufactures, is not substantiated. I have already proved that manufactures under the Commonwealth Tariff have decreased in spite of the fact that agricultural settlement has increased. The increase of land settlement does not require any proof, because the fact can easily be seen; but I should like now to show that manufactures, so far from having increased, have decreased. According to the Government Statist of Victoria, there were in that State 168,534 industrial workers in 1891, whereas in 1901 there were only 146,233, showing a decrease of 22,301 in the ten years. I do not contend that these figures are particularly convincing, seeing that they cover a period only part of which is affected by the present Tariff. But if we take another view, namely, that of the number of persons engaged in the factories during the operation of the present Tariff, we find that there has been a decrease, and that the Statist's figures are but an indication of what has been taking place generally. Mr. Harrison Ord, the Chief Inspector of Factories in Victoria, issued his report a few days ago, and showed that while there were 59,440 persons employed in 1902, only 57,767 were employed in 1903. The Melbourne Argus points out this morning that that is an exceedingly small decrease—only 1,673—and emphasizes the fact that Mr. Ord believes it to be the result of the drought. But the Argus writer probably forgot that in the course of the article, it is stated that the figures are eighteen months old. If that be so, I should like to know what the figures are up to date. If the figures are eighteen months old, the fact proves that the Tariff was more instantaneous in its effect than I had thought, and that the loss must be greater than we believe it to be at present. But the significant fact about the figures is one which the Argus omits to state, namely, that while there was a decrease of 1,673 in the total, there was an increase of 284 in the number of females employed. The net result shows a decrease of 2,957 male employés. Could anything be more significant?

Mr. WILKS.—That is always the result of protection.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The fact is that the iron trade and other great industries which employ males, have been so heavily hit by the Tariff that those previously engaged in them have had to emigrate to New Zealand and other places, in order to get employment, with the result that the women left behind, and other women, have had to get such employment as they could obtain. That is not a satisfactory state of affairs. Had we been able to record an increase in the number of males and a decrease in the number of females employed, the fact would have been cheered to the echo by this House. But the conditions which the figures disclose ought to make us pause and give serious consideration to the circumstances whatever they are—even if they do not arise from the Tariff—which tend to such conditions in a country like Australia. The two sets of figures which I have quoted prove that while land settlement has increased, there has been a population loss. That loss is not amongst those who have taken up land, but must be sought in other quarters. The figures of the Factory Inspector, and the individual cases I have quoted, indicate that the loss is amongst the artisan classes who ought to be engaged in factories. The figures further show that the prosperity about which we talk so much is not to be obtained by land settlement only. I think they also prove conclusively that manufacturing does not and cannot follow merely upon land settlement. We must do something more, and, in my opinion, the initial necessary step is to make a wise use of the Tariff, and create, first of all, for the land settlers of this country, a home market. Without a home market, land settlement cannot be successful, and those already on the land will probably begin to find that they must leave it. Certainly, we cannot hope for any considerable increase of land settlement unless we have an increased local consumption. In my judgment a home market is to be obtained by the creation of industries, the development of our own natural resources, and the employment of our own people rather than of Japanese, Javanese, or any other coloured races, whom we have no desire to employ. I affirm without hesitation that the quickest, safest, and most legitimate way in which to provide a good home market for our producers is to make a wise and proper use of the Tariff to that end. We have not done that. We are not getting what we require, and, in view of the facts I have given, I contend that there is a necessity to re-open the Tariff along the lines I have indicated. The advantages of a home market are realized in other countries, if not in this. I have no desire to dilate upon those advantages. Every one must admit that the better the local market the greater the advantage to our producers and to those who sell their goods. As compared with an export market, there is not the same expense in the shape of freights and insurance, there are not the same risks of loss, the same agents' charges, and the other disadvantages of an export trade, which are evident to any one who knows anything about the subject.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Can the honorable member explain how the honorable member for Melbourne Ports turns £10,000,000 into £24,000,000?

Mr. HUME COOK.—I am not good at mental arithmetic. I have said that other countries realize the advantages of a home market. The figures which I am going to quote were used some time ago by the Honorable Theodore Fink, in the Victorian State Parliament. Owing to pressure of work I have not had time to verify them; but, coming from that authority, they may be accepted as fairly correct. Mr. Fink gives for Great Britain a local consumption of £42 per head, and a foreign trade of £18 per head. For the United States he gives a local consumption of £44 per head, and a foreign trade of £5 per head. When we come to deal with the figures for Australia we find that they are absolutely reversed, and that our foreign trade is vastly greater than our home trade. Until we have profited by the good example even of such a free-trade country as is Great Britain, we shall not do what is right by our own people in this respect. America to a greater extent than Great Britain conserves her home trade, and the figures go to prove that; but even in such a country as is Great Britain, we see that care is taken that the home trade is vastly superior to the export trade, great as that undoubtedly is. If Australia does not follow on similar lines, all I can say is that we shall be amongst the decadent peoples. Unfortunately, every effort in Australia at the present time is in the direction of opening up foreign markets, and securing trade elsewhere than in the Commonwealth. All our efforts are directed towards securing a market for our produce in London, on the Continent, or some other place outside of Australia. Hence we are concerned with such matters as cheap freights, swift carriage, cool chambers, special agencies, and I do not know what besides. We have failed to look at the fact which is staring us in the face, that we produce ten times as much in Australia as we consume. I asked the Government Statist of Victoria to give me the figures for some twenty lines of food-stuffs produced in Victoria, and the local consumption of those articles. The figures came to hand last night, and they show that Victoria produces £12,000,000 worth of these food-stuffs, and that we consume in this State about £1,200,000 worth.

Mr. WILKS.—What is done with the surplus?

Mr. HUME COOK.—We are obliged to export the surplus. If we had a greater consumption locally, we should of course have greater profits for those who produce locally.

Mr. McLEAN.—Can those figures be correct? They mean a local consumption of only about £1 per head of the population.

Mr. HUME COOK.—These figures have been supplied to me by Mr. McLean, the Government Statist of Victoria. They relate to food-stuffs only, and cover some twenty different articles of food production. He states that we produce these food-stuffs to the value of £12,000,000, and that our local consumption of them amounts in value to only £1,200,000.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not think that can be correct.

Mr. HUME COOK.—If the Government Statist's figures are incorrect, then, of course, my argument based upon them is also incorrect.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Does he say the total amount of the home consumption?

Mr. HUME COOK.—He gives it as one-tenth of the local production. He is referring only to particular articles.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—What is the total consumption in Victoria?

Mr. HUME COOK.—I have not those figures. I am dealing now only with some twenty lines of food-stuff. We know, as a matter of fact, that farmers, fruit-growers, vigneron, and other agricultural producers are by no means satisfied with their returns. We know that the results of our export trade in wines, preserved fruits, and other produce of that description are not satisfactory. What do we see, for instance, in connexion with such a line as butter, which is a very great Australian export? I have here the report of the London season of 1903-4, issued by R. T. Turnbull and Co., who are amongst the greatest authorities upon this subject in the world. In the course of their report they say—

At no point in the past season can there be said to have been a really animated market, and the losses which have been made on purchases in the colonies are said to have been exceedingly great.

How can we expect to keep up a butter export if this statement by Turnbull and Co. is correct? We must encourage production in another way, and that other way, in my judgment, is the creation of a local market.

Mr. FISHER.—It would be a pity to allow an impression of that kind to go abroad, because there are great prospects in the butter trade.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Certainly there are great prospects in the butter trade, but we should encourage local consumption to a very much greater extent than we do. The average price of butter in London has ranged from 5d. to 10d. per lb., whilst in Victoria it has been from 10d. to 1s. 1d. per lb. It is all very well to send away so considerable an export of butter, but I imagine it would be better for the producers to secure the higher local prices if we could only do something to increase the local consumption. The way in which it is to be increased is not by the adoption of free-trade methods, but by some such methods as those which I have suggested. What do we find in connexion with the fruit business? Only a few days ago the Argus newspaper published this statement:—

The Australian apple season just closing in London has been by no means satisfactory from the exporters' point of view. The leading importers calculate that, during the season 703,000 cases of Australian and Tasmanian apples were imported, and that they resulted in a loss to the exporters of £50,000.

What encouragement is there for our fruit-growers, if they are to continue to lose £50,000 a year? Although last year there was a big harvest, and consequently a large export, the season was practically only a normal one. The preceding years were droughty, and the production of the soil was therefore much less than might have been expected under other conditions. Now, if in a normal year the exportation of butter, fruit, and other products results in a loss, what are the future prospects of land settlement in this country, and what is to become of the man on the soil? The figures I have given are very significant. Fruit-growers themselves are beginning to realize in certain parts of Australia the significance of these facts, and are asking that this Tariff, which some people say is such a good one, shall be altered. My authority for this statement is a paragraph published in the Sydney Morning Herald of 1st inst. It appears from this paragraph that a Conference of fruit-growers was held at Baulkham Hills, near Parramatta, on the preceding Saturday, at which representatives of the Fruit-growers' Association of Castle Hill, Kenthurst, Seven Hills, Pennington Hills, and the surrounding district were present. The Conference proceeded to the consideration of what should be done in the interests of the fruit-growers, and after deliberation they carried the following resolution:—

That, in view of the present depressed state of the fruit-growing industry, this meeting of representative fruit-growers of the State of New South Wales is of opinion that considerably higher duties should be placed on imported fruits, and that we communicate with the fruit-growers of Victoria and other States, with the view of united action being taken to secure this desired object.

They also passed this second resolution—

That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is desirable that a fruit-growers' union of New South Wales be at once organised, and that its first work be the carrying out of the object of the preceding resolution.

Therefore, the fruit-growers of New South Wales have awakened to the fact that the Tariff does not suit them. The Argus this morning says that people may be trusted to look after their own business. This is an instance in which people are looking after their own business, and are asking that the duties in the Tariff shall be increased. There is, too, now sitting at Brisbane a Conference of persons connected with the Chambers of Manufactures of the several States of Australia, and they are urging that the Tariff shall be altered. According to the report of their proceedings which appears in to-day's Argus, several resolutions were passed, but that to which I wish to call particular attention is as follows:—

That this federal council greatly regrets the injurious incidence of the Tariff in certain established industries, and recommends the chambers to immediately make investigation in their several States, taking evidence relating to anomalies and the injury done to the local industries, with a view to presenting their united deductions to the Commonwealth Parliament at the earliest opportunity available.

MR. MAUGER.—That is an Australian, not a Victorian Conference.

MR. HUME COOK.—It is a Conference representing all Australia. The Argus says that people know how to mind their own business, and that it is not my duty to teach them what they want. To that I reply that the members of this Conference are people who know their business, and that they are asking for an alteration of the Tariff on the lines suggested by me. What is true in regard to the exportation of butter and fruit is true in regard to the exportation of other products. Our producers have exported onions from Australia, and this is the result, as recorded in the Age of 29th July—

Onion-growers who, for some seasons past, have been struggling hard against a strenuously depressed local market, will not derive much consolation from the experiment just made to test the merits of the London market. . . . The proceeds of the sales will not pay half the cost of sending the consignment home.

Lastly, I ask what is the outlook for the hay-growers of Australia? In the same newspaper there is an article in which it is stated that there is about £1,000,000 worth of hay in Victoria, for which buyers at profitable prices cannot be found; and it cannot be profitably exported, because of its bulk, and the heavy freights charged for such a commodity. What, then, are the hay-growers of Australia to do, unless we provide them with a home market? The facts which I have stated show how necessary it is to build up, concurrently with the settlement of the land, local manufactures and thus increase local consumption. If we fail in that, we shall fail in our duty to our constituents, and it will be impossible for Australia to progress. If we allow the Tariff to remain as it is, emigration from the Commonwealth will increase there will be a still greater lack of employment, a steadily decreasing local market, and a still further loss to our agricultural producers. It must be borne in mind that it is more necessary to Australia to be self-dependent than it is for some of the other countries of the world to be so. She is situated so far from foreign markets that her producers are at a great disadvantage in respect of freights, insurance, and other charges connected with shipping transport, as compared with the producers of other countries. Formerly Australian producers had in some respect an advantage over producers in other parts of the world, because of the difference in seasons; but American growers are taking advantage of perfected refrigerating machinery, and are now able to place their apples on the London market at the same time as Australian apples are sent there and, apparently, in the future, the difference in seasons will be of no advantage to our growers, while American producers will make tremendous inroads into their markets. What applies to apples will apply to other exports. Unless we look keenly after our interests, we shall lose not only on the exportations to which I have alluded, but in other directions as well. Dealing with the subject from another point of view, what do we find? I have stated that there are farmers' representatives in this Chamber who were quite ready to vote for duties of 60, 70, or even 80 per cent. on farm products, and who, at the same time, under the belief that they were helping their constituents, would not consent to the imposition of higher duties than 10 or 12½ per cent. on farming implements and machinery. The result has been that a great many farmers' requirements which should be manufactured in Australia are now imported. Let me take four items. In 1899—and, in the comparisons I am about to make, I contrast the years 1899 and 1903, because the former was the last normal year under the Victorian Tariff, and the latter the last year for which we have information under the Federal Tariff—the total value of the agricultural, horticultural, and fruit-farming implements and machinery imported was £112,004; but, in 1903, the importation of such machinery had increased to £204,147. The Argus to-day makes a comparison between the importations of 1901 and 1903; but it is improper and unfair to accept the figures for 1901 in this connexion, since in that year, and in the preceding year, imports were being rushed into Australia under the belief that the Federal Parliament would pass a very high Tariff. The importation of apparel and ready-made clothing, such as farmers, fruit-growers, and others connected with the landed industries use, was £180,989 in 1899, and in 1903 £329,471. In 1899 the value of the boots and shoes imported was £33,676, and in 1903, £59,120. In 1899 the value of hats and caps imported was £50,055, and in 1903, £78,504. The importations of those four classes of goods show an increase of £395,518 for the year 1903, when compared with importations of 1899. That increase is equal to nearly 150 per cent. Reading those figures in conjunction with the figures which I have given in regard to the decline in exports, the mischievous effects of the Tariff are easily seen. Then, every farmer requires a vehicle of some sort, and I am told, on reliable authority, that the importation of vehicles for the first eight months of the present year exceeds in value and quantity the importation for the preceding eighteen months. If our farmers wish to find local buyers for their produce, they must themselves buy in the local market; but if they persist in buying in foreign markets, they must look to foreign consumers for the purchase of their produce. The man who buys in a foreign market must sell in a foreign market, and the disadvantage of that method of trading is that the man who sends his goods for sale to a foreign market has to sell them at the world's price, while what he purchases in return he buys, not at the world's price, but at the manufacturer's price.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Very often at the prices fixed by a ring.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Yes. When a cargo of wool or wheat is sent to London or Antwerp to be sold, it is necessary for us to buy foreign goods in return; but while we sell at the world's price, our producers, who wish to buy wool presses, sheep-shearing machinery, or other things in return, buy them, not at the world's price, but at the price of the local manufacturers, and are thus at a double disadvantage.

Mr. POYNTON.—How long will it be before we shall have a population sufficiently large to consume our wheat and butter?

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member would be surprised if he knew how much is already consumed locally.

Mr. HUME COOK.—If we may judge by the effect of the wise stimulation and development of natural resources and production in America, and remember the modern rate of speed, we should make even greater progress than that country has made. The briefest of glances at American progress serves to show that the adoption of methods similar to those which I think we should follow has led to the development of her manufactures and her resources to such a marvellous extent that no other country can show a similar record. The reference to America brings me to another question, namely, the proper relative proportion between the agricultural and manufacturing interests. In America we have a country much like our own. Her exports of wheat and other cereals are probably greater than those of any other country. The agricultural industry has been developed there to a greater extent than elsewhere, and her manufacturing industries have also progressed by leaps and bounds. The figures given in the Statesman's Year-Book show that 10,000,000 persons are engaged in agricultural and kindred pursuits generally, whereas those engaged in the manufacturing and mechanical operations number 7,000,000. In Australia, according to Coghlan, the persons engaged in agriculture and like industries aggregate 402,000, whilst those occupied in manufacturing and mechanical industries number 254,000. In America, the proportions of agriculture to manufacturing are as ten to seven, whilst in Australia they are as twelve to seven. So that in Australia the proportion of persons engaged in agricultural and kindred occupations is greater than in America, notwithstanding that the agricultural production of the United States is greater than that of any other part of the world. These figures show that we have added to our agricultural and cognate industries in a greater ratio than our development in manufactures would appear to warrant. Under these circumstances, I think it is clear that we should begin to encourage our manufactures and approach as closely as possible to the conditions in America, which afford a great object-lesson for the rest of the world. Among the figures relating to the manufacturing and mechanical industries of Australia, I have included, as Coghlan suggests should be done, 50,000 persons who work on their own account at mechanical or manufacturing businesses. The remedy for the disabilities under which Australia suffers at present will be found if we follow the example of America, and encourage our manufactures in the same way that we have encouraged agriculture, and other rural interests. If we fail to do this, we shall find that so far from settlement increasing, it will begin to decrease, that so far from primary products paying, they will involve loss, and that our population, instead of being added to, will still further decrease. What we most urgently require in Australia is more settled employment for all classes of workers. The way in which that result can be achieved is, not by treating Australia as if it were a huge farm, but by bringing about such conditions that we shall have a great diversity of interests, and offer wider and fuller avenues of employment. We must develop all our resources of river, forest, and field, of quarry, mine, and mill. If we neglect this, we shall fail to make the progress which every one desires to see. In spite of the fact that we have lost a large number of our population, I find that there are still thousands of persons wanting work in Australia. I wrote to the manager of the Melbourne unemployed bureau, and asked how many unemployed persons were registered on 1st July last. I was informed that there were 2,055 names on the books. I then asked for information as to the occupations of these men, whether they were labourers or mechanics. I was told that nearly all the men, whether they were mechanics or not, registered as light labourers or general labourers, the object being to obtain employment at all hazards. In spite of this fact, however, the authorities were able to furnish me with a few figures, from which it appeared that there were fifty-four boiler-makers seeking work.

Mr. MAUGER.—That number does not represent one-twentieth of those out of work.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I can quite believe that. Boiler-making is an industry that could be fostered under our Tariff. Upon the lists of the bureau there were also seventy-two assistant boiler-makers, thirty-two cabinet-makers, eighty-seven fitters, thirty-two blacksmiths, and seventy-two carpenters. It is admitted that this information is incomplete; but still it will serve to indicate that a large proportion of the unemployed come from those very classes which ought to be employed in making the articles which our producers require. In Sydney, according to Mr. Schey, the Chief Labour Commissioner there were 7,288 persons on the books of the bureau on the date previously mentioned; or, roughly speaking, three times as many as were registered in Melbourne. It is only fair to say that Mr. Schey mentions that these figures were not to be regarded as accurately indicating the state of the unemployed market. He asserts that the eligible unemployed number about 2,300. He was not able to state authoritatively that these figures were correct, because, as he explains, there are three unemployed bureaux in New South Wales. What is the business of a Labour Government above all Governments? Is it not to find work for the workers, and homes for the homeless, and to provide further, fuller and wider avenues of employment?

Mr. MAUGER.—It is the duty of every Government.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Yes; but above all Governments, those who claim to represent labour should use their best efforts to get rid of the unemployed difficulty. I therefore, appeal to those honorable members, who now occupy the Treasury benches and who claim to be labour representatives to bear in mind what I have said with regard to the unemployed, our loss of population, and the decrease in our manufacturing industries. Their duty is to represent industry, not idleness, those who are at work, and not those who are unemployed. What is the use of offering the dry crust of the Arbitration Bill to men who are unable to obtain employment? Why give them the means of settling industrial disputes when the only question for arbitration is whether A is to get work and B to leave the country or vice versa?

Mr. BROWN.—If the honorable member believes that, why is he sitting on that side of the House?

Mr. HUME COOK.—I sit on this side of the Chamber, because I have always been on the liberal side. When the Labour Party are prepared to adopt the protectionist policy I shall back them up in that, as in other things. My disagreement with the Labour Party is not so much upon questions of policy as in regard to other matters. If there is one thing that the Labour Government and the Labour Party should take in hand seriously, it is the unemployed problem.

Mr. FULLER.—I rise to call attention to the state of the House. I think that in view of the trouble which the honorable member has taken to prepare his speech, he ought to have the attention of a full House. [Quorum formed].

Mr. HUME COOK.—I am very much obliged to the honorable member for the breathing space which his action has afforded me. We are by this time used to such little tricks; they assist rather than hinder one. Some honorable member asked by way of interjection, "Why not take up the iron industry?" That is exactly what I was about to suggest.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That question is the subject of a motion which is now on the notice paper, and the honorable member cannot anticipate the debate upon it.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I am very sorry, because I desire to refer to it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member has referred to it, but he must not debate it.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I shall not debate it, but shall content myself with referring to it in general terms. In connexion with our huge deposits of iron ore, we should be able to find employment for a great number of our people. The encouragement of the iron industry was one of the principles for which we fought at the last election, and yet no practical result has been achieved up to the present. I do not know whether the figures supplied by one honorable member of the late Parliament were correct, but he said that if we developed our iron deposits we should be able to provide sustenance for 620,000 persons. If we could establish an industry that would provide for one-third of that number we should confer the greatest possible benefit upon Australia. In this matter, the present Government will have an opportunity to distinguish itself, and to earn the plaudits of the whole of the people of the Commonwealth. The Labour Party fought for a White Australia, and I helped them to secure it, because I thought that the social and economic results would be most desirable. But in order to make a White Australia effective, we must adopt not only the safeguards afforded by such legislation as we have passed, but also those which are afforded by protective duties. What has happened? We have excluded Japanese and other coloured foreigners from the Commonwealth, but we have not shut out the products of their labour. I find that in Victoria alone the imports from China and Japan and other Eastern countries have increased in value from £389,221 in 1899 to £985,594 in 1903, or an increase of over £500,000 in four years. What is the use of talking about a White Australia, and the necessity of finding employment for our own people, whilst, through our Tariff system, we are providing employment for coloured aliens outside? It would be far preferable to allow these coloured foreigners to come into our midst, because then we could regulate them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Do we not send them something in return?

Mr. HUME COOK.—Of course we do. If we take their imports, we must send them something in return. My contention is that we should produce what we require. Amongst the imports referred to I find there are £500,000 worth of sugar from Java. In spite of the bounties paid for the production of German sugar, the German manufacturers cannot obtain a footing in our markets, in competition with the products of Java. We have been providing Javanese, instead of our own people, with employment. Our White Australia policy, I claim, can be rendered thoroughly effective only by means of a Customs Tariff which will assist the local producer. I have already spoken of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. I ask honorable members to bear in mind the figures which I have submitted in regard to Australia's loss by emigration. Last year 6,000 adults left our shores in excess of the number of adult arrivals. Yet we talk of legislating in respect of conciliation and arbitration for the settlement of industrial disputes. I say that such legislation is necessary only when industries have been established in our midst. It is of no use whilst our own people are unemployed. Then, again, we speaking of non-contract labour. What is the use of legislation in respect of non-contract labour, if by the operation of the Tariff we force our own people to make contracts for labour elsewhere? The very thing which we condemn, we are forcing our own people to do. We are compelling them to go to South Africa and New Zealand to obtain work, because they cannot secure it here. These are serious matters. The fact that we have not adopted judicious and proper means to render our policy effective calls for immediate attention. In all Commonwealth contracts we insert a condition providing for the payment of a minimum wage. We insist that our own people shall obtain a fair rate of pay for the work which they perform, but we cannot insist upon the insertion of a minimum wage provision in contracts for the production of goods in other countries. We can prevent the sweating of our own employes, who are engaged in production, but we cannot prohibit sweating in other countries. Therefore, I claim that we should exclude from Australia sweated goods, as well as sweaters—that we should protect our own people through the Customs House as well as through the Factories Act. Until we do that it is useless to talk of building up a nation, developing industry, and restoring prosperity. In the German woollen mills the employes are compelled to work sixty-two hours a week for a wage of 12s., whilst in the Italian hat mills they labour sixty-four hours weekly for a wage of 20s. How is it possible for us to compete with them? In his address to his constituents during the recent election campaign, the honorable member for South Melbourne made the following significant remarks:—

Now suppose that there had been no Labour protectionist men in the Labour Party for Victoria, it is not too much to say that the protective duties in the Tariff would have been less by 10 per cent. Therefore, let protectionists see to it that they do not break entirely with the Labour Party, for the inevitable result will be that the balance of power will be in the hands of the free-trade Labour members of New South Wales, then good-bye to protection in the Commonwealth. The salvation of protection lies with the Labour Party, just as much as, I believe, the salvation of labour lies with protection.

I trust that the free-trade members of the Labour Party realize that what the honorable member says is true—that the salvation of protection and of the industries of Australia lies with the Labour Party. I think I have said enough to prove that there is great reason for the readjustment of the incidence of the Tariff upon some of its leading lines. I am bound to bear in mind that we have certain revenue obligations which must be respected. We must discharge our constitutional obligation to provide the States forming the Federation with a certain sum of money each year. Whatever we do, we must see that their solvency is assured. That obligation cannot be neglected. But it should be remembered that we have certain other patriotic obligations to discharge. One of these is to see that no destruction of our industries takes place, and that no lack of employment is caused by any overt action of ours. Another of our obligations is to provide for the further development of our resources, and for an increase in the number of persons employed in our midst. It is our duty to stimulate production, real wealth, and general advancement. These are obligations of a patriotic nature which it is quite as incumbent upon us to discharge as it is to preserve the solvency of the States by guaranteeing them the return of a certain revenue each year. We can best fulfil these obligations by making a wise, judicious, and proper use of the Tariff. We can encourage manufactures by excluding foreign products. We can foster local industry, provide home markets, increase land settlement, stimulate primary production, and find employment for our people, chiefly—almost wholly—by adopting a policy in respect of fiscal matters which will lead—as it has done in America and elsewhere—to the development of our own resources. In my judgment, prosperity depends chiefly upon population, and population depends upon employment. If no employment is to be had in Australia we cannot expect to attract people here. They must be provided with employment in factories, workshops, or mines, or else they must be settled upon the land, or must engage in business upon their own account. Without employment in one direction or the other, population cannot increase. Employment can be encouraged by the creation of home manufactures as well as by the development of land settlement. Home manufactures can be stimulated by our making proper use of the Tariff. I regret to say that we have not made proper use of it. We require to readjust its incidence. We need to take some steps which will result in the establishment of industries, which will attract population, and which above all other things will insure to the employes engaged in those industries a fair rate of wages and to the employers a fair share of profit. In my judgment sufficient evidence has already been adduced to warrant the alteration of the Tariff which I seek. More than enough facts have been submitted to justify the carrying of this motion. I believe that unless some such alteration is effected the adverse conditions upon which I have commented, and the decreases which I have noted—more particularly in respect to employment and population—will become accentuated, until in spite of all efforts to the contrary, the public of Australia will demand from whatever Government may be in power a thorough revision of the Tariff, so that that stimulus may be given to local industry which is consonant with national energy and national advance.

Debate (on motion by Mr. MAUGER) adjourned.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WATSON (Bland—Treasurer).—I move—

That the House at its rising adjourn until Tuesday next.

In submitting this motion, I merely wish to insure that the vote upon the Seat of Government Bill shall be arrived at in a full House, and I also desire to intimate that my colleague the Minister of Home Affairs proposes to continue the debate upon that measure this evening, with a view to concluding it before the House adjourns.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan).—I rise for the purpose of protesting against these continual adjournments; they have become a feature of almost every week-end. During the past four weeks we have scarcely sat upon one Friday.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes; we sat last Friday.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is the only occasion on which the House has sat upon Friday during the past month. If we had no business to transact—if honorable members attended here merely for the purposes of pleasure—there might be no objection to adopting the course that is proposed. But seeing that we have nearly the whole of the work of the session before us—that up to the present time we have done scarcely anything—there is no justification whatever for these frequent adjournments over Friday. We have already been a long time in session, and whilst these adjournments may not be inconvenient to those honorable members who can return to their homes at the week-end—

Mr. FULLER.—The Government of which the right honorable member was a Minister adopted the practice continuously.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not see much in that argument. I am not speaking of what other Governments did under other circumstances, but of what I consider is right at the present time in the interests of the country.

Mr. McDONALD.—Why did the Government with which the right honorable member was associated set us a bad example?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I wish that the honorable member would always be eager to follow examples which that Government set, as he appears to be upon the present occasion. I have not the slightest doubt that he agrees with me—perhaps, to a larger extent than does any other honorable member, although he interjects as if he held a different opinion. The honorable member has consistently opposed these adjournments, and surely he does not object to my exercising the same privilege.

Mr. McDONALD.—I do not object; but the right honorable member has now jumped my claim.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is well-known to Ministers that the Senate has been idle for several months. In that Chamber fortnightly adjournments have been common since Parliament first assembled in March last, because there is nothing to do. Surely that should constitute an additional reason why we should push on with the work of the session.

Mr. PAGE.—We have been endeavouring to push on with it, but the right honorable member would not allow us to do so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The present Government have been engaged in a sort of “go-as-you-please” during the past three months. I should like to know what single piece of useful work they have done during that period. I repeat that they have been engaged in a “go as you please.”

Mr. WATSON.—Why does not the right honorable member demonstrate that?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Prime Minister knows that he is in a minority, and he also knows that there is a no-confidence motion hanging over the head of his Government.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not. Why does not the right honorable gentleman bring it forward?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the honorable gentleman is ignorant of what is going on, he should read the press. The sword of Damocles is hanging over his head. But, notwithstanding this knowledge, he is quite prepared to allow the business of the House to be delayed so long as he and his party are permitted to retain the Treasury benches.

Mr. PAGE.—That is the whole trouble.

Mr. WATSON.—I could easily retaliate on that line of argument.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable gentleman can retaliate as much as he likes. While this no-confidence motion is hanging over the Government their policy is delay! delay! delay! I will prove that statement before I sit down.

Mr. McDONALD.—That sword is hung up by a cable!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the Government were anxious to give the Senate some business to do, and were so anxious to place the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill upon the statute-book—why did they interpose a new measure altogether, the effect of which has been to block the progress of the Arbitration Bill for weeks?

Mr. WATSON.—That is cool, seeing that the right honorable member voted for dozens of amendments in the Bill!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why did the Government interpose the Seat of Government Bill? Why did they not push on with the Arbitration Bill? What is the object? It is to gain time. The whole position, from the time the Government took office up till now, in my opinion—and I believe that I also express the views of many others on the subject—has been demoralizing to constitutional government. Honorable members opposite may laugh, but I repeat that it is absolutely demoralizing to responsible government.

Mr. WATSON.—It is demoralizing to the right honorable member, evidently.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What good or sufficient reason was there for interposing the Seat of Government Bill in the midst of the debates on the Arbitration Bill? There was no reason except to gain time. I tell honorable members opposite that that was their whole object. Was there not time, while we were discussing the Arbitration Bill in Committee and dealing with amendments, for the Government to make up their mind as to any new amendments which they intended to submit upon the recommitment of the measure? No! It appears there was not time! They wanted some weeks in order to see how the wind blew, and how they could manage to draft a clause or clauses that would have the effect of gaining one or two honorable members over to their side, thus enabling them to retain their places on the Treasury benches.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—How much time have we taken in debating the Seat of Government Bill?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable gentleman may as well let me continue my remarks. He will be able to reply to me afterwards.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Will the right honorable member promise not to interrupt me if I do?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I will, the honorable gentleman is not persona non grata. In my opinion, there was no good or sufficient reason for interposing the Seat of Government Bill in the midst of the discussion on the Arbitration Bill. It is an unusual proceeding to bring in a new question altogether, and allow it for weeks on weeks to take the place of a measure said by the Government to be of pressing importance.

Mr. McDONALD.—I rise to order. Is the right honorable member for Swan in order in discussing the Arbitration Bill on a motion that the House at its rising adjourn until Tuesday next?

The DEPUTY SPEAKER.—I think that the right honorable member is quite in order at present.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Upon my word! The honorable member for Kennedy is not in charge of the business of this House. Cannot he, as a humble follower of the Government, keep quiet?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable member is wasting a lot of time.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Hume has bound himself to the Labour Party. I do not mean that offensively. He has separated from me. I will put it in that way.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think the right honorable member separated from me.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am on the same side as my leader.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable member does not follow his convictions.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Who is the right honorable member's leader?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member for Ballarat is my leader. Is he the honorable member's leader? There should have been ample time to consider the few amendments.

which notice has been given with regard to the Arbitration Bill, between the rising of the House on Thursday and the meeting on Tuesday, without any interposing of the Capital Sites Bill, especially bearing in mind the fact that those amendments were under the review of the Government during the whole time the latter portion of the measure was discussed in Committee. I say most deliberately that, as far as my opinion goes, there was only one object in view in postponing the recommitment of the Arbitration Bill, and interposing the Seat of Government Bill, and that was to gain time, in order to try and obtain in the interval a few more votes from those honorable members who were thought to be wavering.

Mr. PAGE.—Is there anything wrong in that?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think that that is the way to carry on the business of the country.

Mr. PAGE.—The right honorable member did it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—One would think that the honorable member for Maranoa is a parrot, because he is always saying, "You did it!" Whenever anything is urged against the Government he says, "You did it!" If one uses an argument of which the honorable member does not approve, his reply is, "You did it."

Mr. PAGE.—The right honorable member told us five minutes ago that if we followed him we should be right.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not surprised at the action of the Government in this matter. We have had the honorable member for Melbourne South telling the public that his party is up for sale.

Mr. WATSON.—Who said that?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Melbourne South said it.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not think so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have seen his statement in the press, and I know that the Vice-President of the Executive Council said it openly and deliberately in the Senate in 1901.

Mr. WATSON.—It was one of his Scotch jokes!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We know that it has been said, and we know that it is a fact that the party opposite are willing, as a solid party, to give votes if they can secure legislation. There is no doubt about that. What has been the result of all this finessing and delay? The Arbitration Bill, which was said by the Government to be so urgent as to brook no delay, is almost forgotten. I do not know how many weeks have passed since it was laid aside. It will be a novelty when it comes before us again. We shall have to refresh our memories as to what has taken place. We have been thinking about Capital sites. All our energy and mental activity have been directed towards the various places suggested for the Federal city. We were told previously that the Arbitration Bill was a measure of the very utmost importance. But it has been laid aside for weeks together; and only yesterday were we given copies of the amendments to be moved by the Government, the most important of which we had already seen in the newspapers a week ago.

Mr. WATSON.—I rise to order. I wish to know whether it is in order for the right honorable member to discuss Bills—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Prime Minister cannot stop me.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not wish to stop the right honorable member. He can argue as long as he likes at the right time. But he is not going to be allowed to run this House. Is it in order for the right honorable member, in opposing a motion for the adjournment of the House, at its rising, until Tuesday, to discuss the various items upon the business-paper? If that be so, it would be possible for an honorable member on such a motion to discuss the whole business-paper of the House. I contend that he can make only incidental reference to the business-paper.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER.—The Prime Minister is quite correct. The right honorable member for Swan would not be justified in debating in detail any of the questions to which he has referred. But I understand that he is now giving reasons as to why he thinks the House should not adjourn over Friday until Tuesday. Of course, references to the work that might be done in the meantime are quite admissible.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It seems to me that my remarks do not find much favour with the Government. That is satisfactory, at any rate.

Mr. WATSON.—I shall not have a chance of replying unless I get it within five minutes.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have not very much more to say. I was not aware that the Prime Minister was going to Sydney to-night. But surely the few simple words that I am using could be replied to by another Minister. At any rate I must say what I have to say, even if the Prime Minister has to leave without getting an opportunity to reply. This party—

Mr. PAGE.—Which party?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Labour Party. That party is desirous of hanging on to their position as long as they can. I do not blame them for that. They are generally recognised as being a tenacious party. Only to-day we have had a new cry raised, and for the same purpose, viz., that of gaining time. The honorable member for Bourke has interposed with a motion the discussion of which might have been continued to-day. But no; that is not desired—delay is what is required.

Mr. FISHER.—The motion of the honorable member for Bourke is private members' business.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The situation is now getting rather serious. The sword is about to fall. So a new diversion is necessary, and the battle cry at the last general election, "fiscal peace," is attacked and repudiated.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable member must mind that the sword does not fall on his own head.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think it is more likely to fall on the honorable member's head.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I never sold myself in any way; I never offered myself for sale.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — I fear the sword will fall on the honorable member's head unless he is very careful. I do not wish to see that happen, because I have a kindly feeling for him.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is very unkind of the right honorable member to keep us from leaving when he knows that a Committee of the House has to go to Sydney to-night.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member can leave, so far as I am concerned. I did not know that any Committee was going to Sydney, and I am not going to be influenced in the slightest degree by that consideration. I have nearly finished; but I intend to conclude my remarks whether the honorable member stays or does not. In my opinion, the principal object of the Government and their supporters is to gain time, because the longer the business is delayed, the better chance they think they have of maintaining their position. I do not think that they will succeed, but there can be little doubt that what I have indicated is the one object they have in view. The question is asked over and over again why, if a vote of want of confidence is to be proposed, a motion is not submitted at once. All I know is that the right honorable member for East Sydney has been waiting for weeks for a opportunity; but the Government will not clear the decks for action. I should have thought that, instead of asking us to cease work on the days set apart for the sitting of Parliament, the Government, knowing that they are in a minority, would have felt it their duty to dispose of all intervening business, and would have welcomed a decision as to whether they had the confidence of this House or not at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. FISHER.—The right honorable gentleman apparently wants to first "spike the guns" of the Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What the Opposition want is a fair vote of the House. I have not the slightest doubt, as I say, that the Government will hold on to office as long as possible.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Just as the right honorable member did.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am glad of these interruptions, which only show that the supporters of the Government do not like honest outspoken criticism. I do not see, however, why I should be interrupted in this manner, though if the honorable members like to interrupt, and you, sir, allow them to do so—

The DEPUTY SPEAKER.—I must ask honorable members to refrain from interrupting. I understand that it is the desire that the right honorable member shall conclude his remarks as early as possible; and that cannot be accomplished if there is continual interruption. I ask that interjections shall cease entirely.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—My object in rising is to protest against repeated adjournments over the Friday, which are certainly not fair to those of us who come from distant States, and who, although they have private business to transact, are quite willing to devote a reasonable time to the duties of this House. I am sure that the other representatives from Western Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania, who cannot reach their homes as easily as can representatives from the States nearer to Victoria, will agree with me in my protest against three, and sometimes four, idle days each week. Our desire is that the work of the session shall be continued and completed as soon as possible, so that we may be able to return to our homes, instead of spending so much time fruitlessly in Melbourne. This waste of time is unheard of. I am not referring to any waste of time while the House is actually sitting, because I know that every honorable member may speak as he likes, subject to the Standing Orders. My protest is against the waste of time caused by adjournments over what should be sitting days. It would appear to be almost a rule now that the House shall adjourn from the Thursday evening to the Tuesday; but such a policy does not commend itself to representatives from distant States, who have a right to expect the business of the country to be expeditiously transacted. For the last three months the Government appear to have been doing nothing but "mark time;" they have been waiting for "something to turn up;" they have been willing to adjourn at any and every time suggested, and they have postponed the Arbitration Bill because it was dangerous to their political existence, and interposed another, which was not so much calculated to affect their position. The present management of the Parliament of the country, in my opinion, is scandalous, as well as being demoralizing to constitutional government.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume).—I was not previously aware that so wide a range of debate could be allowed on a motion for the special adjournment of the House. The right honorable member for Swan, had he made inquiry, might have learnt that the proposed adjournment is not at the instance of the Government.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Government protested against the adjournment.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—One reason for the adjournment is that the Select Committee on Electoral Administration desire to bring their investigation to a close, and purpose holding a meeting in Sydney to-morrow. But for that fact I myself should have remained in Melbourne. I believe I am correct in saying that the right honorable member for East Sydney, who is the leader of the right honorable member for Swan, came to an understanding with the Prime Minister that there should be an adjournment—it was an understanding arrived at on the suggestion of the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. WATSON.—Certainly, it was at the right honorable member's suggestion. The understanding made was that a vote on the Capital sites question should not be taken until Tuesday.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There can be very little more debate on the Seat of Government Bill, and it is rather anomalous that a lieutenant of the leader of the Opposition should, after an arrangement had been arrived at in the way I have described, attack the Government for carrying out that arrangement.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It would appear as if there were "too many captains" on the Opposition side.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I had no communication with anybody on the matter.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable member ought to have communicated with his leader.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Who is the leader of the honorable member for Hume?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think that the right honorable member has on this occasion been fair to the Government, considering that most of the talking last night was done by a lieutenant of the leader of the Opposition, assisted by the right honorable member himself. If there has been any delay during this week it must, I think, be attributed to the machinations of the right honorable member, who certainly ought not to blame the Government for taking a course which they were practically compelled to take under the peculiar circumstances.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why cannot the honorable member let the Government answer for themselves?

Mr. WATSON (Bland — Treasurer).—What has just been said by the honorable member for Hume is absolutely correct. It was found that a large number of honorable members proposed leaving Melbourne for Sydney, Adelaide, and elsewhere, quite independently of the members of the Select Committee on Electoral Administration; and, in any case, it would have been impossible to get a quorum to-morrow. But the adjournment is not at the suggestion of the Government; it has been arranged simply for the reason I have stated. The debate on the Seat of Government Bill is practically ended, and it was evident that if the House met to-morrow the vote would be taken in an exceptionally thin House; and I am sure that would not meet with the wishes of any honorable member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If it had been arranged to take the vote to-morrow, honorable members would have been here.

Mr. WATSON.—It would have been practically impossible for a large number of honorable members to be here; and, unfortunately, from my point of view, every honorable member is not so seized with the importance of selecting the Capital site as to allow it to disarrange his private business. "Demoralizing," "scandalous," and a few other emphatic terms have been applied by the right honorable member for Swan to the present state of affairs. It is most extraordinary that the right honorable member should have been content to sit in this House for three months past, while the "scandal" has been going on, and should do nothing towards challenging the position of the Government. If the right honorable member and any other members of the Opposition object to the present Government, let them come up like men, as it is their duty to their constituents to do, and table an adverse motion. What is most demoralizing in this House is not the attitude of the Government, but the continual rumbling, and muttering of threats by the right honorable member and his confreres opposite. They threaten in this fashion, but do nothing, with the result that honorable members are kept in a state of suspense, not knowing what may occur.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why did the Prime Minister interpose the Seat of Government Bill during the consideration of the Arbitration Bill?

Mr. WATSON.—It was necessary to have a little time in order to consider the Arbitration Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Government had plenty of time in which to do that.

Mr. WATSON.—Honorable members on the other side, including the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, asked the Government to consider a number of abstruse questions concerning legal interpretations; and that consideration which was necessary could not be given to the matter in a day. However, it is not the fault of the Government that the consideration of the Seat of Government Bill has lasted so long. Not one member of the Ministry has spoken during the debate, and,

I believe, only one or two Government supporters have addressed themselves to the merits of the various suggested sites.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Prime Minister must have known that the consideration of the Bill would take a long time.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The Bill is so important that a month might be well spent in its consideration.

Mr. WATSON.—That may be; but the right honorable member for Swan has no right to complain that the Government have delayed matters.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—My complaint is that a new Bill was interposed in order to gain time.

Mr. WATSON.—The Federal Capital question on the last occasion took four days to decide, and the Government were justified in expecting that no more time would be occupied on the present occasion. It is open to the right honorable member, or any one else with authority from the members of the Opposition, to take steps at the earliest possible moment to end the present position, if that position does not suit honorable members opposite. The Opposition talk of the Government being in a minority; but I deny that that is so. If, however, that is the belief of honorable members, let them take the usual Parliamentary means of demonstrating the fact.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

PAPERS.

Mr. WATSON laid upon the table the following papers:—

Amendments of Financial and Allowance regulations, and of regulations relating to Rifle Clubs, dated 23rd July, 1904.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT BILL

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 3rd August, vide page 3876):

Clause 2 (Determination of Seat of Government).

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—I am very glad that the Government have afforded the Committee an opportunity to finish the debate on this question to-night, in order that a vote may be taken on Tuesday next. I think that we must all, under the circumstances, agree with the action of the Government in connexion with the adjournment over to-morrow. I certainly agree with it. During the last Parliament I spoke at considerable length on the question of the Federal Capital site and made a comparison between the various sites submitted at the time. Having already made up my mind as to the site for which I shall vote, and believing that most honorable members have also made up their minds on the question, I do not now propose to enter at length upon a comparison of the advantages of the various localities under review. I have given every consideration to the question, and, unlike some honorable members, I have taken an opportunity to visit every one of the sites with the exception of the last, which has been suggested at, I think, a rather late hour, and from the first I took the objection to that site that, being right on the southern border of New South Wales, its selection would be outside the understanding entered into with the people of New South Wales. That I shall presently endeavour to show. I shall ask the special attention of the honorable member for Gippsland to what I propose to say about Bombala; I think that the selection of Tooma, Bombala, or any other place situated on the southern border of New South Wales, would practically create a buffer State between Victoria and New South Wales, and that that would be outside the terms of the arrangement as put before the people of New South Wales when the referendum was taken on the Commonwealth Bill in 1899.

Mr. McLEAN.—If that view is correct, should not the Constitution have provided for a limit from the border as well as a limit from Sydney?

Mr. FULLER.—Quite so; it would have been better if it had contained such a provision. But I shall ask the honorable member directly to listen to what was put before the people of New South Wales, not only by the leaders of the Federal movement and the advocates of the Commonwealth Bill, but also by those who were leading the movement in opposition, and who were known at the time as "Anti-Billites." The statement put before the people of New South Wales at that time by the leaders of both movements was that the Federal Capital should be established within a reasonable distance of Sydney, and that it should be in such a position that Sydney would be its port. I do not propose to deal with the statements made by the lesser lights who followed the leaders of both movements, but, contenting myself with the observations of the leaders, I am sure that I can satisfy the honorable member for Gippsland that my contention in this matter is substantially correct. Some honorable members are particularly touchy with respect to promises, or supposed promises, made before Federation was agreed to. I refer especially to honorable members who represent Western Australia. We have had the right honorable member for Swan, and other honorable members from that State, telling us that a promise was given to the people of Western Australia that if they agreed to come into the Federation they should have a Transcontinental Railway to connect that State with the Eastern States.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Would the honorable and learned member vote for it?

Mr. FULLER.—I shall consider that question when it is brought forward. What I ask of honorable members from Western Australia at the present time is that, if I am able to show that a promise was made by the leaders of the Federal movement in New South Wales that the Federal Capital should be established at a reasonable distance from Sydney, and in such a position that Sydney would be its port, they will give that fact careful consideration when deciding upon the site for which they will vote. It has been contended by various honorable members from New South Wales that, because that State must give the territory required, and for other reasons, the people of that State are entitled to some substantial gain. As I took a fair amount of interest in opposing the Commonwealth Bill, I am aware that a large number of people in various districts in New South Wales were largely influenced in the votes they gave in connexion with Federation by a consideration of the position in which they were given to understand the Federal Capital would be established. When it was known that as the result of the Premiers' Conference the Federal Capital was to be established in New South Wales, and they were given to understand by the leaders of the Federal movement that it would be within a reasonable distance of Sydney, that had a material influence upon the number of votes cast for the Commonwealth Bill in the referendum taken in 1899. The honorable member for Eden-Monaro, in advocating the Southern Monaro site last evening, said that we required a gateway to the sea for the Federal Capital. The gateway to the sea put before the people of New South Wales was the port of Sydney. There can be no doubt that the promise made to the people of that State was that Sydney should be the port of the Federal Capital, and the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, and other honorable members who agree with him in supporting a Southern Monaro site, and in advocating another gateway to the Federal Capital, are departing from the understanding submitted to the people of New South Wales, that Sydney was to be the port of the Federal Capital.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does the honorable and learned member think that any one has the power or the right to promise anything that was not contained in the Constitution, either in regard to a railway to Western Australia, or anything else?

Mr. FULLER.—I do not; but I say that the leaders of the Federal movement put the position before the people of New South Wales in a certain way. A distinct promise, in the terms I have stated, was made to the New South Wales people by Sir Edmund Barton, the Honorable R. E. O'Connor, the Right Honorable G. H. Reid, and others leading the Federal movement, and honorable members representing New South Wales constituencies should, at all events, stand by it. But in this Chamber we have some honorable members from New South Wales prepared to vote absolutely in opposition to the promise; we even have the honorable member for Hume ready to vote against the distinct statement which he himself made to the people of Sydney and of New South Wales, when speaking at Waverley in 1899. I propose to quote the honorable gentleman's observations on that occasion.

Mr. PAGE.—Does the honorable and learned member contend that the Committee should be bound by the promises of those individuals?

Mr. FULLER.—I do not contend that for a moment. All I say is that promises were made to the people of New South Wales by the leaders of the Federal movement, and that when those promises are submitted to honorable members in the words used by the persons who made them, they should be given fair consideration. I do not for a moment contend that honorable members of this Committee are bound by promises made by Sir Edmund Barton, by the right honorable member for East Sydney, or by any other man; but I hope that honorable members from all the States will take these matters into consideration when deciding the site for the Capital. I find that Sir Edmund Barton spoke, in support of the adoption of the Commonwealth Bill by the people of New South Wales, in the Temperance Hall, Sydney, on the 1st May, 1899. The right honorable member for East Sydney and a large number of other Federalists were present at the meeting, and, from their silence, I presume they agreed with the expressions used by Sir Edmund Barton on that occasion. The right honorable gentleman said—

I am perfectly satisfied that the Federal Capital will always be in such a place that Sydney will be the trading port.

That was the position put before the people of New South Wales by the leader of the Federal movement.

Mr. CROUCH.—That was before the right honorable member for East Sydney had agreed to the exclusion of Sydney.

Mr. FULLER.—No. The honorable and learned member will pardon me. The meeting was held about three weeks before the referendum was taken in 1899, and after the right honorable member for East Sydney had agreed, in conference with the Premiers of the other States, to the 100 miles limit from Sydney. Speaking at Marrickville, a little later, on 13th June, Sir Edmund Barton said—

Wherever the Federal Capital was placed Sydney must be the trading port of the Capital.

Those are very strong expressions from the leader of the Federal movement, and, naturally, the people of New South Wales attached very great importance to what was said by the right honorable gentleman at that occasion. I find that the present Attorney-General, Justice O'Connor, who was one of the prominent supporters of the Federal movement in New South Wales, speaking at Balmain on 15th June, 1899, in connexion with the Federal Capital, said—

The Capital being fixed in New South Wales a vast advantage must accrue to Sydney.

These quotations surely show that the leading representatives of the Federal movement fully believed, wished the people of New South Wales to believe, and induced them to believe, that when the Federal Capital was established Sydney would be its trading port, and that Sydney and New South Wales would necessarily get some advantage from the arrangement. The right honorable member for East Sydney, speaking on 16th June, 1899, at Goulburn, referred to this matter in the following words:—

I am not saying this to-night to please you. I said it in February last, when coming through Albury. They asked me if the Capital would be there, and I said that, in my opinion, it would be on the Southern line, a little below Goulburn.

Other members of the right honorable gentleman's administration, including the Postmaster-General of New South Wales at the time, and a number of prominent men and members of Parliament in New South Wales, made use of similar expressions. This all goes to show that the idea in the minds of those gentlemen, and the idea which they desired to convey to the people of New South Wales, was that the Federal Capital was to be established in such a position that Sydney would be its port, and that New South Wales, in that way, would derive some distinct advantage from the establishment of the Capital within that State. I have given quotations from the leading "Billites" in New South Wales at the time of the referendum. But it was not only the "Billites," but also the "anti-Billites" of whom the honorable member for Hume was one of the leaders, who put this view before the people of New South Wales. I point out, in passing, that the honorable member for Hume went so far as to say that in consequence of Eden-Bombala being so far south, it was entirely out of range, and could not be taken into consideration at all. We find that the honorable gentleman is now advocating the selection of Tooma, which is right on the southern border of New South Wales, and which is further south even than Dalgety. As one of the leaders of the "anti-Billite" party in New South Wales, the honorable gentleman made use of expressions in connexion with the position of the Federal Capital very similar to those made use of by advocates of the Bill. Speaking here the other night, the honorable gentleman said that we should not be building this Capital for the present, but for the future, and that we should look forward to the time when the population of Australia would be very much greater than it is at present. He contended that in fixing the site of the Federal Capital we should take that into consideration, in order that it might be established as near as possible to the centre of the population of the Commonwealth. In making these observations the honorable gentleman was advocating the selection of the Tumut district, embracing the three sites of Tumut, Batlow, and the new site at Tooma; but on 31st May, 1899, speaking in Sydney at Waverley, the honorable gentleman took a very different view as to where the centre of population was likely to be. The honorable gentleman spoke at that time, not with a view to pleasing his constituents, but as a leader of the great movement in New South Wales in opposition to the Constitution Bill. He said—

The excess of population in the Colony in future would be to the north of Sydney, and not to the south of it, and the Capital should be placed at Armidale or somewhere in that direction.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Who said that?

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member for Hume, when speaking on the Constitution Bill at Waverley in 1899.

Mr. PAGE.—The scene has changed since then.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable gentleman has found a new constituency since then.

Mr. FULLER.—The scene has changed; and the honorable gentleman is now advocating the selection of a site which is as remote from Sydney as any site in New South Wales can possibly be. He referred to the matter again on 31st May, 1899, when speaking at Sydney. The honorable gentleman was then strongly advocating the claims of Sydney as the Capital of Australia. He said—

Perhaps there might be something in the argument that Sydney should not be the Capital. Still, we had a right for the Capital to be placed within a reasonable distance of the metropolis of New South Wales.

It has been the subject of keen remark in New South Wales, and has come as a shock to the electors of that State who heard the honorable member for Hume say a few years back that if the Seat of Government could not be in Sydney it should be within reasonable distance of that metropolis, to find that he is now endeavouring to have it placed on the southern border of the State, and as far from Sydney as is possible.

Mr. KELLY. — The phrase "reasonable distance" is used in the resolution of the Premiers. They resolved that the Capital should be within reasonable distance of Sydney.

Mr. FULLER.—Quite so; but I do not wish to go over ground already traversed. The matters with which I have dealt are matters to which no other honorable member has referred. Sir Edmund Barton, Mr. Justice O'Connor, the right honorable member for East Sydney, and the honorable member for Hume, were four of the most prominent speakers for and against the Federal movement in New South Wales, and they undoubtedly led the people of that State to believe that the Seat of Government of the Commonwealth would be placed within a reasonable distance of Sydney, and that Sydney would be its port. Every elector in the mother State who took any interest in the matter was under the impression that the Federal Capital would be so placed. Therefore I ask honorable members to bear that fact in mind, and, while giving full consideration to the merits of the various proposed sites, see that the wishes of the people of New South Wales are not ignored. In my opinion, the Lake George site is the best that has yet been proposed, and when the last ballot was taken, I, with another honorable member, voted for it. That site is almost midway between the great cities of Sydney and Melbourne, and easily accessible by railway, because it is close to the main line which connects them. It also possesses an advantage which no other site has, inasmuch as it fronts a large sheet of water, while its climate is equal to that of any of the other proposed sites. The selection of that site would have carried out the representations made to the people of New South Wales, and would have fallen in with what was said on the subject by the right honorable member for Adelaide. Unfortunately, however, the Lake George site was inspected under conditions which did not give it a fair chance. We were taken to the worst part of the site—to one end of the lake which, after ten years' drought, was almost dry; and the day was a bad one, so that the place was seen under every disadvantage. Apparently the site is now out of the running, and under these circumstances the next best site is, in my opinion, Lyndhurst. Sydney would certainly be the port of the Federal Capital if Lyndhurst were chosen, and that site has all the necessary advantages of climate, accessibility, and so forth. I am, therefore, anxious that the Lyndhurst site shall be chosen, and I ask honorable members in dealing with this matter to give fair and honest consideration to the fact that a great many of the electors of New South Wales who voted for the acceptance of the Constitution were led to do so on the representations of Sir Edmund Barton, Mr. Justice O'Connor, the honorable member for Hume, and the right honorable member for East Sydney, which I have already quoted.

Mr. CARPENTER (Fremantle).—Before beginning my remarks on the Bill, I should like to answer the criticism which has been passed on the action of the Government in bringing the measure forward for discussion before the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill had been finally dealt with. That criticism appears to me very unjust, in view of the events of the last three months.

The CHAIRMAN.—The determination of the Seat of Government is the question before the Committee.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I shall allude only briefly to the matter with which I am dealing. We had a change of Government, and it taxed the energies of the Prime Minister to the utmost to meet the various objections raised against the provisions of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. His continuous application finally caused him to become unwell, and under the circumstances, he was quite justified when a stage in the consideration of the Bill in Committee had been finished, in asking honorable members to go on with the discussion of another measure, while the Government considered the amendments made in the Conciliation Bill. Although coming from a distant State, and although it is to my advantage to have the business of Parliament conducted in as short a time as possible, I have sympathy with the objection which has been raised to the action of the Government in bringing forward the Seat of Government Bill. I believe that had other legislation been introduced, their action would not have been criticised, but in this case, we do not wish to be enabled to turn quickly to our homes by overworking those who hold Ministerial office. What have to say in regard to the proposed site is not very much. I believe that no vote will be changed by the discussion of the clause. Every honorable member who has dealt with the subject has treated it differently, but most of them have viewed wholly from the stand-point of the State from which they come. I do not blame them for doing so. But I claim the right to deal with it in the same way, particularly as the State which I represent received consideration whatever in the early stages of this matter. I take exception, however, to two sets of arguments which have been used by honorable members. In the first place, I think that it would be disastrous to approach the consideration of the question from what I may call the extreme Kyabram stand-point, which was emphasized by the honorable and learned member Wannon.

Mr. TUDOR.—Kyabram is dead.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I am aware of that ; but its ghost still lives, and a few honorable members, especially representatives of Victoria, are always ready to bring it before us. I hope that parsimonious ideas will not take possession of the minds of honorable members in connexion with the building of the Federal Capital. I would rather see the matter delayed for fifty or 100 years than have a cheap and nasty place erected, in accordance with the ideas of Kyabram. We can afford to wait for our Capital, but we cannot afford to disgrace the country by building a city of tin shanties. Let us erect a city of which those who come after us will be proud. I do not blame honorable members for dealing with the subject from the local point of view. We were sent here to represent particular districts and States, and we cannot forget the fact, no matter how much we try. But, in dealing with a great national question such as this, parochial interests must be left out of view. At the present time only the fringe of this great country is populated, but I believe that in the future the whole of Australia will be settled. In my opinion, Central Australia will in future carry a very big population, and coming generations will wonder why we were so short-sighted in fixing the site of the Federal Capital as to consider only the existing population on the coast.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the honorable member think that the centre of Australia is capable of carrying a large rural population?

Mr. CARPENTER.—Certainly I do. To my mind there is no doubt about it.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—In that case the future generation must be constructed like camels, and able to go for a week without water.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I think that the experience of other places has shown that the settlement of Central Australia is more than probable. I am with those honorable members who contend that the Federal Capital should be centrally situated. But ideas on the subject appear very vague, and very much at variance with actual facts.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Port Augusta is the true centre.

Mr. CARPENTER.—If the matter is to be looked at from the Australian standpoint, the Capital should be placed as near to the western borders of New South Wales as is possible. Of course, the matter has hitherto been argued only with regard to the present location of population. It is strange that honorable members have lost sight of the fact that during the last ten or twelve years the trend of population has been altogether away from the more populous States. Not only honorable members, but also the representatives of the States at the Convention, overlooked the important fact that population was trending westwards.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—And northwards.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I shall give the figures for the Northern States. According to Coghlan, during the period from 1891 to 1902—twelve years—Victoria lost by excess of emigration over immigration 123,855 people. South Australia lost 21,142, and Tasmania 1,895—I suppose it had not any more to lose. New South Wales gained 16,155, Queensland 18,675, and Western Australia 145,165. Thus the gain of Western Australia was four times greater than that of all the other States combined. These figures show that Western Australia has been entirely overlooked. I know that it is now too late to remedy the mistake that has been made. I find that the population per square mile in New South Wales is 4.53, as contrasted with 13.78 in Victoria. When honorable members who represent the mother State are speaking of Sydney as the hub of the universe, they should remember that there is something to be said in favour of establishing the Federal Capital in a locality to the southward of Sydney, inasmuch as the population of Victoria is three times as dense as that of New South Wales.

Mr. LIDDELL.—What about the Panama Canal?

Mr. McLEAN.—What about the Encyclopædia Britannica?

Mr. CARPENTER.—It is rather early to consider the possible effects of the Panama Canal upon Australian trade. Although I admit that we cannot alter what has been done, I have always objected to the manner in which the question of the Federal Capital was dealt with at the Premiers' Conference. That was a secret meeting, and only those who were present know exactly what happened. In spite of all our inquiries, all we can ascertain is that there was a lot of haggling and bargaining. We are told that the representative of New South Wales insisted upon provision being made in the Constitution for the establishment of the Federal Capital in New South Wales. The Victorian representative said that if that were insisted upon that he would see to it that the Capital was not established anywhere near Sydney, and in spite of the protests of the right honorable member for East Sydney, the historical 100-mile limit was imposed—a stipulation at which future generations will laugh.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—The present generation is laughing at it.

Mr. CARPENTER.—It is enough to make people laugh. It would have been preferable to have the matter left for settlement by the people of Australia. I believe that if we had had a perfectly free hand we should have selected a site somewhere on the borders of New South Wales. As matters stand, however, we cannot do justice to the subject, because we have to observe hampering conditions, which prevent us from doing that which we conceive to be best. I have visited all the proposed sites, and have honestly tried, apart altogether from my predilections, and certainly free from local bias, to decide which is the best site. I shall refer only to the three sites which are regarded as having a chance of selection. I went to Lyndhurst expecting to find a much better tract of country. I was disappointed, after hearing so much in praise of that site from the representatives of New South Wales, to find a dry, dreary, barren prospect, with nothing whatever to make it attractive. The land appeared to me to be of only second or third-rate quality, and I saw no vegetation except in the form of dried grass or Scotch thistles.

Mr. D. A. THOMSON. — The Scotch thistles would be an indication of good land.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Yes; but these thistles were dead. Even the hares and rabbits there seemed to be more miserable than those to be found in other parts of the country. In the Bombala district I saw more than one site that would be suitable for a very fine city. I think that the district is to be congratulated upon having two or three eligible sites. The desirableness of having a Federal port led me, in the first instance, to give my adhesion to the Bombala district. I regard as of the highest importance the question of providing an outlet by sea, so that the Commonwealth Government shall not be confined within the borders of any one State. I am afraid that, if we tie ourselves up within the borders of New South Wales, and thus place ourselves at the mercy of that State—I use the term advisedly—as to means of ingress and egress the time may come when we shall regret our action.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member is exhibiting a fine Federal spirit.

Mr. CARPENTER.—My attitude only in keeping with the Federal spirit which has been shown in this Chamber. The representatives of New South Wales are not displaying a very good spirit towards the rest of Australia. Although they are assured by the terms of the Constitution that the Federal Capital shall be located within New South Wales, they are now claiming that they have the right to name the district in which it should be situated, and the extent of territory which shall be acquired by the Commonwealth.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Why does the honorable member object to the Seat of Government being in Melbourne, see that we are at the mercy of Victoria?

Mr. CARPENTER.—The question of meeting here for a time is entirely different from that of establishing the permanent Seat of Government of the Commonwealth. Of the sites in the Bombala district, that of Dalgety appealed to me as being the best chiefly on account of its picturesque scenery, although I appreciate it as much as most men. If we are to build the Capital in the Bombala district, it would be a pity to overlook the Dalgety site, with its fine background of mountains and the Snowy River flowing around three sides. When I went to the Tumut district, however, I was forced, much as I liked Dalgety, to award the palm to Welarega. It has all the advantages possessed by Dalgety, from the picturesque stand-point, and it possesses the further recommendation that the country is very rich. I do not think that we could find anywhere in Australia a more suitable tract of country or a better site for the Federal city. The site possesses every essential, and I am quite sure that if those honorable members who have not yet visited it could only see it they would agree with me. As regards accessibility, I would point out that a matter of 100 miles is a mere bagatelle to the average Australian traveller. The representatives of Western Australia had to travel from 2,000 to 2,500 miles in order to attend the meetings of Parliament, and yet we find honorable members who live in Sydney attaching great importance to the question of a mere fifty or 100 miles of extra travelling. When once a man has to travel, of what importance is an extra fifty or 100 miles? Are we going to sacrifice the very best site that can be found in Australia for the sake of bringing the Federal city 100 miles nearer to some particular point? Honorable members who regard the matter from that stand-point lose sight of the most essential consideration. I began by saying that I should prefer to see the establishment of the Capital delayed for fifty or 100 years rather than that we should engage in such an enterprise in any spirit of parsimony. Although I am now prepared to vote for the site I have indicated, with Dalgety as a second choice, I still hope that there will be no undue haste in arranging for the establishment of the Federal city. The people of New South Wales may, perhaps, grumble if we do not make as much haste as they think we should, but we have to consider the whole of the Commonwealth. Instead of building the city with borrowed money, we should cut our coat according to our cloth, and defray the cost of the preparatory work out of revenue. Then, by-and-by, when we have to build the city, we may possibly have to resort to some other means of raising the necessary funds. I hope, however, that for some years to come we shall not be under the necessity of borrowing money. The suggestion has been made by one or two honorable members that we ought to make haste to leave Melbourne. I confess that I am in no hurry to get away from this city. I am aware that some honorable members—myself amongst the number—occasionally chafe under what we regard as the unfair criticism of the press. But I am not going to allow that criticism to drive me to take up my abode in a desolate wilderness. I like to read my morning newspaper, as well as do most honorable members. Those who cry out most loudly against press influence would probably be the first to grumble if they woke up in the Federal Capital and lacked their morning newspaper. To my mind, it would be a calamity if Parliament were placed out of touch with the best thought which finds expression in our great cities. Upon more than one occasion I have had to fight the press, and I may yet have to repeat the experience. Nevertheless, I do not hold with the cry that we should place ourselves outside the sphere of press influence as speedily as possible. When we go to our new home we should do so because we are under an obligation to acquire a territory of our own, and not from any other reason. Of all the localities in respect of which we are asked to vote, I regard the Tumut area as the most suitable for the establishment of the Federal Capital. The Bombala district is my second choice, and, I think, that Lyndhurst is the very worst site that is available. In my judgment it would be disastrous to the best interests of the Commonwealth if that site were selected.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—Of all the questions upon which we are empowered to legislate under the Constitution, that which is now engaging our attention is one of the most important. It was embodied in our charter of Government by our eminent constitution builders, upon the understanding that as soon as this Parliament was in a position to deal with the question, it should receive careful consideration. As head of the first Commonwealth Government, Sir Edmund Barton distinctly promised in his pre-election addresses, and also in the Governor-General's speech at the opening of the Commonwealth Parliament, that it should be given early attention. Before that promise could be redeemed, however, a considerable amount of work had to be undertaken, in order to place honorable members in possession of information which was essential to enable them to arrive at a just decision regarding the particular site which should be selected. Consequently, no attempt was made to deal with the matter, until towards the close of the first Parliament. Even then the information which was supplied to honorable members was very incomplete. As a matter of fact, official reports relating to various sites were still being received whilst the Seat of Government Bill was under consideration. Moreover, the time which was then at the disposal of honorable members was very limited. Those who took part in the discussion of that Bill were urged to compress their addresses within the narrowest possible limits. They were assured by Ministers that anything in the nature of an exhaustive debate of the measure must inevitably lead to the question being shelved. As we are all aware, the attempt to determine a site upon that occasion proved fruitless, owing to a difference between the choice of this House and that of the other Chamber. Since then we have had the advantage of being furnished with additional information concerning the different sites, and upon the present occasion we are not pressed for time as we were previously. I am bound to admit that during the present discussion some very excellent speeches have been made. In accordance with the decision of the House, we are now invited to select the Federal Territory rather than a site for the Federal Capital. The choice of a site is being made the peg upon which to hang the debate in respect of the territory. The most eligible areas have been narrowed down to three—namely, the Western, Southern, and South Eastern Districts. With the exception of what is contained in the report which was compiled at the instance of the Government of New South Wales by the late Mr. Oliver, honorable members have little or no information relating to the question of territory. That was one of the points upon which I joined issue with the Barton and Deakin Governments in dealing with this matter. When the Capital Sites Commission was appointed, I understood that the scope of its inquiry would extend, not only to the sites submitted, but to the suitability of the territory surrounding them. I was under the impression that the information to be supplied by them would be as complete as possible. Under instructions issued by the Government of the day, however, that Commission limited its investigation practically to a site of 4,000 acres. Outside of that area it sought information only as regards the possibility of supplying the population of the future Capital with water. We are, therefore, called upon to deal with the question of the Federal Territory, lacking a considerable amount of information which would be of immense value to us in enabling us to arrive at a just determination. Of course I recognise that the present Government is not responsible for that absence of information. It was obliged to take up this question at the point at which it had been left by its predecessors. To me it seems extraordinary that the members of the late Government, who were responsible for the investigation of the Capital Sites Commission being conducted in the way that it was, should now turn a complete somersault, and be consumed with a desire to select territory in the first place, and to make the choice of a site a matter for subsequent consideration. How they have come to arrive at this position I fail to understand.

Mr. Brown.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—We shall have to decide the site also.

Mr. BROWN.—As I am reminded the honorable member for North Sydney we shall also be invited to decide the site. But we are, first of all, invited to deal with the territory, and we are asked to select that territory on information that relates to sites only. I contend that we should be placed in possession of further information, for the purpose of selecting the territory. The question of the site should be for after consideration. Before dealing with the territories, or sites within the territories, I should like to say a word upon the constitutional aspect of the question, particularly as it relates to the interests of New South Wales. It is a matter upon which, even in this House, there is a considerable difference of opinion. Some honorable members hold that as the Constitution provides that the site must be within the territory of New South Wales, no obligation is imposed upon Parliament beyond placing the site within the State. They urge that the particular position of the State in which the site is located is of no importance. In fact, several honorable members have expressed the opinion that in the interests of the Commonwealth the site should not be within the territory of New South Wales, as we understand it, but upon the border, so that New South Wales territory will actually be taken for site purposes, whilst the people living within it will have access to another State entirely independent of New South Wales. The question of how this position has arrived at is very interesting. The Constitution itself provides, in section 125, that the Seat of Government shall be in the State of New South Wales, and shall be distant not less than 100 miles from Sydney; and it goes on to say that the Parliament shall sit in Melbourne until it meets at the Seat of Government. In order to understand the position more roughly, honorable members must call their minds back to the discussion which took place in connexion with the framing of the Constitution, particularly in the stages that led to its adoption by the peoples of the different States. The principle which animated the Convention was not merely that of devising a perfect instrument of Government theoretically, but making it workable practically, but there was also introduced the question of what concessions the different States should make for themselves, or what disadvantages ey would suffer under this new form of Government, as compared with the State form of Government that had previously existed; what were the powers which they surrendered, and what effect those powers had upon their industrial life; and to what extent they could make terms with their fellow States, which would compensate them for losses, fancied or otherwise, in other respects. I think it can be fairly claimed that New South Wales, through her representatives — particularly through her Federal leader, Sir Edmund Barton — raised this question from the wider standpoint of the interests of the whole Commonwealth. The people of that State were not disposed to subordinate principles which they considered essential to the proper working of the Constitution, to mere questions of particular advantage to their own State. But when terms of this character were being forced upon their consideration by the other States, and special conditions were being secured by them, it became necessary — in order to secure the co-operation of the people of that State, without which the Constitution could not be adopted and Federation consummated — for the members of the Convention representing New South Wales to show their people that in making these concessions to the other States, they were not giving away the whole of the interests of their own State. One natural condition was that the Senate should represent the States as States, one State being one electorate for that particular purpose, so that senators should not represent sections of the people, but the whole State. Queensland had special interests at stake. There was a divergence of conditions and interests as between Southern Queensland, Central Queensland, and Northern Queensland. Apparently her representatives, who were engaged in framing the Constitution, desired that these interests should be specially considered. The Constitution builders had to depart from their ideal to this extent — that Queensland received the right, if she chose, not to elect her senators for the whole State as one electorate, but to divide her State into three sections for that purpose. That was one concession which Queensland received. I do not say that it was an improper one, but it was a departure from the ideal of the framers of the Constitution for the purpose of meeting State needs. Then again Tasmania recognised that in so far as her revenue was so largely derived from Customs and Excise, in handing over those methods of taxation to Federal control she was depriving her Government of a source of revenue that was essential in the conduct of her administration.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! Are the honorable member's remarks to be connected with the question of the Capital sites?

Mr. BROWN.—Yes; I am showing that because of those concessions that were made to other States New South Wales was justified in asking for a concession with respect to the Capital. Tasmania obtained the insertion in the Constitution of the section which became known afterwards as the Braddon section. Then, again, South Australia wished to have the rivers—particularly those running through Queensland, Victoria, and New South Wales, and meeting in her territory, per medium of the Murray—to be preserved for navigation purposes. That question affected such vital interests in more than one State with regard to the development of territories by means of irrigation that it led to almost a dead-lock in the Convention. It seemed likely at one time that if South Australia insisted upon her own interests in this respect, the Convention would come to naught.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—South Australia neither asked for nor received any concession whatever from the Convention.

Mr. BROWN.—This matter was fought out by her representatives so strongly, and was resisted to such an extent by the New South Wales representatives, that on more than one occasion those representatives were prepared to pack up their carpet bags and leave before any result was arrived at. However, despite the strong protests of the representatives of New South Wales, and to a lesser degree of those of Victoria, a condition was inserted that secured special consideration for the interests of South Australia.

The CHAIRMAN.—I must draw the attention of the honorable member to the fact that he is not really discussing the matter which is now under the purview of the Committee. He is going into the question of the right of New South Wales to have the Capital site within her territory. That is not under consideration at all. What we now have to discuss is the suitability of the various areas which have been submitted for the consideration of the Committee. I ask the honorable member to confine himself to that question.

Mr. BROWN. — But, sir, during the course of the debate the constitutional side of the question has been raised, and the New South Wales representatives have been charged with being provincial, and so forth, in asking that the terms of the Constitution should be adhered to.

The CHAIRMAN. — The honorable member was really discussing the action, not of this Parliament, but of the Convention, and that is going outside the question before the Chair. We are not now debating the action of the Convention.

Mr. BROWN.—I am not discussing the action of the Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. — The honorable member is discussing the reason why certain concessions were made by the Convention at the instance of the representatives of certain States. The remarks which the honorable member says have been made by other honorable members in regard to the action of the New South Wales members were merely incidental, and were not pursued at considerable length.

Mr. BROWN.—I have practically concluded my references to this point. I do not wish to transgress the rules, and am prepared to bow to your decision.

The CHAIRMAN.—I think the honorable member will find that the subject is quite wide enough as it is.

Mr. BROWN.—I am aware that it is a fairly wide question, but, as these points had been dealt with, I was simply showing what were the concessions made to the different States. The concession made to Western Australia was, of course, the provision with regard to Customs duties, and the understanding as to the Transcontinental Railway. If I am in order, I wish to deal with the questions which have been put to the Committee—that the Capital site must be in such a position that, whilst the territory is within New South Wales, there must be egress to a State independent of New South Wales, either by reason of the site abutting upon the territory of the other State or by reason of the fact that the territory will embrace a Federal harbor. Those questions have been raised at considerable length, and I wish to reply to the remarks which have been made concerning them.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member will be quite in order in doing so.

Mr. BROWN.—In the first place, when the matter was being dealt with in our State Parliament, Mr. Reid, as Premier, asked permission to negotiate with the Premier of the other States. I was one of the members of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales who voted against the proposal to remit this question of the Federal Capital Site to the State Premiers, and therefore, I cannot be charged with having any prejudice. In my opinion, there are other issues so important that they ought not to be overshadowed by any consideration of this particular State concession. Pleading for the interests of the State which I represent, I only urge that special concessions granted under the Constitution shall be carried out, not only in letter, but in spirit. Victoria, for instance, insists not only that the Federal Parliament shall meet in Melbourne, but that all functions of the Executive Government shall be discharged in that city. And Victoria is quite within her rights in so insisting.

Mr. CROUCH.—How has Victoria insisted?

Mr. BROWN.—Shortly after the Federal Parliament met in Melbourne, the Prime Minister, Sir Edmund Barton, paid a visit to Sydney on Commonwealth business, and a suspicion immediately arose that the intention was to discharge the functions of government in that city. Thereupon a great furor was raised in the Victorian press, which demanded that the spirit of the Constitution should be served. When the Commonwealth Government decided to rent some small office in Sydney for Federal purposes, even this course was resented in Victoria.

Mr. RONALD.—The press is not people.

Mr. BROWN.—But the representatives of Victoria in this Parliament would be resented any such idea had they not been satisfied there was no intention to remove the administrative government. There is no doubt that Victoria is quite right in insisting on the spirit of the compromise bargain being observed.

Mr. CROUCH.—The Governor-General spends most of his time in Sydney.

Mr. BROWN.—Only a small fraction of the Governor-General's time is spent in Sydney. While Victorians insist on the compact being carried out in spirit as well as in letter, they ought to extend fair and reasonable consideration to the sister State of New South Wales. It must not be thought at a moment that to fix the Capital site at the border would be to carry out compact in full; and, as justifying that opinion, let me read an extract from Messrs. Quick and Garran's valuable work on the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth. At page 219 we read that the Premiers of the various States, in Conference, reported—

It is considered that the fixing of the site of the Capital is a question which might well be left to the Parliament to decide; but, in view of the strong expression of opinion in relation to this matter in New South Wales, the Premiers have modified the clause, so that while the Capital cannot be fixed at Sydney, or in its neighbourhood, provision is made in the Constitution for its establishment in New South Wales at a reasonable distance from that city.

I draw honorable members' attention to the words "at a reasonable distance from that city," as showing the opinion of the Premiers who revised the Constitution, and who were responsible for the alteration which fixed the 100-miles limit.

This document was issued by the Premiers, not to the people of New South Wales for their guidance and information, but to the people of the whole Commonwealth, who were subsequently asked to indorse the Constitution as altered.

Mr. KELLY.—And they indorsed the Constitution by largely increased majorities.

Mr. BROWN.—Can it be contended that a site selected on the border, hundreds of miles distant, and most difficult of access, as the Tooma site is, is within "reasonable distance of Sydney"? Could the selection of such a site be said to comply with the spirit which underlies the agreement entered into at the Premiers' Conference? I am supported in my present attitude by some of the leading men who took part in that Conference. The right honorable member for Balaclava, in one of his addresses, said—

We, in this Colony, have made a contract with New South Wales, and we are not going back on it.

When, in the last Parliament, the right honorable member for Balaclava was asked to vote for a border site, which had considerable support from the press and representatives of Victoria, he refused to do so, and gave his voice in favour of the Tumut-Lacmalac site. To the honour and credit of that right honorable member, let it be said that he was the only member of the then Government who viewed the question from that liberal stand-point.

Mr. KELLY.—The right honorable member knew the feeling of the Premiers' Conference.

Mr. BROWN.—That is so, seeing that he was one of those instrumental in bringing about the agreement then arrived at. The Cabinet, when the voting on the sites took place, contained two representatives of New South Wales, but the right honorable member for Balaclava was the only member of the Ministry prepared to vote in favour of Tumut, as against a border site.

Mr. CROUCH.—Does the honorable member say that Tumut is within a "reasonable distance" of Sydney?

Mr. BROWN.—Tumut is within a much more reasonable distance from Sydney than is Albury, Tooma, Bombala, or Dalgety. Sir Alexander Peacock, when occupying the important position of Premier of Victoria, is reported to have thus expressed himself in an interview with a representative of the Sydney Daily Telegraph—

Albury is too near to Melbourne, you know—a province of Melbourne. You might as well have the Capital in Victoria as at Albury. Oh, no; this is a serious business; Albury is impossible—we admit it.

Those utterances were largely instrumental in leading the people of New South Wales to suppose that, all things being equal, a site within a reasonable distance beyond the 100-miles limit, would not be excluded from the consideration of this House. While honorable members are willing to select a site in New South Wales, because the Constitution compels them to do so, they do not appear to be prepared to fix on a place within a reasonable distance of Sydney, but would rather locate the Capital on the border, either west or east of the mountains or of the Snowy River.

Mr. CROUCH.—Two Victorian members voted for Albury; why not say so?

Mr. BROWN.—Some honorable members afterwards transferred their votes. There was not a Victorian member who voted for a site further north than Tumut. Some honorable members view the Constitution as though it not only provided that the Capital site should not be within 100 miles of Sydney, but also that it must not be more than fifty miles from the River Murray or the Victorian border. That is the position to which I take exception, as not being in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution or fair to the interests of the State which I represent.

Mr. KELLY.—These honorable members desire New South Wales to provide the land, and to receive no benefit in return.

Mr. BROWN.—If New South Wales is expected to hand over a big area, it is only reasonable to suppose that she anticipates to derive some benefit. But if a border site be selected, any benefit there may be will be divided between New South Wales and Victoria. The fact of the matter is that the natural conditions in New South Wales, in point of distance and accessibility, are such that her borderlands are practically Victorian. What I want to impress on honorable members is that in pressing for the selection of a site which is not on the border, I am asking for nothing unfair. The disadvantages of sites not on the border may be more than compensated for by advantages which border sites do not possess; and, all things being equal, there is no unreasonableness in the position I am advancing. As I have said before, it is not enough to observe the mere letter of the law; the spirit of the law is its very essence. The words of the Premiers who met in conference indicate the spirit of the Constitution, and its words clearly mean that if a suitable site can be secured within a reasonable distance from Sydney, that site should at least receive fair consideration at our hands. I have been greatly disappointed with the attitude assumed on this question by some of the representatives of Victoria. Arrangements were made to enable honorable members to visit the different sites suggested that they might make themselves personally acquainted with them; but I regret to say that, whilst amongst the visiting parties the other States have been amply represented, honorable members representing Victorian constituencies have not availed themselves of these opportunities to the extent that might have been expected, and as the visits were extended northwards, and into the interior of New South Wales, the number of Victorian members joining in these visits of inspection became less. This has not been very promising, but I trust that Victorian representatives will not deny just treatment to the mother State in this matter. I am encouraged to view the situation more hopefully after the address I heard from the honorable and learned member for Wannon, who represents a Victorian constituency. In his able address, that honorable and learned member viewed the question, not from a provincial, but from a comprehensive national stand-point. He was prepared to admit that New South Wales had some claims to consideration which ought not to be ignored. One subject to which the honorable and learned member referred is worthy of the special attention of the Committee, and that is the amount of expenditure involved on the site under review. I am aware that the honorable and learned member has been twitted with Kyabramism, because he has endeavoured to view this question from the economic stand-point, and because he suggested the selection of the site which would involve the Commonwealth at the least expense. Without any suggestion of cheese-paring, it must be admitted that the honorable and learned member has raised a very important question which must be fully considered in justice to the people not of any particular State but of the whole Commonwealth, because they will be expected to find the money for the establishment and equipment of the Federal Capital. If one suitable site involves less expense than does another, it should certainly have some weight with honorable members in its selection. The question of expense has a very important bearing on this matter. There are those who would appear to dissociate Federal interests from State interests. Because the Federal authority is charged with the carrying out of a certain work, some people think that the States are affected. But the Federal Parliament is to govern the same people as the State Parliaments, and the burden of unnecessary extravagance on the part of the Federal Parliament must fall upon the people of the States, in just the same way as the extravagance had been committed by the States Parliaments. It must not be forgotten that the people of the various States will have to foot the bill for all expenses in connexion with the Federal Capital. For this reason honorable members should closely consider the cost to the people of the Commonwealth of establishing the Capital at a particular site. As against an expenditure of millions, a few scattered mountains, or what honorable members may deem to be beautiful scenery should not count. The various States to-day, in connection with the pioneering which they have had to undertake, carry a burden of something like £222,000. A handful of people, numbering 4,000,000, has to bear a burden of £222,000,000 of public debt already incurred, and honorable members should be very careful before they do anything which will add to that burden. It is their duty, not only to see that the people the Commonwealth get full value for the money to be expended in connexion with the Federal Capital, but also to see that no further addition shall be made to their enormous burden of debt. This, with a little consideration may be avoided. Honorable members can verify the figures I propose to quote from the official reports before them. I should say that for the Tumut district I am compelled to take the Lacmalac site as the basis of my comparison, because I have detailed information for the purpose of the comparison with respect to that site only. Of course, with respect to the newer sites submitted for our consideration, there is no information upon these points before us. But we know that they will not be cheaper, but very much dearer, than the Lacmalac site. On turning to the Commissioners' report I find that the expenditure estimated for Bombala, and including the railways, resumption of catchment area, resumption of city site, and water supply amounts to no less than £11,000,000. It is estimated that the actual expenditure necessary to give reasonable access to that site would be about £3,000,000, and the projected expenditure on railways necessary for a complete connexion with the site is estimated to amount to another £8,000,000. I should say that the estimate of £3,000,000 includes harbor accommodation on the lower scale indicated in Mr. Oliver's supplementary report, and not on the more extensive scale set out in his original report. The estimate of £11,000,000 is for what would be required to make the Bombala site reasonably accessible from the chief cities of the Commonwealth—to bring the Capital into touch with the whole of the people. With respect to Tumut, the actual expenditure necessary is stated at £1,515,000, and the expenditure upon prospective railway extension £752,000, bringing the grand total, in round numbers, up to £9,000,000. The much-despised site of Lyndhurst has railway communication already provided so far as Sydney and Melbourne are concerned, and so far as Brisbane is concerned to a lesser degree. So that the actual expenditure in connexion with that site, which would be largely in connexion with water supply, as provided in Mr. Pridham's estimate, and the resumption of catchment and city areas, is estimated at £456,000. The expenditure necessary to complete the railways projected, as indicated in the Commissioners' report, would amount to £7,352,000. So that the cost of completing the wide scheme for Lyndhurst outlined by the expert Commissioners appointed by the Government would amount to £7,800,000. This is the comparison of estimated probable expenditure—for Lyndhurst, £7,800,000; for Tumut, £9,047,000; and for Bombala, £11,029,000. Millions are easily said, but these figures should have some weight in determining the selection of the site for the Federal Capital. If, in making a selection of a site, other things being equal, or nearly equal, we can secure what we require at a much less expenditure at one place than would be involved at other places, the necessity for avoiding an undue burden upon the people of the Commonwealth should not be overlooked.

Mr. CROUCH.—What about the expense of bringing water 100 miles?

Mr. BROWN.—I am not aware of any proposal to bring water a distance of 100 miles. I should like to point out that the estimates of expenditure to which I have referred are estimates based on the probable cost of the resumption of the Capital site and catchment area, securing access, and water supply, and it must not be forgotten that the expenditure necessary to provide the buildings which we would associate with a city of this character, and which must necessarily be expensive, will be an additional charge upon the people of the Commonwealth I now desire to deal with the question of territory. We have to look to the reports upon the sites for the information necessary to guide us to a conclusion with regard to the territories. In other words, we have to adopt some particular site as a peg upon which to hang our territorial arguments. A great change has taken place since the last Parliament dealt with this matter. The sites most favoured then were Lyndhurst, Lacmalac, and Bombala. Now, judging from the opinions expressed by honorable members, it would seem that two of these sites have been displaced. I cannot regard this change as due to the altered personnel of the House, and I am, therefore, forced to the conclusion that it has been brought about by the more complete information that has been placed at the disposal of honorable members. Owing largely to the inquiries and valuable report made by the right honorable member for Swan, Bombala has been displaced by Dalgety, which on the former occasion did not secure a single vote. Then, in respect to the sites in the southern district, Lacmalac, which was boomed last session, has had to give way to a new site, which had not previously been seriously considered. Therefore, the only site that has retained its old position is Lyndhurst. I regret that the further investigations, which have been made since we last discussed this subject, in respect to the southern and south-eastern districts, have not been fully extended to the sites available in the western district. I have been surprised at the prejudice manifested by some honorable members. For instance, one honorable member, referring to Lyndhurst, described the country as very inferior, and devoid of vegetation, and stated that even the rabbits to be found there were in a starving condition. I fancy that that honorable member must have worn coloured glasses when he travelled through the district. In contrasting the merits of the various sites, I shall endeavour to avoid following the honorable member's example. I have had the pleasure of visiting all the sites that have been brought prominently under notice. Whilst I regard some of them as having stronger claims than others, I do not think that any one can be said to be unworthy. We should not make a great mistake if we selected any one of them. The preliminary investigations were so complete that we were safeguarded against being called upon to discuss the merits of any really inferior site. New South Wales is not so poverty-stricken in respect to her territory that she cannot find a site for the Federal Capital possessing all the chief requisites for such a city. Some honorable members, myself amongst them, consider that a rich territory is one of the most important essentials. I hold that it would be impossible to build up or to maintain the Federal city entirely upon Federal expenditure, and that if we are to attract to the Seat of Government a population of, say, 30,000 or 50,000, a large proportion of those who live in our territory must be able to sustain themselves upon the land. Moreover, if it is contemplated that the Federal Territory shall embrace a large area in order that the revenue derived and the profits accruing from the unearned increment may be applied to the improvement of the Capital, we must acquire land that will be suitable for agricultural purposes. It is true that many of our cities owe their existence to the fact that gold or some other mineral has been discovered in the vicinity. We know of many instances which towns containing a population of perhaps as many as 30,000 have been established as the result of the discovery of alluvial gold-fields, and that as soon as diggings have been exhausted the population has gradually decreased, and nothing more than a nucleus has remained. Agricultural development has afterwards taken place in the neighbourhood, and prosperity has been, at least, to some extent, restored. This statement would fairly outline the history of many cities in the Commonwealth, and it is sufficient to show that a large proportion of the people who settle within the Federal Territory must maintain themselves on the land. Unless we can secure good land in the immediate vicinity of the Federal city, we cannot look forward to any appreciable growth of population. Some honorable members regard the acquirement of a rich territory as a secondary consideration, and an ample water supply has first place in their estimation. Others, of an artistic or poetic temperament, attach the greatest importance to the beauty of the scenery in the vicinity of the Capital. So long as there are towering snow-clad mountains in the background they care little or nothing whether the site itself is suitable for building purposes, whether the surrounding territory is one that will support a reasonably large population. The considerations indicated by me are less an authority than the present Chief Justice of the Commonwealth. Sir Samuel Griffith, should, in my view, have great weight with us. That eminent Judge has contributed very largely to the development of the Federal idea, and to the building up of the Commonwealth. He took part in the first Conference, of which the late Sir Henry Parkes, the statesman of whom New South Wales is so proud, was a member. He largely assisted to lay the foundations of the Constitution, which was ultimately adopted by the Federal Convention, and the traces of his master-hand are everywhere to be seen throughout its fabric. He was, in my opinion, deservedly rewarded by his appointment to the position of first Chief Justice of Australia, and the Commonwealth did honour to itself by that appointment. In 1886, before the subject was consolidated to anything like a concrete proposal, he wrote a paper entitled, "Notes on Australian Federation," in which, speaking of the Federal Capital, he said that Should be central, easily accessible, not unduly exposed to the risks of war or invasion, and its climate should not be such as to render it an undesirable place to live in.

We shall not go very far wrong if we consider the question before us from those points of view. Dealing first with the feature of centrality, I think that any honorable member who looks at the maps which have been placed before us, and reads the recommendations of the Commission appointed by the Barton Government to inquire into the matter, must come to the conclusion that, having regard to railway communication, present and prospective, Lyndhurst is much more central than any of the other sites. The Lyndhurst territory is situated on the main western line from Sydney to Bourke, and the branch which proceeds to Condobolin. It is also on the line which connects the Western system with the Southern. The Southern line, as honorable members know, is the great railway thoroughfare from Adelaide, through Melbourne and Sydney, to Brisbane. Moreover, it is now proposed by the New South Wales Government to construct a railway from Wellington to Werris Creek, not with a view to improve the communication with a proposed Federal Capital site, but to develop the country which such a line would traverse, and to connect the western and northern railway systems. When that line is made, Lyndhurst will be much nearer to Brisbane than it is now, and it is already nearer to that city than is any of the other proposed sites. Parliamentary sanction has also been given to the construction of a railway from Cobar to Wilcannia. I understand that that line has been commenced, and that it is proposed to extend it to Broken Hill. When that is done, there will be direct communication between Lyndhurst and Adelaide, and, if the transcontinental line, of which the right honorable member for Swan is so able and strenuous an advocate, is constructed, Lyndhurst will be in direct communication with Perth also. Furthermore, it has been suggested, as within the scope of future extension, that a second transcontinental line may be made from Bourke to Port Darwin. As honorable members are aware, the railway system of Queensland differs greatly from those of her sister States, inasmuch as, while the railways of Victoria practically all converge on Melbourne, and those of New South Wales on Sydney, Queensland, in addition to her coastal line, has three inland lines which feed three separate ports.

The suggested railway of which I have spoken would connect these lines, that is, the line from Brisbane to Cunnamulla, the line from Rockhampton to Longreach, and the line from Townsville to Winton. Such a railway would open up a vast area of rich pastoral country. The districts through which it would pass are noted for their great cattle carrying capacity. Although, within the past few years, the herds have been decimated by the drought which afflicted Queensland, as well as New South Wales and Victoria, the district will do in the future what it has done in the past. It has in the past largely supplied the meat markets of the southern States, and, in years to come, will do so to a still greater degree, and will, of course, be the great source of supply for the Federal Capital. The question of present accessibility, however, was dealt with so ably by the honorable and learned member for Wannon the other night that there is no need to again quote the figures which he gave, or to do more than refer honorable members to the information on the subject available in the reports of experts. It is evident, however, that taking into consideration the present location of population, Lyndhurst is much more central than any other site under consideration. Moreover, it has been proved that the centre of the present population of the Commonwealth is considerably north of any of the border sites, and is constantly trending northwards. Mr. Coghlan, whose estimate is a very conservative one, puts the probable annual increase of our population at 2.40 per cent., and is of opinion that thirty years hence, of all the sites Lyndhurst will be the nearest to the centre of population. The probability is that when Australia has become largely populated, the centre will be still nearer to the Armidale site; but as that site is not now under consideration, we must give the more weight to the fact that of the present sites Lyndhurst will be the nearest to the centre. Sir Samuel Griffith regards as the next essential that the Capital shall not be exposed to the risks of war. No one will challenge the statement that, with the exception of Tooma, Lyndhurst is more completely protected from invasion than any of the sites. Both Lyndhurst and Tooma lie west of the great dividing range, which extends like an immense barrier between the sea coast and the interior. That range was pierced only after the country had been settled for many years, and at the present time there are only two or three places in which it is crossed by a railway. The Lithgow Zigzag, while giving communication between Sydney and the Lyndhurst territory, could be defended by a very small body of men against an almost untold host. That is a condition which does not apply to the Monaro sites. Whilst it is true that those sites are situated on a high tableland, they are very much more vulnerable than is the Lyndhurst site. If we are to establish a Capital of this character, it should be representative of the wealth and influence of the Commonwealth. It will be the home of all that the people of the Federation hold dear. It will contain all the historical documents of the Commonwealth. It will be the centre from which the functions of government will be discharged, and from which its banking and commercial transactions will extend throughout the whole of Australia. Consequently we must see that whilst it is reasonably accessible to the centres of population, it also offers facilities for defence against a hostile force. I claim that the western district conforms more nearly to the ideal conditions which have been laid down by that great authority, Sir Samuel Griffith, than does any other site, and would best lend itself to the mobilization of the Commonwealth Defence Forces. In my earlier remarks I made some reference to the question of accessibility. Let me now examine the merits of the rival sites from that stand-point. According to the report of the Capital Sites Commissioners the cost of providing an efficient water supply at Bombala—a supply drawn from the Delegate River—would be, roughly speaking, £531,000. If the supply were drawn from the Snowy River, its cost would be £617,000. The resumption of the catchment area would involve an expenditure of £121,000, and that of the city site of £24,000. Unfortunately, the Bombala district labours under a very great disadvantage in respect of railway communication. I believe that it is deserving of more consideration in this respect than it has hitherto received. At the same time I do not think that it is the rich district which some of its advocates would lead us to believe. As far as I am able to judge each of the rival districts possesses distinct characteristics. For example, the western area is largely composed of rich, volcanic, high lands. A feature of that district is that the soil on the top of the hills is as rich as is that in the valleys. Those honorable members who visited the Orange site will recollect seeing potatoes under cultivation the right at the summit of the ridges, plain indicating that the land along those ridges was very rich. As a matter of fact, the sides of Canobolas itself are cultivated to a very considerable elevation. Indeed, the hills and rolling downs of the western district are famed throughout New South Wales for their productiveness. The Tumut district is distinguished by high hills and deep valleys. The latter are exceedingly rich, some of them being of a semi-tropical nature. The Tumut valley is famed for the growth of the finest leaf tobacco, and the best maize produced in New South Wales. The area of rich land, however, is not very extensive. I hold in my hand a report upon this very subject by Mr. Chesterman, in which he points out the extent of very rich, and of medium country, which is contained in the Tumut district. He says—

The extent of alluvial land in the valley of the Tumut was some years ago estimated as follows:—Tumut River (including the Goobaragidra, from four miles below Brungle to Talbing 14,860; Brungle Creek, 600; Killimicat Creek, 500; Bombowlee Creek, 600; Gilmore Creek, 800; Total, 17,360 acres.

That is the estimate furnished by the officer, who is well acquainted with the entire district. He goes on to quote the following paragraph, from a report prepared by Mr. Gilliat, in 1891:—

The above-mentioned report estimates the extent of arable upland at 100,000 acres. This, of course, will vary according to the limit adopted. The area remaining may be classed as pasture land, better adapted to sheep than large stock. Some of it is very inferior, while in other places sheep thrive well.

Later on he quotes an extract from the report of a local Committee, the members of which would not be likely to underestimate the area of rich land within the district. The report states—

The area within a radius of twenty miles of the proposed site is composed of 170,000 acres of rich chocolate-colored volcanic soil, and 300,000 acres of rich alluvial flats (much of which has been cultivated for fifty years, with little or no deterioration), whilst the more elevated portions afford splendid grazing country for sheep right to the mountain-tops.

The soil upon the hills there is not so rich as is that of the western district, because it is largely subjected to weather conditions. The much-talked-of Tooma site, upon the Upper Murray, also comprises rich narrow valleys with high uplands, which are not calculated to support an agricultural population.

ation. The Bombala area, extending from the Snowy River to the Victorian border, consists largely of undulating country with frequent granite outcrops. It is fairly good grazing country, and parts of it are of a rich volcanic nature; there is not, however, a very great extent of it. Towards Bombala itself, the valleys become deeper, and a greater area of rich soil is to be found there. These constitute the highly-cultivated parts of the district. When we recollect, however, that this country was occupied sixty years ago and before the western district was opened up, that about £1,000,000 has been expended in an effort to develop it, with very little success, it is at once patent that some very great natural disadvantages must confront the settlers there. On the other hand, the people in the western district originally had to contend with the barrier of the Blue Mountains. Teams had to laboriously drag their loads over that range. It was only after considerable development had taken place in that district that the Government of New South Wales undertook the great engineering feat of constructing a railway across the Blue Mountains. To put the matter tersely, the railway did not develop the western district, but the western district developed the railway. That fact discloses a material difference between this site and its rivals, and one to which I would invite the attention of the Committee. The cost of connecting Cooma and Bombala by rail, according to the report of the Capital Sites Commissioners, would be £337,000, whilst that of constructing a line from Bombala to Bairnsdale is estimated at £1,181,000. I notice that the surveyors, who have since examined this site, have not departed from that estimate. From Bondi to Eden the cost would be £931,000. These are necessary lines, if the site which I have mentioned is to be chosen. One of the arguments in favour of the Capital being located there, is based on the cheap water carriage to Eden. If that is to be of any advantage, there must be railway connexion with the Capital. That railway would be perhaps as expensive a bit of work as any of the lines that have been mentioned. Then, again, there must be connexion between Cooma and Bombala, in order to give railway communication with Sydney; and if Victoria is to be satisfied with that connexion, it will mean a great detour round by Goulburn. But, assuming that Victoria will want to get as direct a connexion as possible, it will be necessary to construct the Bombala-Bairnsdale line, which will, on the estimate to which I have referred, cost £1,181,000. So that in these railways will be involved an expenditure of £2,449,000.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Then there is £1,028,000 for the port.

Mr. BROWN.—Yes; with respect to the port—it is called a harbor by courtesy—if it is to be made of any value, the expenditure will be considerable. A human-made harbor has never yet been a success.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—What about Fremantle?

Mr. BROWN.—I say nothing of Fremantle; but New South Wales has tried the experiment of making harbors on the east coast, and practically the money might as well have been thrown into the sea. It is a most expensive work to undertake. But if a harbor that could stand could be constructed, there might be a justification for it. Engineers, however, have not been able to construct harbor works on the east coast of New South Wales that could stand against the varying influences of the currents, tides, and storms that obtain there. If the harbor is to be a success, Mr. Oliver states, on the authority of Mr. Darling—who had charge of the New South Wales harbors at that time—that an expenditure of £1,028,000 would be required to construct the breakwaters, to say nothing of the wharfs and other facilities necessary for shipping. But suppose we take the lower estimate of Mr. Oliver, produced in his criticism of the Commissioners' report. It is an estimate furnished by Mr. G. H. Halligan, an officer of the Works Department of New South Wales. He showed that a small breakwater, at a cost of £150,000, would give harbor accommodation of less than a mile. The actual area being 0.8 of a square mile. The depth would be about four fathoms. He also indicates that for a further expenditure of £450,000, four and a half square miles of harbor accommodation might be provided, and that it would also be necessary to meet the shipping requirements to expend about £30,000 upon jetties, and so forth, or a minimum of harbor accommodation. But this is not the only expenditure which the Commonwealth would be called upon to incur. The very position of the harbor, and the uses to which it would be put, would necessitate its being fortified. We know, from our experience in Melbourne and Sydney, what enormous sums of money can be sunk in providing means of defence for harbors on anything like a reasonable scale. That item has not been considered in the preparation of the estimates to which I have alluded.

Mr. KELLY.—There is an additional item—we should have to subsidize the shipping companies heavily to get them to allow their vessels to go there.

Mr. BROWN.—That may be the case, as there is considerable danger in navigating that coast. I do not know whether the ship-owners would require subsidies, but they certainly would require the money which I have mentioned to be spent upon the harbor, to make the accommodation for their vessels reasonable. Even then our experience shows us that we could not guarantee to make the harbor absolutely safe. The necessary expenditure on account of the harbor on the lowest scale would be £180,000, which makes the actual expenditure £3,000,000, in order to give reasonable means of access to Bombala or Dalgety. If the harbor is to be of the character indicated by Mr. Darley, who reported upon it, another £1,000,000 will have to be expended. The Federal Capital Commission shows that other railways will have to be constructed, and they estimate that their cost—that is, to give further facilities to connect the Capital with Adelaide and with the north—would be £7,000,000. So that the total expenditure, in order to make Bombala or Dalgety anything like reasonably accessible for the purposes of the Federal Capital, and to provide a port, and a water supply for a population of 50,000 people, would be no less than £11,022,680. With regard to Tumut, the water supply is reasonably cheap. I wish to indicate that in dealing with the Tumut site, I have to take the figures for the Lacmalac site as the basis of my estimate. The Lacmalac site is the only one for which we have any data. It is the cheapest site in the district, with the exception of Gadara. At Tumut the water supply would cost £200,280. The resumption of the catchment area would cost £180. The city site would cost £25,000. Railway extension, six and a half miles, would cost £50,000. If the connexion be made with Victoria—and we have every reason to believe that that connexion is held by a large number of honorable members to be essential—upon the Victorian estimate the line would cost £1,240,000. In addition, it would cost

£6,000 to construct a bridge over the Murray. I am simply giving the lowest estimate, furnished by the Victorian railway engineers. But the other evening, the honorable and learned member for Werriwa who is a practical man in connexion with surveying, stated that he had thoroughly examined the country, and had arrived at the conclusion that, instead of its being possible to construct that line for £8,500 mile—which is the basis upon which I made this calculation—it would cost nearly £20,000 a mile to build the line from Tumut to the Victorian border. I can just understand, from the little acquaintance I have with that country, and from its prepossessing character, that it certainly would cost a very large sum to give it the benefit of railway connexion. The actual expenditure on this site would be £1,515,000—the lowest estimate; but if the testimony of the honorable and learned member for Werriwa is of any value, the cost would be considerably more. But I do not think that the line can be constructed more cheaply than according to the Victorian estimate; and that means that, in order to give facilities for communication, an actual expenditure of £1,515,000 will be necessary. According to the expert Commissioners' estimate, £7,532,183, is required for projected railways, making a total of £9,047,719 for means of communication, water supply, and assumption and catchment area. A railway is suggested from Warwick to Brisbane.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Oh!

Mr. BROWN.—The right honorable member takes exception to that statement, but it must be remembered that I am quoting the same authorities in connexion with all the sites.

Mr. TUDOR.—That is a new line?

Mr. BROWN.—It is a new line in order to get through communication; and the Wellington to Werris Creek line and the transcontinental line are included in the estimate. According to the reports, water supply at Lyndhurst for a population of 50,000 people means an expenditure of £427,000; the resumption of catchment area, £160,100; city site, £20,000; or a total of £607,000. The actual expenditure contemplated at Bombala, on the basis indicated, is £3,006,680; and at Tumut the expenditure is £1,515,460, if the line be taken down to the Murray and across into Victoria as proposed in last Parliament. Honorable members will see how these figures compare with an actual expenditure of £607,000 at Lyndhurst. Before a single pound is spent on buildings at Bombala, there must be an expenditure of over £3,000,000 in order to give reasonable accessibility.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—All that is wanted is a railway of thirty miles from Cooma to Dalgety.

Mr. BROWN.—If the right honorable member is of opinion that a railway from Cooma to Dalgety will satisfy the Commonwealth, what becomes of the great argument as to the necessity for a port? Of what good is a port without connecting railways? Would Victorian members be satisfied to journey right round by Albury and Goulburn? There is no doubt that if the Capital site be fixed at Bombala, the Victorian people will be asked to incur an expenditure of over £1,000,000 in order to provide reasonable means of communication. That is the estimate made by the expert Commissioners. I am not a Kya-ramite to the extent of believing that all expenditure should be cut down to the narrowest limits; but such great divergence between the estimates ought to have some weight with us in selecting a site. These are not my own figures, but the figures of the expert Commissioners, with the exception of those relating to the harbor, which were supplied by Mr. Oliver. And we must not forget that these figures are placed before us for the purpose of guiding and assisting us in arriving at a decision. If honorable members will turn to page 51 of the Commissioners' report, they will find that, in order to provide prospective railway facilities at Lyndhurst, there must be a total expenditure of £7,353,414. That includes a railway from Wellington to Werriis Creek, at £514,576; from Warwick to Brisbane, £631,500; from Cobar to South Australia, £1,117,338, and the transcontinental line, costing £5,090,183.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is a million and a quarter too much for the transcontinental line.

Mr. BROWN.—I am quoting the report of the expert Commissioners.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—According to the latest report, the estimate is £4,050,000.

Mr. BROWN.—I do not know whether the right honorable member has later reports than have been given to the House.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The engineers have reported since then.

Mr. BROWN.—Well, let us reduce the estimate by £1,000,000. In respect of the projected lines, the total cost at Bombala is estimated at £10,000,000; at Tumut, £8,000,000; and Lyndhurst, £6,000,000. According to the expert Commissioners, 288 miles of railway on the Bombala site would cost £2,449,500; while the Lyndhurst extension, of 475 miles, is estimated to cost £1,633,914. The Lyndhurst extension would bring Queensland nearer, by the Werriis Creek extension, and would shorten the distance to Adelaide, by the Cobar-Wilcannia and Broken Hill extensions. Those extensions are under the consideration of the State Legislature of New South Wales, quite apart from any considerations of a Federal Capital. The Cobar-Wilcannia line was authorized by the last Parliament in New South Wales, and the Werriis Creek extension has been under the consideration of the Public Works Committee; so that both have reached a progressive stage. One condition laid down as essential in a Federal Capital by Sir Samuel Griffith is a suitable climate, and in this connexion, altitude has a very important bearing. When the Tumut site was selected by the last Parliament, the right honorable member for Swan succeeded in having fixed a minimum altitude of 1,500 feet, below which he considered it would be unwise to locate the Capital.

Mr. SKENE.—That "knocked out" some of the sites.

Mr. BROWN.—It "knocked out" Lacmalac, Gadara, and Tumut.

Mr. KELLY.—And Tooma, also.

Mr. BROWN.—That is so, if Tooma is to be considered a factor. Lyndhurst has an elevation of 2,280 feet; Orange, 2,880 feet; Bathurst, 2,200 feet, or an average for the western sites of 2,453. At Bombala itself the elevation is 2,400; at Dalgety, 2,650; at Delegete, 2,550; at Coolringdon, 3,000 feet, or an average for the four sites in that district of 2,400 feet. Tumut town site has an elevation of 1,000 feet; Gadara, 1,050 feet; Lacmalac, 1,050 feet; Ellerslie, 1,300 feet; Mundongo, 1,250 feet. These four sites are under the minimum fixed by the right honorable member for Swan, the average being 1,150 feet. When we get into the higher country we find that the elevation of Table Top is 2,000 feet; Batlow, 2,550 feet; Wyangle, 1,650 feet; Red Hill and Bondo, 2,500 feet; Toomarrama, 2,350 feet, or an average of 2,210 feet. Now we come to Welaregang. Mr. Chesterman, in his report, gives the average elevation of this site at approximately 1,100 feet. If the right honorable member for Swan is still of the opinion he expressed in the last Parliament—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am.

Mr. BROWN.—And if the members of the Ministry to which he belonged are still of the same opinion, this Tooma site has no show.

Mr. KNOX.—If the honorable member is correct the map must be wrong.

Mr. BROWN.—But I am going by Mr. Chesterman's report, and as that is only a few days old, I presume that the gentleman who made it secured the most up-to-date information.

Mr. KELLY.—That country was only explored quite recently.

Mr. BROWN.—The first expedition from this Parliament visited it only about three weeks ago. I have no desire to be unduly severe in my criticism of other honorable members, but I must say that the attitude adopted by the honorable member for Hume, with respect to this particular site, is most extraordinary when compared with the attitude which the honorable gentleman has adopted with respect to other sites. When this Tooma site was brought forward by the honorable member for Grampians in the last Parliament the honorable member asked the Government to remit it to the expert Commissioners for report. I know that the honorable member strongly impressed upon the Minister of Home Affairs at the time the necessity for extending the inquiry of the Commission to that particular site. He spoke to me on the subject, and I told him that I was opposed to all the sites on the border, but that if the Government intended to include Albury I saw no reason why this site at Tooma should not be included amongst those on which a report was to be made. It is neither more nor less a border site than is Albury. Why the honorable member for Hume, who previously objected to this site because it was too near the border, should have given his first preferential vote for Albury is a paradox which I cannot pretend to understand.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the honorable member for Hume now intend to vote for Tumut?

Mr. BROWN.—I do not know how the honorable gentleman intends to vote now. The question of temperature is a very important one, and in this connexion I shall not confine myself to the information supplied by the report of the expert Commissioners; I have also before me the information contained in the very severe caustic, and, to some extent, deserved criticism of the Commission's report by the late Mr. Oliver. The figures he quotes are: For Bombala, highest 104·1 degrees, lowest 15·3 degrees, and the mean annual shade temperature, 54·3 degrees. For Dalgaty, he says that no official records are available, but the expert Commissioners in their special report, at page 2, give these figures for that site: Highest temperature 104 degrees, lowest 14 degrees, mean from 70 degrees to 8 degrees. For Lyndhurst, the figures given are: Mean annual shade temperature 52·1 degrees, highest 98·4 degrees, and lowest 15·4 degrees. For Tumut: Mean annual shade temperature 62 degrees, highest 100 degrees, and lowest 27 degrees. It will be seen that in the matter of temperature the western site shows to very considerable advantage. I wish now to deal with the question of productivity, and I shall then conclude what I have to say. The expert Commissioners in their report had to consider whether the sites could afford reasonable support for a population of 50,000. It will be seen that in their report they give an estimate of the acreage under cultivation, and the productiveness at each of the different sites. They take for Bombala the counties of Auckland and Wellesley, and they give the average area under cultivation for eight years preceding March, 1903, for the Bombala territory at 12,513 acres, and for Dalgaty 33,329 acres, or a total for the district of 45,742 acres. At Tumut the area under cultivation was included in the counties of Buccleuch and Wynyard, and is stated at 33,329 acres. Coming to the western sites, the area under cultivation at Lyndhurst is given at 179,303 acres. I should like the honorable member who told us that Lyndhurst was in a third-rate agricultural district to explain how it is that there were 179,000 acres under cultivation in that district, whilst in the districts which he preferred to it, Tumut and Bombala, there were only 33,000 acres and 45,000 acres respectively under cultivation. In the case of the latter sites the acreage given covers the whole of the sites within the territories mentioned, but the acreage given for Lyndhurst covers but a small portion of the western territory suggested. We have now to consider the fifty miles radius, and the land under cultivation at Orange was 147,259 acres, and at Bathurst 119,488 acres. So that if we consider Lyndhurst, as including these three sites, there were there 446,050 acres under cultivation. The honorable member who, in the face of that, will say that it is a poor agricultural district must consider that the men who work the land, and who should be the best judges of farming conditions, are fools. In view of the figures I have given, it must be clear that the contention against the productivity of the western district cannot survive the hard test of facts. When in Sydney some little time ago, I asked the Statistical Department to supply me with last year's figures of production for these districts. The figures referred to in the Commissioners' report were brought up only to 1903. I asked that I should be supplied with figures brought up to 1904 showing the area under cultivation, and the produce taken from the different sites. From the return supplied to me, I find that Bombala last year produced 42,149 bushels of wheat, and Dalgety 51,317 bushels, or a total of 93,466 bushels for the district. Of maize Bombala produced 274,803 bushels, and Dalgety nil. Of oats Bombala produced 16,009 bushels, and Dalgety 31,014, or a total of 47,023 bushels for the district. The Monaro sites last year produced 93,466 bushels of wheat, 274,803 bushels maize, and 47,023 bushels of oats. I find that Tumut produced 261,483 bushels wheat, 229,975 bushels maize, and 20,987 bushels of oats. Lyndhurst produced 2,852,859 bushels of wheat, 157,243 bushels of maize, 207,599 bushels of oats. Orange produced 1,408,366 bushels of wheat, 120,496 bushels of maize, and 185,412 bushels of oats. Bathurst produced 1,146,525 bushels of wheat, 93,450 bushels of maize, and 165,047 bushels of oats. The total production of the western sites was:—Wheat, 5,407,750 bushels; maize, 371,189 bushels; and oats, 558,058 bushels. I ask honorable members if, on the actual facts, they think there is any comparison between the productiveness of the districts surrounding these three sites. I have given the produce of the sites' districts, but it should not be forgotten that Lyndhurst commands the great wheat territory to the west of the particular sites at that place, and the railway goes through Lyndhurst territory, which carries the wheat from those districts to the Sydney market for export. In New South Wales we have only 1,500,000 acres under wheat, and yet last year we produced something like 27,000,000 bushels. According to our statisticians we have 20,000,000 acres of land in New South Wales fit for wheat cultivation, and most of it is on the slopes of the western tableland. For convenience, the statisticians divide the State into districts, in making their estimates of wheat production. The highest is the central western district, which is under the dominance of the western sites, and the southern-western, a considerable part of which is under the dominance of the central western sites. The railway, carrying the products from those districts, runs through this central western territory, extending from Orange via Wellington, and Narramine to Nyngan; from Orange to Molong, Forbes, Parkes, and Condobolin, and a small area on the southern line, embracing Grenfell. On the central-western slopes, which are supplied with railway communication, there were produced last year 7,743,000 bushels, and on the southern-western slopes 8,798,000 bushels. The southern border of the central-western slopes is the Lachlan River, and the railway to Forbes and Condobolin draws traffic from a considerable area to the south of that river, so that part of the southern-western slopes, including the counties of Gipps, Forbes, and part of Bland, would furnish supplies for the Federal Territory. Coming now to the question of water supply: If Lyndhurst has been attacked on one point more than on another, it is in regard to this matter. An anonymous communication, signed by one who terms himself "A resident of Carcoar-Garland," and purports to speak from personal knowledge, has been printed in the Bombala Times. In it the statement is made that the water in the district is highly mineralized, and, therefore, unfit for city purposes. I am surprised that any sensible man should give weight to an anonymous communication of that description in preference to the reports of experts. The Capital Sites Commission investigated the matter thoroughly, and they say nothing about the water there being impregnated by deleterious mineral matter. If, in their opinion, the water in the district was unfit for human use, or to any extent affected by the presence of mineral substances, it would have been their duty to inform us of the fact. Some honorable members have asked why a special analysis of the Lyndhurst water has not been made. But I would point out that analyses of the water at Orange and Bathurst, both of which places are near to Lyndhurst and derive their water supply from practically the same source, have been made. I have tried to ascertain from those who have resided for a long time in the Lyndhurst district, and are well acquainted with it, what modicum of truth lies in the statement to which I have referred, and I have been informed that the only foundation for it is the fact that a small creek to the south-west of the site, which empties itself into the Belabula River, runs through some limestone country. That creek, however, is not within the proposed catchment area. If honorable members are not satisfied with the reports which we have already obtained from experts, why not have a special analysis of the Lyndhurst water? It has been further stated that the creeks in the district are often dry; but to those who hold the opinion that the water supply there is not permanent, I commend the report of Mr. Pridham, the report of the Commissioners, and, lastly, the report of the right honorable member for Swan, who recently visited the place. If they read those reports they will find that a supply sufficient for 100,000 persons can be brought to the proposed city site by gravitation. The Lyndhurst site is the only one which can be so supplied. Both the Tumut and the Dalgety supplies would have to be obtained by pumping.

Mr. CROUCH.—No; Dalgety would have a gravitation supply.

Mr. BROWN.—Well, the Bombala supply would have to be pumped. In my opinion, the Government made a wise choice in selecting Mr. Stewart, of South Australia, to deal with the question of water supply. I was in Orange while he was making his investigations, and I know that he gave his personal attention to the whole matter. He did not regard the reports of other officers as sufficient, but travelled over the site himself, took his own measurements, and worked out his own estimates. Of course, he had the assistance of Mr. Pridham in checking his calculations. The Commission visited the district when it was suffering from the severest drought ever known since its settlement by white people, and when it showed to greatest disadvantage. Furthermore, for the purposes of their estimate, they took the minimum run-off. The estimate given, however, is not entirely theirs, but is based upon supplementary estimates of expert officers in the employment of the Government of New South Wales. They do not say that there is no water at Lyndhurst. On the contrary, they say that the catchment area there would, under the most unfavourable conditions, provide a supply sufficient for a city of 100,000 inhabitants while Mr. Wade says that at a reasonable expenditure a supply can be provided sufficient for the purposes of extensive irrigation, and to meet the requirements of an additional population of 200,000, or in all 300,000 persons. The right honorable member for Swan referred to the river Lachlan as a stream that could not be regarded as perennial. My acquaintance with that river dates back to a period long prior to that of the visit paid by the right honorable gentleman, for I was born in the Lachlan valley.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I only quoted the honorable member for Hume. He said the river was dry when he was there—had not seen it.

Mr. BROWN.—The right honorable gentleman did not quote a very good authority.

Mr. CROUCH.—Does the honorable member say that the Lachlan contains pure drinkable water?

Mr. BROWN.—Yes. The towns of Forbes, Condobolin, and Cowra draw their supplies from the Lachlan. That river, common with most inland rivers, overflows its banks in times of heavy flood, and have known the low-lying land along the Lachlan valley to be submerged for a distance of twenty miles, on either side of the river bed. The Lachlan basin was described by some of the early explorers as an inland sea. Very considerable losses are entailed upon farmers and stock-owners by these inundations. I have seen whole flocks of sheep washed away in a night.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—There have been lakes in Australia in places which are now occupied by considerable sandhills, the change having been brought about within three or four years.

Mr. BROWN.—That does not apply to the country of which I am speaking. The proposal which has been mentioned to block the river Lachlan and impound a large quantity of water, has been made with a two-fold object. It is intended first of all, to prevent the land on the low reaches of the Lachlan from being inundated at times of heavy flood, and secondly, to impound a sufficient quantity of water to enable the river to be maintained at normal level during the drier periods of the year, and to provide for the requirements of irrigationists along the banks of the stream. The drought of 1902 was the severest ever experienced in that part of the country. It was the worst that I have ever known, and my recollection extends as far back as 1865. In the midst of the drought, the river, instead of being the sand-bed that has been represented, contained a supply of water sufficient to meet the requirements of several large irrigation plants. One station proprietor, at a point about twenty-one miles below Forbes, fed seventy-five sheep per acre throughout the drought, by irrigating land on the banks of the Lachlan with water drawn from the river, and below that point, as far as Cowra, a considerable number of large irrigation plants were kept going continuously. I admit that the large quantities of water drawn off from the river in this way, and impounded in dams that were constructed on the upper part of the stream, caused the river to run dry lower down, but the supply of water was not exhausted for a length of fully 100 miles. Therefore, the Lachlan could not be truthfully described as dry, and unreliable as a source of water supply.

Mr. CROUCH.—Did the honorable member say that some of the land carried seventy-five sheep to the acre during the drought.

Mr. BROWN.—Yes. I am speaking of a well authenticated case. The operations were carried out under the supervision of an officer of the Agricultural Department of New South Wales, with a view to demonstrate the advantages of irrigation, and the honorable member may, if he chooses, obtain further particulars by consulting the official reports from which my information is derived. I do not come here to tell fairy tales, because the facts are sufficient to enable me to establish the claims of Lyndhurst. What did Mr. Wade say with respect to catchment area in connexion with the gravitation scheme mentioned by the Commissioners? He said—

I am personally acquainted with all of these catchments, and am in accord with the Commissioners in their views as to basis of run-off, and consider that, by amplifying the storage, a population in round numbers of 100,000 people could be supplied with 100 gallons per head per diem.

Mr. Wade, who is the Chief Engineer of Water Conservation in New South Wales, pointed out that the Commissioners were well within the mark when they said that 100,000 people could be supplied. Then, dealing with the supplementary scheme, he said—

In addition to these gravitation sources, the Federal Royal Commission suggested the Lachlan River as an additional source of supply by pumping from the storage proposed for irrigation purposes by the State, at Wyangala. It was suggested that a supply for an additional 203,000 could be obtained. . . . The Wyangala storage, if carried out to the fullest extent of the proposals for irrigation purposes, will store seventy-eight thousand million gallons, and be capable of supplying 135 million gallons per day throughout the driest succession of years experienced on the Lachlan, such as 1901-2.

Mr. Wade has adopted a very safe basis for his calculations, and there need be no fear that his estimates will not be realized. I wish to say that, as the result of my own experience and observation, from the point of view of productiveness, and of the possibility of founding a city from its own latent resources, no site submitted for our consideration can compare with the western sites. I think I have amply demonstrated that, by showing the very wide margin which exists between them and other sites so far as productiveness and the areas under cultivation are concerned. That is an item which is worthy of very serious consideration. From the stand-point of splendid panoramic country, the Orange site stands unrivalled. On the other hand, for scenic beauty, in the shape of high snow-capped mountains, Tooma probably excels all others, whilst Dalgety undoubtedly would furnish the best water supply. But I would point out that we are not called upon to select a site simply on account of its water supply, or because it is within seventeen or thirty miles of snow-capped mountains. It must possess other qualifications. On the grounds of centrality, accessibility, general climatic conditions, altitude, facilities for defence, and of a reasonable water supply, I think I have shown that the western site is at least deserving of very serious consideration at the hands of honorable members. I trust that the Committee will not say that because this site happens to be only seven hours distant by rail from Sydney, and eleven hours' journey from Melbourne, it should not be considered. I claim that the spirit of the Constitution, as well as its letter, should be respected. I trust that we shall make a selection which will justify our wisdom, not only to the present generation, but to the generations to come.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—I do not propose to follow the example of the honorable member for Canobolas by making a lengthy speech. He has supplied the Committee with a large amount of valuable information, which will prove very convenient for the purposes of reference. He gave us statistics which had not been presented by any other honorable member. When he put forward the estimate of the cost of making the necessary railway connexions to Lyndhurst, he included in it the construction of a railway to Western Australia, and the extension of a line to connect with Brisbane. Surely, when he entered into such figures, he departed from the practical character of his address. I can speak with personal knowledge of the various centres of population in the western district. I have paid many visits to it, and am intimately acquainted with all its varied resources. I am prepared at once to acknowledge that there are many advantages associated with it. The one feature connected with it which appeals to me more than does any other is that of its accessibility. If the Lyndhurst site be ultimately selected, no serious outlay will be required in connexion with railway extension. I frankly confess that that district contains great possibilities for the support of a large and prosperous city. Its mineral resources are great, its agricultural capabilities very considerable. But when I have said that, I have, in my judgment, exhausted all the advantages which it possesses. Coming to the Bombala and Dalgety sites, I say that if there were no consideration affecting their claims other than that of the enormous expenditure which would require to be incurred by Victoria before they could be linked with this State by necessary railway communication, that would be sufficient to prevent them from being seriously considered. The district has very many advantages, which have been justly enumerated by my honorable friend who preceded me. I have to confess that, although I have had a business association with it, I have not inspected the area. But I have means of forming estimates of the character of the country, of its possibilities, of its mineral resources; and I have the knowledge which enables me to arrive at a conclusion that for the proper development of that country an expenditure would have to be incurred which we should not be justified in undertaking at the present time. As I have already indicated, I favour a site which day by day, is growing in favour among honorable members—that is the Tooma site. The visits which have been made to that site have impressed honorable members as to its great natural features. I can speak from personal knowledge, extending over a number of years, of the possibilities of the district. The honorable member for Canobolas attempted to show that the Tooma site were chosen a very large initiatory expenditure would have to be incurred by the State of Victoria. I am prepared to say, as one who hopes to continue to occupy a seat in this House—I can speak on behalf of others who are in the same position—that we should be quite willing for a very long time to come to suffer the inconveniences which would necessarily be entailed in getting the Seat of Government, if it were Tooma, without asking the Victorian Government to incur the expenditure necessary to carry the railway to the river, and to construct a bridge across it. But the extension of the railway from the main line to Sydney from Germanton to the Ga and onwards to the point at which I think the Capital might suitably be located, is a work that would not involve anything like the expenditure which the vivid imagination of my honorable friend has led the Committee to believe. That extension is a work which the New South Wales Government would be abundantly justified in making, because of the country which would be opened up. I do not propose to follow my honorable friend in all his various arguments, figures, and quotations in support of his own site. Nor will I follow him in his remarks with respect to climatic conditions, the fertility of the soil, and the possibilities in other directions. I would simply state what with me was the one guiding factor in pledging my support all the way through, to the area which commences at Albury and runs along the Upper Murray. Honorable members are aware that Albury dropped out of consideration in practically the first vote at the time when the sites were balloted upon. Tumut then succeeded, as I trust the district will succeed again, in securing the support of honorable members. I have supported that district for this reason: There is no other part of Australia where the Capital could be placed in a reasonably accessible position at the foot of a range of mountains that forms one of the finest natural features almost in the world. The site is practically at the foot of Mount Kosciusko and the magnificent ranges that make a background to the district. The climate is not so cold as to be other than agreeably and healthily bracing. We want, as one of the essential conditions of any centre of future population, a permanent and enduring supply of water, fed if possible from snow-capped mountains. There is no other part of Australia where those conditions exist, except on the western side of the Great Dividing Range of which Mount Kosciusko is the prominent feature. Of course, my honorable friends who support the Bombala and Dalgety sites will remind us that the Monaro district also has great natural features. But I have shown that the insuperable objection to it is the enormous initial expense which would be necessary, apart from other objections, to which I shall presently refer. Another consideration influences me, and it is this—that every capital city in the world is placed beside a stream leading to the sea. It may be said that although the waters of the Upper Murray are permanent they are not, at the present time, very considerable in volume. But we have seen in other parts of the civilized world what has been done in the direction of the enlargement of rivers by weiring, and by various other methods known to engineers. The Murray at this site has possibilities of extension, because of the waters which can be successfully diverted into it from other sources, which we cannot at present adequately calculate. I, therefore, say that we have an opportunity of placing our Capital, and we expect that it will become a magnificent city, right beside this great and isolated national feature of Australia—the high permanently snow-capped Mount Kosciusko. In this district there is also a river which connects directly with the ocean, and it has the further advantage that in the case of the approach of an enemy it would have the protection of a range of mountains. I am prepared to admit, with the honorable member who preceded me, that the latter advantage is possessed equally by Lyndhurst; but for resisting an aggressive attack, I say that Tooma is more advantageously situated. The main points which I urge are the great natural features I have described, including a river to the sea, and a fertility of soil which cannot be denied by any one possessing knowledge of the country. These are magnificent advantages which cannot be claimed for any other site which has been named. But I have been forced, very much against my will, to consider the merits and demerits of the various sites. As I have said, I had earnestly hoped that ordinary common sense would prevail, and that this question would be deferred until there was some justification for its immediate settlement. The debate has revealed a great diversity of opinion, and honorable members have advocated various sites with a political bias, which, no doubt, is unconscious; I do not suggest, for one moment, that that bias has been knowingly allowed to prevail. It is a great misfortune that a Royal Commission, comprising a Judge of the High Court of Australia, and perhaps also a Judge of the Supreme Court of New South Wales—an independent body—has not been appointed to take into consideration the opinions expressed in this House, the evidence supplied in the various reports presented to us, and also evidence which they might have collected independently. Such a Commission might have been allowed to practically decide the question. I am perfectly aware that the Constitution provides that this Parliament shall select the Seat of Government, which in the meantime must remain in Melbourne. But the Constitution could have been complied with by the appointment of such a Commission as I have suggested. If the choice had been limited to the three districts mentioned during the discussion, I am quite sure that the choice of an independent Commission would have removed all the heart-burnings which I am afraid may be felt by honorable members who have so strongly advocated certain sites. To my mind, such a course afforded the only possibility of a satisfactory solution of this question which naturally arouses local jealousies, and may disturb the good feeling we all desire to see between honorable members, not only of this House, but of another Chamber. Indeed, I go further, and regret that we have not adopted the Canadian method. It will be remembered that the choice of the site of the Canadian Capital was left to Queen Victoria; and, in my opinion, it would have been a wise course to have supplied the King with the necessary information, and asked him to name the place.

The CHAIRMAN.—It has already been decided that this Parliament shall select the Capital site.

Mr. KNOX.—I am merely pointing out that in my opinion the adoption of such a course as I suggest might have removed a possible cause of great conflict of opinion amongst members of both Houses. It would then have been felt that a disinterested person or persons had made a choice, with a desire to preserve the interests of all the States concerned. Notwithstanding that it has been decided that this House must make the choice, to me it is a matter of regret that this other course has not been adopted; and the debate which has taken place has only strengthened the view I hold. I only rose to express my opinion, based on an anxious appreciation of the heavy responsibility which rests on every honorable member to avoid burdening the community with enormous expenditure. The effects of the choice we make will be felt by succeeding generations; and, with reasonable delay, the spirit of the compact with New South Wales might have been faithfully carried out. In expressing those opinions, I feel that I am only doing my duty, not only to the electors I have the honour to represent, but to the State of Victoria, with which I have been associated since my boyhood. For the reasons which I have given, I think our wisest selection would be the site the great natural advantages of which I have placed before honorable members. May I say one other word on the question of delay. During the debate it has been made clear that many honorable members have altered the views which they previously held as to the comparative advantages of the various sites. The supporters of the Lyndhurst district, for example, are now concentrating the whole of their efforts on the one site at Lyndhurst, although, as a matter of fact, we know that when a vote was last taken on the question Lyndhurst occupied but a moderate place, even in the opinion of those who believed that it was in the best district. Honorable members are aware that we have been forced back from Tumut to Tooma. Further inquiry, and riper knowledge have led us to believe that on the Murray, and nearer to the great range to which I have referred, there is a site to be found possessing greater advantages even than Tumut.

Mr. BROWN.—We are asked to take Tooma largely on trust.

Mr. KNOX.—I shall come to that. Then again, honorable members who have said that there is no site which approaches that of Bombala are now as eagerly, eloquently, and as warmly advocating the claims of Dalgety. In view of the changes of opinion which have taken place, can we now say that further consideration of the question and full information would not enable us to make a better selection than we are likely to make at this time? I say that from the New South Wales standpoint, if that be the consideration of any great weight, honorable members representing that State are throwing away the best site it possesses, which is at Captain's Flat, Lake George. We should there, at Jervis Bay, have a harbor worth speaking about. I know the district well, and can speak from my knowledge of it. That harbor at Eden is but an open roadstead yet it has been urged as one of the main weights in the claims of the Bombala district. It is a farce to ask honorable members who know the place to believe that a useful harbor could be provided at Twofold Bay, without an enormous expenditure of money. I feel that as a member of the Committee I am expected to inform myself of the advantages of the various sites. I believe that Tooma possesses all the qualifications which would make it a great city in the future. I invite honorable members to consider that there is still much to be adjusted, and much work to be overtaken in connexion with the establishment of the Commonwealth Government. Many years have yet to come and go before we shall have succeeded in getting the Commonwealth Government into proper working order, and before the States will have adjusted themselves to the new conditions of Federation. Yet while all this work is still in hand, or going on, we are asked to undertake the enormous expenditure in connexion with the Federal Capital.

Mr. KELLY.—The least expensive site shown to be Lyndhurst.

Mr. KNOX.—I have shown that that site has many disadvantages. I have admitted that, if accessibility is to be considered, it has a great advantage, but have not dealt with the water supply at that site. A memorandum on the subject of the water supply at Lyndhurst has the last moment been circulated among honorable members. I cannot pretend to dispute what is contained in that memorandum, from the knowledge of the d riety which I have gained from my visits to Lyndhurst. I must say, however, that they have been most unfortunate, in that I have never seen any indications of the large water supply which is referred to in the memorandum of which I speak. I cannot put my opinion on this subject against the report of a responsible officer, who pledges his reputation, and his position, on the statements he makes to this Parliament. I say, however, that if it were only to convince one doubtful voter, an opportunity should be afforded to supply the information necessary.

Mr. ROBINSON.—We should have another jaunt.

Mr. KNOX.—I have held that it was desirable that honorable members should personally satisfy themselves in regard to this question. I wish that every honorable member had visited the various sites, to inform himself with regard to them. I think there has been adequate justification for the visits of inspection which have been made. As the result of those visits, many honorable members have come back with the belief that there is no place like Tooma.

Mr. LIDDELL.—No.

Mr. KNOX.—I am not aware that the honorable member for Hunter has visited Tooma. I think that any honorable member who has seen the district must be convinced that it possesses overwhelming advantages, as compared with the other sites which have been suggested. I have but the one complaint to make, and it is that the Government are too precipitate in expecting a vote to be taken on this question on Tuesday next. We have not the full information in connexion with Tooma, with which we have been supplied in connexion with all the other sites. In its absence there are honorable members who will vote against that site, and I think that they should be given an opportunity of personal investigation, when I am sure they would recognise that it possesses greater advantages than any other site which has been suggested. I desire only to indicate my first preference, and the reasons for it. I earnestly hope that when the ballot is taken, honorable members' votes will not be influenced by provincial considerations. Although the site whose selection I advocate borders on the State of Victoria, I shall vote for it, not for that reason, but because, in my opinion, it is the site most worthy to be the future Capital of the Australian Commonwealth.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I wish to say a word or two upon this question, the settlement of which is to crown the Federal edifice, and to give this Parliament a permanent abiding place. I intend to put forward one or two considerations to which reference has not been made by those who have preceded me. Each of the State capitals—Sydney, Melbourne, Adelaide, Brisbane, and Perth—has been excluded, it may be because of their mutual jealousy, from the possibility of being selected as the Capital of Australia. But the Attorney-General of the late Government, speaking before Federation was consummated, pointed out that the land comprising the site of the Commonwealth Capital would be held on an entirely different basis from the tenure of the land on which the capitals of the States are built, because its unearned increment would remain the property of the people of Australia for all time. It is that consideration which I wish to put before the Committee, and, I think, it should influence us in deciding which site to vote for. In considering how the largest unearned increment can be obtained for the benefit of the people of the Commonwealth, as against private speculators, the question of railway communication must be taken into consideration. It is, undoubtedly, the fact that the presence of railway communication largely promotes the development of a district. The railways which run so close to the Lyndhurst site have obviously assisted to develop that district, and the honorable member for Canobolas pointed out that no less than 5,000,000 bushels of wheat were last year grown there. But the fact that that district is so greatly developed, and has such a large production, is not necessarily a reason for selecting it. There may be other sites whose natural productiveness may make them capable of similar development, and if we select one of them for a site, and make a railway to it, we shall bring that development to pass, and largely increase the present value of its lands. The question of centrality is to be considered without reference to present railway communication, and the fact that a proposed site does not now enjoy railway communication, and that if it be chosen for the Seat of Government we shall have to make a railway to it, should not frighten us, if it be otherwise suitable. It has been pointed out that the Lyndhurst site is nearer to Queensland than are the other sites. No doubt it would be of advantage to the representatives of that State if that site were selected, because they could reach Brisbane in one day's travelling, whereas it takes them two days to get to Brisbane from Melbourne, and would take two days to travel there from any of the other proposed sites. But that is not an argument for or against the selection of the Lyndhurst site. The question is, which is the best site for the great nation which is to inhabit Australia in the future? The honorable member for Canobolas made a great point of the fact that last year Lyndhurst produced 5,000,000 bushels of wheat, while in the Dalgety district only about 93,000 bushels were grown. In my opinion those facts should induce us to select Dalgety, because unquestionably when the grazing land there, on which are now depastured sheep and cattle, is put under cultivation, the Dalgety district will grow as much wheat as the Lyndhurst district now produces, and the unearned increment obtained by the Commonwealth will be larger if Dalgety is selected than it will be if Lyndhurst is chosen. We shall do well to select either Welaregang or Dalgety. I believe that we should be as safe against foreign invasion at either of the sites I have named, as at Lyndhurst. If we consider the respective merits of the sites in a broad spirit, and ignore parochial considerations, we shall select the locality which is capable of the greatest improvement. I intend to vote for Dalgety, in the first place, and Welaregang will be my second choice.

Mr. LIDDELL (Hunter).—In view of the thorough manner in which this question has been threshed out, I shall not detain the Committee at any length. I regret that we should have occupied so much time in deciding the question. I admit that it is a very important one, and that we should deal with it very carefully, because we are legislating, not for to-day, or to-morrow, but for the centuries to come. I do not regard with any satisfaction the arrangement under which the 100-miles limit was imposed. I cannot say that I am particularly in favour of any one site over the others. I should have preferred to see the Capital located at Sydney, which is undoubtedly the front door—the portal of Australia. When the Panama Canal is constructed, Sydney will, beyond question, become the first port of call in Australia for all vessels coming from the other side of the world. It has been argued that Melbourne is a more desirable place than Sydney, for the Seat of Government; but do not share that view. Whether it is due to the effects of the Tariff, or if Sydney is progressing by leaps and bounds, whilst Melbourne is receding from the proud place that it formerly occupied as the most prosperous city in Australia. In connexion with this question, honorable members might have directed their attention to the Hunter River valley, which I believe will in the near future become the work-shop of Australia.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the honorable member suggest a work-shop as the site of the Federal Capital?

Mr. LIDDELL.—Yes, because it is the great centres of industry that the new brains are to be found. Whilst I agree with other honorable members who have spoken, that we should approach this matter in a Federal spirit, I cannot ignore the fact that it is really a provincial matter. New South Wales entered the Federal Union on the condition that the Capital should be established within her territory. I do not think that that was a wise arrangement because I believe that if New South Wales had stood out a little longer, Sydney would have been chosen as the Seat of Government. However, as matters stand, we are called upon to select a site within New South Wales, beyond the 100-miles limit from Sydney. I cannot understand why so much favour has been shown towards the sites close to the Victorian border, and it is a matter for regret that some honorable members should have so earnestly "barracked" for the areas which happen to be within their electorates. I do not regard the proposed sites as possessing any great natural advantages. We know that all our great cities have grown up near good harbors. It has been said that Twofold Bay would make an excellent harbor, but we should have to spend many millions before we could render it capable of accommodating the large ships which now carry our commerce over-sea. Of the sites which have been suggested, I think that Lyndhurst has by far the best claims for consideration. It is unquestionably more accessible than any of the other sites, because railway communication is already established between it and the New South Wales metropolis; whereas in the case of Tumut and Bombala enormous sums would have to be spent before the places could be connected with the railway systems. There is no finer climate in Australia than that of Lyndhurst. I was brought up there, and I am thankful for it, because I am satisfied that the good health I enjoy to-day is due to the fact that I lived for many years in that locality. I am sorry that the Victorian and New South Wales press should have scoffed at those honorable members who have visited the sites, and have spoken of their engaging in picnic excursions, and strewing the track with whisky bottles. Such comments are unworthy of a sober press. I regard it as the duty of every honorable member to visit the proposed sites, and, as far as possible, judge for himself as to their respective claims. The honorable member for Hume merits our reproaches for having at the eleventh hour asked us to leave our comfortable homes, in Melbourne and elsewhere, and face the icy blasts which blow over Tooma. Twenty honorable members accompanied him upon the recent visit of inspection, and they required to be of Spartan mould, to visit Tooma in the depth of winter. I went to Bombala, and I saw that the churches had chimneys in place of steeples. I asked one man where he lived, and he said, "You cannot see my homestead, it is over there in the creek." I asked him why he had built his house in such a place. He said, "It is very cold here, and the wind sweeps very strongly over the higher land, and, therefore, we build our houses in the sheltered hollows." I found that many of the public buildings were propped up with huge beams, whilst the few trees to be seen were all leaning in the one direction. These features were quite sufficient to indicate to me that heavy winds sweep over the country.

Mr. FRAZER.—Are those winds as bad as the dust-storms at Lyndhurst?

Mr. LIDDELL.—They have no dust-storms at Lyndhurst. In connexion with the treatment of consumption, it is well-known—and I speak with a certain amount of authority—that it is essential to remove patients from localities where they suffer from the deleterious effects of dust and dust-storms, and that one of the best places in New South Wales to which they can be sent is the Orange district. I think that one of the most positive proofs which can be advanced that dust storms are not prevalent at Lyndhurst. Instead of dust-covered plains, we find acres of smiling farms and homesteads there. The district is a settled and happy one, despite the fact that it is far removed from the coast line.

It has grown by its own unaided efforts. But what do we find at Bombala? A desolate country, which is covered with stones and boulders, and which is capable of carrying perhaps one sheep to the acre. When honorable members visited it did they see any fine rosy-cheeked children there? No; the whole place was a dreary desert. I should be sorry indeed to condemn the future members of this Parliament to eke out an existence in a country like that. From what I saw at Bombala, and of its arid waste plains, it would be impossible to obtain building material there. At Lyndhurst, on the contrary, there is basalt and marble. Indeed, I believe that the marble man was discovered in that country.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think there is basalt about Bombala, too.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I saw nothing of it. The report of the Capital Sites Commission also states that very little building material is to be obtained in that neighbourhood. Moreover, Lyndhurst is very accessible, whereas Tumut and Bombala are quite the reverse. I believe that the right honorable member for Swan, and the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, recently made a pilgrimage to the Bombala district, as the result of which they declared that it would be almost impossible to join Melbourne with that locality by rail, on account of the large expenditure that would be necessary.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not say so.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I believe that a bigger outlay would be required to build a railway to Bombala than would be absorbed in the construction of the Transcontinental line. I sincerely hope that the Committee will not be led away by the partisanship which has been exhibited during the course of this debate. I believe that the Lyndhurst site, though it has been least boomed, is absolutely the best. The people of New South Wales are particularly anxious that this question shall be settled without delay. No doubt it would have been decided by the last Parliament had a strong Government been in power. If the members composing that Ministry had been the men we credited them with being they would have made it the subject of a Government measure, and would thus have arrived at some finality. I should like to see the Labour Ministry take the matter up in that way and settle it. I can assure them that if the right honorable member for East Sydney becomes Prime Minister, it will be very promptly determined. His Ministry will do the proper thing. They will recommend a site, and will stand or fall by their recommendation. That is what the people of New South Wales would admire and applaud.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON (Capricornia).—I rise to speak upon this important question from a perfectly impartial stand-point, inasmuch as I have no electors to please or displease, and, therefore, have no political axe to grind. I disagree with those advocates of the Lyndhurst site who affirm that in declaring that the Federal Capital should not be located within 100 miles of Sydney, the Conference of Premiers responsible for the limitation, intended that the Seat of Government should be established as near to that limit as possible. In my opinion, no such idea was present in their minds. They merely intended to provide that the Federal Capital should not be within 100 miles of Sydney. I believe they desired that the determination of what was the most suitable territory in which to locate the Seat of Government should be left to this Parliament. If the representatives of New South Wales desire to settle this question without any further delay they can easily do so by agreeing to the selection of the Bombala district, which is the territory that has been chosen by the Senate. I claim that it would be difficult to find better land than exists in the Bombala district. Its great drawback is that it is not connected by railway communication. There we find beautiful streams of water, and undulating country, interspersed with occasional belts of trees. I have seen no finer stock than is to be found there, in any part of New South Wales. Although the weather is usually cold, the climate of Bombala is quite equal to that which obtains in any other district. There is certainly a disadvantage in connexion with the water scheme of Bombala. The water would have to be pumped to convey it to the Federal Capital. But to obtain an excellent water supply, we have only to go to Dalgety. There the Snowy River flows through the site, which is sheltered by the mountains from the westerly winds. I do not want to pit the Dalgety country against other districts. I admit that the land is poor as far as quality is concerned. It is principally granite boulder country. There is very little basalt. If we took a large area probably it would include some basalt country, there would be none within a limit of miles square. I do not, however, attach much importance to the quality of the land. It has been proved that by means of scientific manuring poor land can be put to good uses. There is land in Victoria formerly returned only three bags to the acre, but which now, in consequence of scientific manuring, is yielding seven to the acre. Therefore, I do not attach much importance to the land at Dalgety being inferior, and there are other considerations which make the site very desirable. There is water in sufficient quantities to supply a city very much larger than we shall have for many years to come. There is enough water to give us electric power. With respect to railway communication, Dalgety, there would be thirty miles line to construct. That is not a very large undertaking. In connexion with the Lyndhurst site, we hear of the possibility of connecting Werris Creek with Wellington and running a railway on to Western Australia. As compared with schemes of that kind, the thirty miles of line that would have to be built to Dalgety, would be a trifling scheme. The honorable member for Moira speaks of the Dalgety country as being too cold for his horses. But any person who knows anything about stock will be aware that horses that have been fed in the Riverina country would necessarily suffer on being taken to a cold climate 2,000 feet above the sea-level. Therefore, there is not much in that point. I do not think I have seen finer cattle anywhere than I saw there. The sheep also were excellent. It seemed to me to be good stock country, though I do not attach much importance to that from the point of view of establishing a Federal Capital.

Mr. LIDDELL.—They were very good horses that we had in our coaches.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—They were not grass-fed station horses. There are just as good horses on the stations in the Bombala district as are to be found in any part of Australia. They do not go to draught horses there. Coming to Toowoomba on the western side of the mountain, I do not think there is finer country in Australia than can be found there along the flats of the Murray, and also along the creeks leading into the main river. I have not seen finer land anywhere for grass or agricultural purposes. The cattle also look well. We have heard something about sheep records to-night. Some of the Upper Murray residents told me that they knew of land that was carrying seventeen sheep to the acre. That statement was too much for me. I flatly said that I did not believe it. But to-night the honorable member for Canobolas assured us that land to which he referred carried seventy-five sheep to the acre. The statement of the Tooma residents was mild compared with his.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That was on irrigated land.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON. — Fancy, 75,000 sheep on 1,000 acres of land! I profess to know something about sheep and stock, and I venture to say that 75,000 sheep on 1,000 acres of land would trample down the grass in one night. You cannot make grass grow above the sheeps' heads. It does not matter whether the land was irrigated or not, the sheep would trample down the grass.

Mr. BROWN.—The sheep were not fed on the land, but were fed off it.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—That is quite another thing. I am speaking of running sheep on to land. When I was told of land carrying seventeen sheep to the acre I said that I did not believe the statement, although some of my colleagues thought I was rather sceptical. I have never seen a finer site than that at Welaregang. Probably there is not a grander view in Australia. You see the snow-capped mountains running from Kiandra to the Bogongs in Victoria, and standing above them all is Kosciusko with its pyramid of snow. The climate is not too cold. I do not know what it may be like in summer, but when we were there in winter it was beautiful.

Mr. LIDDELL.—Are there no blizzards?

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—We experienced none. You see on your right the beautiful crystal streams of the Tooma and the Murray trickling away on their course to the sea. I admit that if we intend to have an area of 900 square miles, we cannot get that extent of good land at Tooma. We can get it at Dalgety or Bombala. But if we are content with ten miles square, there is not a finer site obtainable than that of Tooma. The only objection to it appears to be that it is too near to Victoria. That is the whole cry of the New South Wales people. But that consideration has nothing to do with us. We need not care whether it is near Victoria or not. We have to decide which is the most suitable site for the benefit of the people of Australia. We are not deciding for ourselves, but for posterity; and if we choose the worst site, posterity will curse us for what we have done. As to its being inaccessible from the point of view of railway construction, I would remind honorable members that some years ago there were many situations which were inaccessible from a railway point of view. The railway over the Blue Mountains from Penrith to Glenbrook, had to go by means of the zig-zag. But that has been largely overcome, and to-day the engineers have the plans of a line to go straight to Lithgow, without using the zig-zag at all. In these days of engineering advance, difficulties of that kind are more easily overcome than was the case in former years. The honorable and learned member for Werriwa, to whose opinion some credit has been attached, because he is a practical surveyor, spoke of the difficulties of the country. But, as a matter of fact, he took no levels, and his opinion is worth no more than mine. We must remember that in constructing railways, engineers do not go over mountains if they can help it. They follow the course of the creeks. That is always done in making roads and railways in any part of Australia. I happen to know something about Lyndhurst, because I lived in the neighbourhood for a considerable time. I have also read a great deal about the suggested site there. A picture book has been circulated amongst honorable members, in order to show them the beauties of the site. But half of the pictures in the book do not pertain to Lyndhurst at all. They have printed pictures of the Wentworth falls, and the Katoomba falls, and they have had to go up to Pera, across the Darling, to find a picture of an artesian bore.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Did the honorable member ever see any dust in that country?

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—As to the water scheme, I know the Lachlan from one end to the other, and at numerous places I have stepped across it in normal seasons, while in years like 1883 and 1884 no water is to be seen. If water does flow down the Lachlan at such times it is underground, like some of the engineering of which we have heard in connexion with this question. I do not know the exact proposed site, and, therefore, I do not question the engineer's figures. While it may be rough country for prospecting, I believe that a large water catchment could be made by building dams; but my experience of dams is that wherever they are built the water becomes objectionable to use. At the source of the water supply in Brisbane the water is full of weeds in the summer season, and the wild birds deposit foul matter in it.

Mr. FULLER.—What about the Prospect Dam?

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—The Nepean, which supplies the dam, is always running, and that makes a difference. Rockhampton, too, has a stagnant water supply; and we should have the same experience if a dam were constructed at Mt. McDonald. There is the Carcoar "sewer," as it is called, which runs through the town right up to the proposed Capital site. In the picture-book which we have seen, a weir, built by one of the mining companies, is shown with the water pouring over it; but that place is something like the Coombing Falls—when you go there no water is to be seen. As to the climate, I think that of Lyndhurst is as good as that of any other area. The Minister of Home Affairs asked about dust; but my experience is that there is no place in Australia where dust is not to be found. Wherever we find auriferous country and mining we have poor country.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—What about Ballarat?

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—I admit that Ballarat is an exception, but it is mostly deep sinking at that place.

Mr. KELLY.—It was alluvial at one time.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—It is alluvial now. At Canowindra, and round about there, we find good country, but that is thirty or forty miles away from this proposed site. At Orange there is good country, too; but if Lyndhurst be chosen, Orange is out of the question. It is said that a railway will have to be made from Werris Creek to Brisbane. This is held out as a bait to Queensland; but I do not think that it is at all likely that the New South Wales Government would build a railway which would divert the traffic from Sydney.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That railway has been submitted to the Public Works Committee.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Many works have been before that Committee; indeed the honorable member was recently twitting the honorable member for Hume about the many proposals he has submitted to that body. Honorable members who talk about the cost of thirty-one miles of railway to Bombala or Tumut, say nothing about the cost of the railway from Werris Creek to Wellington.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That railway would be wanted if the Tooma site were selected.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—But it would then open up much better country than there is about Lyndhurst.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—There is very limited area of good country near Tooma.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—I am only speaking of the country which I know, and there are large areas which I have not seen but which I am informed comprise splendid land. Then I do not think that it is at all likely that the New South Wales Government will build a line from Cobargo to Wilcannia and Broken Hill.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That line has been passed by the Public Works Committee, and has been constructed as far as Cobargo.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—But the New South Wales Government will not extend it to Mount Hope or to Louth; it will not take a line through mallee or salt. I am a Queenslander, but I shall not vote for a site, the selection of which would prove a national calamity, and I say so with a full knowledge of every inch of the country. It is poor, miserable country where the only object that can be shown is Mount Macquarie in the distance. Whatever site may be chosen, I hope it will be Lyndhurst.

Mr. R. EDWARDS (Oxley).—I am aware that this debate must close to-night, and, therefore, I shall occupy only a few minutes. I do not desire to give a silent vote, because I regard this question as one of great importance to the Commonwealth. The sooner it is settled the better it will be for the Federal Parliament and the community generally. Much time was occupied in the discussion of this matter during last session, with a strong feeling was manifested, particularly as between the representatives of New South Wales and Victoria. I hope that on the present occasion none of that feeling will be evinced, though I am afraid that the result of the present discussion will be very much the same as it was then. It appears to me that some of the Victorian members would like to delay the settlement of the question as long as possible, or, failing that, to have the Capital city on the Victorian border. That has evidently been the object aimed at by the Victorian members in both sessions. The 100-miles limit was arrived at as a compromise, because there was an unwillingness in both of the States to have the Capital at either Melbourne or Sydney. In agreeing to that compromise, I am sure that no member of the Premiers' Convention thought for a moment that it was of such a nature as to lead to the establishment of the Federal Capital on the Victorian border. The meaning of it was that the Federal Capital should be established within a reasonable distance of the 100-miles limit from Sydney.

Mr. FRAZER.—How can the honorable member say that?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I am perfectly satisfied that that was the intention, and it never could have been contemplated that the Capital would be established on the banks of the Murray, or the Snowy River, or on the Australian Alps.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Or at Lyndhurst.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Lyndhurst is the proper place for it. I may say that when the question was last before us for settlement, I voted in the first instance for Armidale, and I very much regret that Armidale is not to-day in the running.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—More provincialism.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Armidale would be a most suitable place for the Federal Capital. I expect to be able to convince the honorable member for Capricornia presently, and on Tuesday next I shall certainly claim his vote for Lyndhurst. I voted for that site when the question was last before this Parliament. The speech delivered by the honorable member for Macquarie, in which that honorable member dwelt upon the many advantages which Lyndhurst possesses over all the other sites, and Mr. Wade's report, have confirmed me in the conviction that Lyndhurst is the proper place for the Federal Capital. There are two qualifications which should be specially considered in coming to a decision with regard to the Federal Capital site—the climatic conditions, and the possession of an abundant supply of good and wholesome water. If there is one consideration of more importance than another in the establishment of a city, great or small, it is that there shall be an abundance of pure water available at all times. In my opinion it has been proved beyond doubt that the district of Lyndhurst possesses such a supply. It has a further advantage in possessing good soil, as was proved to-night by the honorable member for Canobolas from the figures he quoted, showing a production of wheat, maize, and oats greater than that of Rom-bala, Dalgety, Tumut, or any of the other areas.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member was not satisfied with generalities; he gave actual quantities.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The honorable member gave quantities, details, and figures for every statement he made. He gave proof beyond the possibility of dispute. I am aware that many members of the Committee are not prepared to entertain the idea of any site north of Sydney; but I still say that it would be wise to establish the Federal Capital north of Sydney. Mr. Sawers, then member for New England, placed before this Parliament some very interesting figures, which went to prove that the population of Australia forty years hence will be much greater north than south of Sydney. It would, perhaps, not be out of place if I were to refresh the memories of honorable members with respect to those figures. Mr. Sawers said—

If honorable members draw an imaginary line from a few miles south of Sydney, due west, I venture to predict that in 100 years' time the area of New South Wales north of that particular line and Queensland will contain at least three-fourths of the population of the Commonwealth. That opinion is based not merely upon my own knowledge of the magnificent area in northern New South Wales, and my profound belief in the great future before the State of Queensland, but is backed up by a report presented by a Committee of Statisticians to the Federal Convention on the question of the trend of population. The members of the Committee were unbiased, and their opinions may surely be regarded with some respect. I admit that what they predicted is not likely to happen quite as rapidly as they believed, because they did not take into account the possibility that such an overwhelming and disastrous drought as Australia has passed through recently would seriously retard settlement for a time. What was the opinion of those gentlemen? They reported that in a period of thirty-eight years from the date of their report the population of Australia would be as follows:—New South Wales, 8,000,000; Queensland, 7,500,000; Victoria, 4,000,000; and South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania combined, 2,500,000.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Sheep?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—No; white people who I hope will be in Australia at that time. Mr. Sawers went on to say—

I allow a few more years, and I say those gentlemen contemplated that within fifty years the portion of New South Wales north of the line I ask honorable members to draw in imagination, from a little south of Sydney to Broken Hill, and Queensland would contain fully two-thirds of the population of the Commonwealth. If that is a fair estimate, it is shown that the great State of Queensland will within fifty years have double the population of Victoria. Although honorable members representing Victoria may think Melbourne at present the hub of Australia—and they always do—and that their convenience is of paramount importance, I conceive it to be an unanswerable argument that the trend of population will inevitably be northwards; and that Queensland within little more than a generation will contain double the population of the great and thriving State of Victoria. To go further, though honorable members may say that one is romancing, and is looking a little too far ahead, I believe that within 100 years three-fourths of the population of Australia will be found in the north of New South Wales and in Queensland.

There can be no doubt that the trend of population is to the north.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It has been west during the last year or two.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—It has from Victoria. I am aware that Victoria has lost a large portion of her population, and that many Victorians have settled in Western Australia, but some, I am afraid, have disappeared altogether.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That does not decrease the northern population.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Quite so. The bulk of the population of the Commonwealth will, in the future, be north of Sydney, and we have a right to consider what is likely to be the position of the Commonwealth in this respect. In the interests of the future welfare of the people of the Commonwealth, I shall give a vote for Lyndhurst, and I hope the supporters of that site will be successful this time. Honorable members will probably remember that on the last occasion Lyndhurst was in the last ballot, and if it had not been that honorable members, who had lost Bombala, voted for Tumut, Lyndhurst would have been the site selected, and the whole question would have been settled by this time.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We should have had to get the Senate to agree to Lyndhurst.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—We could, perhaps, have brought some influence to bear upon the Senate to induce honorable senators to agree to the decision of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Honorable members are going in the right way to hang the question.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I have no intention of trying to influence the honorable member for Capricornia, or any of representatives of Queensland. I shall attempt anything of that kind, but I have no hesitation in saying that, in the interest of the large population that will inhabit the immense territory north of Sydney the near future, every representative for Queensland should vote in favour of Lyndhurst. I desire to say that I do not agree with the proposal of the Government that we should demand an area of 900 square miles.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That will be discussed on the next clause.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I cannot see what possible object the Federal Parliament have in deciding that the area of the Federal Territory shall be 900 square miles. In my opinion, 100 square miles would be sufficient, though, if the justification was shown, I should be prepared to consent to the acquisition of an area of 200 square miles. I sincerely hope that the Government of New South Wales will not entertain an application for 900 square miles. Even 100 square miles would be a larger area than that of the district of Columbia in which Washington, the Capital of the United States, is situated. A friend of mine, Captain Russell, who resided in America for some time, and is well acquainted with the country, writing from Brisbane a month or two ago, has given me the following information, which I will read for the benefit of honorable members:—

The capital of the United States is Washington in the district of Columbia. The district of Columbia is situated in latitude 38 degrees 45 minutes north, and longitude 77 degrees west of the border line of the two States—West Virginia and Maryland—and the city of Washington, capital proper, is situated at about the centre of the district. The area of the district of Columbia was originally 100 square miles, but thirty square miles were ceded to Virginia in 1846, thus leaving the present area seventy square miles. The population of the United States in 1846 was 23,000,000, now about 82,000,000.

The Government of the district of Columbia is vested by Act of Congress, approved 11th July 1878, in three Commissioners, two of whom are appointed by the President from citizens of the district, having had three years' residence there immediately preceding their appointment, confirmed by the Senate. The other Commissioner is detailed by the President of the United States from the Corps of Engineers of the United States.

States Army, and must have lineal rank, or be a captain who has served at least fifteen years in the Corps of Engineers of the Army.

The Commissioners appoint the subordinate official service of said Government.

Washington had a municipal government from 1802 to 1871. By an Act approved 21st February, 1871, Congress provided a territorial form of government for the entire district of Columbia, with a governor, secretary, board of public works and council, appointed by the President of the United States, and a House of Delegates, and a delegate in Congress elected by the citizens of the said district.

This form of government was abolished 20th June, 1874, and a temporary government by three Commissioners substituted.

The temporary form of government was succeeded by the present form of government, 1st July, 1878.

Congress makes all laws for the district, but has intrusted to the Commissioners authority to make police regulations, building regulations, plumbing regulations, and other regulations of a municipal nature.

I am very anxious that this question shall be settled, though I fear that the result of its consideration by Parliament will be similar to that which was obtained last session. The honorable member for Koo-yong suggested that it might be decided by a Committee, consisting of Supreme Court Judges, and a Judge of the High Court. No doubt all the information for and against each of the proposed sites has been laid before the Committee, so that every honorable member must be thoroughly aware of their advantages and disadvantages. I would therefore suggest that if we fail to come to a decision next week, a Committee of ten members should be chosen by ballot, six being taken from the House of Representatives, one for each State, and three from the Senate, and that in addition the Prime Minister should act as Chairman. I am aware that the Constitution does not provide for the appointment of such a body, but, judging from the experience of last session, I think that the two Houses are not likely to agree as to a suitable site. I hope, however, that my predictions will not be fulfilled, and that the matter will be satisfactorily settled for all time.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby—Minister of Home Affairs).—I desire to announce that on Tuesday next the first business taken will be the ballot to determine the district in which the Seat of Government shall be located.

Mr. BROWN.—How do the Government propose to fix upon a particular site?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That can be done in Committee, by an amendment on the proposed insertion. It will be very easy to move the insertion of words which will provide that the Seat of Government shall be within so many miles of such and such a place within the district chosen. I thank honorable members for remaining to-night to keep a House, and to enable the discussion to be concluded.

Progress reported.

House adjourned at 11.7 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 9 August, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. CROUCH.—I desire to make a personal explanation. Last week, when the Seat of Government Bill was being discussed, and the honorable member for Hume was speaking, I interjected that a statement had appeared in the Sydney Morning Herald to the effect that the honorable member had said that he preferred Lyndhurst to the southern sites. His reply was that that was not so; but I am now able to read to the House the absolute words of the statement to which I have referred. It occurs in a letter written to the Sydney Morning Herald on the 4th April, 1904, by the Rev. H. D. Seely-Vidal, a Church of England clergyman, residing at Carcoar, in New South Wales, and is as follows:—

Ere going on board the special train at Lyndhurst, when the subject of the possible sites was being discussed, I heard Sir William Lyne distinctly say, in the presence of several others, that he, personally speaking, considered Lyndhurst the most eligible site, but that South Australia, Victoria, and Tasmania would outvote the other States, and keep the site down south. I then spoke to Sir William, and said—"Look here, Sir William, you throw all the weight of your influence on to the side of Lyndhurst, and we will chance South Australia, Victoria, and Tasmania outvoting it."

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have never read the letter from which the honorable and learned member has quoted, nor have I heard it read before; but the statement itself is untrue.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I also desire to make a personal explanation. When on Thursday last I moved a motion affirming the desirability of a re-adjustment of the Tariff, I stated that the total value of some twenty lines of food stuffs produced in Victoria was £12,000,000 per annum, and that the local consumption of these lines was about £1,200,000 per annum. The figures were challenged at the time by the honorable member for Gippsland. As I then explained, I had received them only the night before, so that I had not had time to digest them. On referring to them again, I find that my statement of the total production was correct, but that my statement as to the local consumption was incorrect, because, instead of the line relating to local consumption, I read a line relating to population. I desire to acknowledge and to correct the mistake, so that honorable members may not be misled by my original statement.

PREFERENTIAL TRADE.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I ask the Prime Minister whether his comments upon the suggestion for the holding of an Imperial Conference to consider the question of preferential trade were based on general cable information only, or on some other communication which had reached him. If based only on press statements, they were, I venture to suggest, premature. I ask him whether, in view of the vital importance of the matter to Australia, he considers it desirable to discourage the formulation of an official proposition by the British Government as soon as possible. If the question is officially submitted to him, will he not feel it his duty, before replying, to afford honorable members an opportunity to express their views in regard to it?

Mr. WATSON.—The observations which I made were based upon no other foundation than the ordinary press cables. I was asked by the representative of one of the great English dailies to express an opinion on a suggestion which had been made, and my reply was to the effect that a Conference is hardly necessary at the present time, and that we should await the declaration of the people of Great Britain of their own desires in the matter.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Even before a preliminary discussion?

Mr. WATSON.—I think that the preliminary discussion has already taken place.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not a discussion between Great Britain and her Colonies.

Mr. WATSON.—The Australian Government was represented by Sir Edmund

Barton at an Imperial Conference which carried a resolution approving of preferential trade, and the matter was afterwards put before the electors at the last general elections by the honorable and learned member himself, who was then at the head of the Government. Later on, it was referred to in the Governor-General's speech. I do not suppose that I should be justified in asking if the concurrence of the other leader of the Opposition had been arranged for in this matter; but the fact that no action in regard to it was taken on the Address-Reply practically amounted to an admission that, so far as Australia is concerned, a decision has been arrived at, and the electors generally favour preferential trade. Assuming that to be so, I do not think that any further step can be taken until some tangible proposal is made to us by the Imperial Government. I do not see the value of another Conference because details cannot be arranged upon the principle of preferential trade which has been assented to in Great Britain.

Mr. DEAKIN.—A Conference would prepare the way.

Mr. GLYNN.—This House has not spoken on the subject.

Mr. WATSON.—Australia has pressed her wishes.

Mr. GLYNN.—The opinions of the people of Australia have never been tested in the Chamber.

Mr. WATSON.—The fact that the matter was allowed to go by default is equivalent to a test having been made. Free-trade friends did not test the opinion of members in reference to an alteration of the Tariff; but the feeling of the people was admitted when they allowed it to remain in its present condition.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have already pointed out that when questions are put to the Minister it is only courteous for the House to let him give his own answers to them. I ask honorable members not to attempt to put words into the mouth of the Prime Minister, and to receive without interposing the replies which he pleases to give. I would remind the House that at question time members may only ask direct questions, and Ministers may only reply to them. Questions of policy must not be debated.

Mr. CONROY.—Is it in order for the Prime Minister to express views which many of us think absolutely erroneous?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I understand that question time was instituted to give honorable members an opportunity to ask questions to elicit the views of Ministers, and to give Ministers an opportunity to express their views.

Mr. WATSON.—I was expressing merely my own views; I would not attempt to express those of the honorable and learned member. I have shown how the matter appears to me. In my opinion, we should now wait until a proposal comes from Great Britain.

Mr. DEAKIN.—What I speak of would be a proposal for a Conference.

Mr. WATSON.—If the proposal for a Conference is made to the Government it will have our grave consideration. Hitherto I have dealt only with a suggestion which was not put forward by any one holding office. Although Mr. Chamberlain occupies a very prominent and honoured position in England, he is not at present a responsible Minister. It therefore remains merely a suggestion. If it takes shape, and becomes more than a suggestion, it will, of course, receive every consideration.

MEDICINE CHESTS: PORT DARWIN TELEGRAPH LINE.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Last week I asked the Postmaster-General—

Are medicine chests supplied to the outlying stations on the Port Darwin telegraph line, as was the case when the line was under the control of the South Australian Government? The Minister replied—

Yes, except at Port Darwin and Pine Creek, where medical services can be obtained.

I have excellent authority for believing that that answer is not correct. I am informed that Sir Charles Todd, the Deputy Postmaster-General of South Australia, on the 24th February, 1902, formally notified that supplies of medicine for stations on the overland line were to be discontinued, and that no medicines whatever have been provided by the Federal Government. Mr. Herbert and Mr. Mitchell, the representatives of the Northern Territory in the South Australian House of Assembly, have been in communication with me in regard to this matter. Mr. Herbert writes as follows:—

I have noticed the information elicited by you from the Federal Government to the effect that medicine chests are supplied to outlying stations on the overland telegraph line, as was the custom under the State control. The answer, I fear, has been given under a misapprehension.

I believe I am absolutely correct in saying that the supplies of medicine for the chests referred to were stopped by the Department, and that they have not been since resumed.

If the Minister would like me to give him a specific case of a station not having a chest of medicines provided, I think I can name one—the Powell Creek Station. I desire to know whether the Minister will make further inquiries into the matter.

Mr. MAHON.—I certainly shall make further inquiries. It would appear, from the information furnished by the honorable member, that there has been some misapprehension. When the Department was under State control, the authorities supplied medicines at the outlying stations, and it may be that in the departmental view this duty still rests with the State Government, because it cannot be contended that it is necessary for the proper administration of the Telegraph service that medicines and surgical appliances should be supplied in such cases. They are provided for the convenience and assistance of persons who are travelling, and that being so, I conceive that the matter is entirely within the domain of the State Government.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—But the officers employed at the stations, and also the stations, are under the control of the Federal Government.

Mr. MAHON.—That is so, and to the extent that such officers require medicines or surgical appliances, I presume that the Department will be prepared to supply them; but I am not aware that it is our duty to keep medicines or appliances for the convenience of the travelling public. However, I shall make further inquiries, and furnish the honorable member with any additional information that may be available.

SERVICES RENDERED TO STATES GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether it is a fact, as stated in the Age of Friday last, that the Commonwealth Government is making a claim upon the Victorian Government for £12,000 odd for various services rendered by Post and Telegraph officers; further, whether it is a fact that this claim would not have been made had it not been for some remarks made by the Premier of Victoria. I trust that the Minister will be able to enlighten us upon this point, because it is distinctly stated that the Government are playing a game of tit-for-tat, and that the claim would not have been made but for their resentment of Mr. Bent's criticisms.

Mr. WATSON.—I understand that some claim against the Victorian Government is being prepared by the Post Office authorities, in consideration of services rendered to the State. I am not aware of the details, or the grounds upon which the claim is made, because it has not yet come to me for presentation.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The claim is not being made in a spirit of revenge?

Mr. WATSON.—Certainly not. The relations which have, so far, existed between all the States Governments and this Government have been of the most cordial description. We have had no reason to complain, nor do I think that this Government have given any cause for complaint by the States Governments.

UNIFORM WHARFAGE CHARGES.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I desire to know from the Prime Minister what steps, if any, have been taken with a view to secure uniform wharfage rates in the various States?

Mr. WATSON.—Some little time ago I stated that it was the intention of the Government to take whatever steps were possible to persuade the various States authorities—whether the States Governments or bodies acting under their authority—to so regulate their wharfage charges, and to so harmonize them, that no distinction would be drawn between the produce of any of the States; the idea being, of course, to obviate the necessity for appointing the Inter-State Commission, so far as that aspect of the matter is concerned. Since then my honorable colleague, the Minister of Trade and Customs has, in one or two cases, asked to be relieved of the work of collecting differential rates, as a preliminary to further action being taken by the States Governments themselves. That has occurred in Victoria. My honorable colleague holds that we have no power to collect the differential rates, and I believe that the Victorian Government proposes to take action in the direction of equalizing the charges. I have addressed letters upon the subject to some of the other States Governments. I am not yet aware of the detailed proposals which they intend to carry out; but I am satisfied that there should be no great difficulty in arriving at some arrangement for getting rid of the existing anomalies.

ELECTORAL ACT COMMITTEE

Mr. CONROY.—I wish to ask the Minister of Home Affairs whether, in view of the very serious irregularities that seem to have occurred in the Electoral Department in Sydney, he will take steps to appoint a Royal Commission to pursue the inquiry commenced by the Electoral Act Committee, which seems to be unable to spare the time necessary to attend to the matter. At present, I need not say any more than that the evidence recently taken in Sydney discloses a very serious state of affairs.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not think that the Select Committee are unable to obtain the evidence necessary to enable them to arrive at a conclusion as to whether or not grave irregularities have occurred. I do not regard it as necessary to appoint a Royal Commission, because I consider that the Select Committee will be in a position to inquire fully into the whole question. Evidence in rebuttal of that recently given in Sydney will be presented by the department.

STEAMER SUBSIDY: WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

Mr. KELLY.—I desire to ask the Prime Minister, without notice, whether he will take steps to test the legality of the action of the Western Australian Government in granting a subsidy for a fast steamer service between Geraldton and Perth.

Mr. WATSON.—I have not had time to look into the matter referred to, and therefore, I should like further notice before I am called upon to give an answer. I imagine that the subject is rather an important one.

OBSOLETE FIELD GUNS.

Mr. CARPENTER. — I desire to put before the Prime Minister a question having reference to the offer of certain obsolete field guns, for ornamental purposes, which was recently made to the States Governments. I understand that some of the States Governments have declined to accept the guns upon the conditions laid down in the offer. In view of that fact, and in order that the municipality may be deprived of any gun which it may desire to obtain, will the Government make a similar offer to the municipalities direct?

Mr. WATSON.—I am aware that the Government of Western Australia has intimated that it scarcely cares to accept the responsibility of these obsolete weapons. In some cases—I do not say that my remplies to all—it seems that the guns are so heavy that a fair expenditure would require to be incurred to remove them, and some people do not care to be saddled with 'white elephants' of that description.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Very few of the guns are mounted.

Mr. WATSON.—That is so, and consequently it is necessary to construct carriages or some kind of mounting for them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It cost the municipality of Parramatta £15 to mount their guns.

Mr. WATSON.—It is satisfactory to know that Parramatta could afford to spend that sum in beautifying its public parks.

Mr. CROUCH.—Does that remark apply to any part of Australia, as I have applied for some of the guns for Geelong?

Mr. WATSON.—The Government entertain no objection to allowing any local body or representative institution to obtain these guns so far as their number will permit. My general impression is that the military authorities are very anxious to use the storage room which is at present occupied by these obsolete weapons, and therefore they would be extremely glad to get rid of them.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT BILL.

Mr. REID.—I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether he is prepared to allow of a short suspension of the sitting prior to the ballot being taken in connexion with the Seat of Government Bill. I understand that some of the trains were late to-day—the Sydney express was somewhat behind time—and I believe that one or two honorable members who have come to Melbourne for the express purpose of taking part in the ballot have not yet reached the House. I suppose that there is a disposition upon all sides to allow honorable members who have journeyed here for that purpose an opportunity of recording their votes.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—How long an interval does the right honorable member suggest?

Mr. REID.—I think that a suspension of the sitting until a quarter-past 3 would allow a very fair latitude. I know that one or two honorable members who have come to Melbourne for the purpose of recording their votes have not yet reached the House. They may put in an appearance at any moment, and I am sure that nobody desires them to be shut out from the ballot for the sake of a minute or two. I would therefore suggest that the sitting of the House be suspended until a quarter-past 3 o'clock, if the Prime Minister thinks that is a reasonable proposal.

Mr. WATSON.—I have no objection to meeting the convenience of honorable members in the way suggested; but perhaps some other honorable member might desire a suspension of the sitting for a few minutes longer. If not, at the conclusion of the ordinary business, Mr. Speaker might leave the chair, and resume it at the hour named.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If any delay is to occur in the taking of the ballot, I would suggest that the sitting should be suspended for a little longer period—say till half-past 3 o'clock—because there are several honorable members in the city with whom we cannot communicate.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There are several others who wish to get away.

Mr. WATSON.—I am quite prepared to fall in with the suggestion of the honorable member for Hume.

Mr. SPEAKER.—In accordance with the arrangement which has been arrived at, I shall leave the chair after questions have been answered until half-past 3 o'clock.

NEW SOUTH WALES VOLUNTEER REGIMENTS.

Mr. FULLER asked the Minister representing the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

What was the establishment, strength, and percentage of efficient of each of the following Volunteer Regiments in New South Wales on the 30th June, 1904 :—

1st Scottish Rifles; Australian Rifles;
St. George's Rifles;
Australian Irish Rifles?

Mr. WATSON.—The following is the information asked for by the honorable and learned member :—

Regiment.	Establishment as per Estimates.	Strength.	Number of Efficient.	Percentage of Efficient to Strength.
1st Regiment, New South Wales
Scottish Rifles...	509	460	352	76.52
Australian Rifle Regiment ...	509	450	353	78.44
St. George's English Rifle Regiment ...	509	452	319	70.57
New South Wales Irish Rifle Regiment ...	509	436	398	91.28

PAPER.

Mr. BATCHELOR laid upon the table the following paper:—

Further report by Mr. Surveyor Chesterman on the proposed Federal Capital site at Tooma.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT BILL.

The order of the day for a ballot to determine the district within which the Seat of Government should be situated having been read,

Mr. SPEAKER.—When a similar ballot was taken last year some rules for the conduct of the ballot were prepared and followed, and I propose, with the approval of the House, that these rules shall again be observed.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. REID.—I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the signature of an honorable member is essential?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Absolutely.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Are honorable members to understand that they must place a cross opposite the area for which they desire to vote?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Honorable members, of course, may make only one cross and that must be placed opposite the one of the three areas for which they vote.

The House then proceeded to the first ballot.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The votes were cast in the first ballot as follows:—

Southern District	21
South-Eastern District	22
Western District	25

The second ballot having been taken,

Mr. SPEAKER.—The votes were cast in the second ballot as follows:—

South-Eastern District	39
Western District	28

* This district was not in the second ballot.

NOTE.—The figures appearing opposite name of each member indicate the district which he voted.

In Committee:

Clause 2—

It is hereby determined that the Seat of Government of the Commonwealth shall be at that portion of New South Wales bounded as orth by a direct line running from the town of Pambula to the town of Cooma, thence due west to the border of the State of Victoria, and within fifty miles of Bombala, in the State of New South Wales.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby—Minister of Home Affairs).—The ballot which has just been taken leaves the wording of the clause now under consideration very much as it stands. The Government have stated throughout the discussion that it was their intention to narrow down the locality to much more restrictive limits than a radius of fifty miles. A radius of fifty miles would include two or three sites which have been suggested. But the important sites in the South-Eastern District are Bombala and Dalgety. I understand that the majority of honorable members who voted for a site in the South-Eastern District are in favour of the Dalgety site. In order that we may obtain an expression of opinion which will be more definite than the clause at present contains, I think that it would be better for me to move the omission of all the words from "within" to "Bombala," with a view of inserting the words "twenty-five miles from Dalgety." The radius would give us a sufficient margin to enable the best site within that district to be selected. It would exclude Bombala and a number of towns which, it is generally agreed, it would not be desirable to select. If the course which I suggest is adopted, it will be understood as an instruction to the Government to obtain a site within a reasonable distance of Dalgety. That, I believe, is what is generally desired. I therefore move—

That the following words be left out:—"that portion of New South Wales bounded on the north by a direct line running from the town of Pambula to the town of Cooma, thence due west to the border of the State of Victoria, and within fifty miles of Bombala."

Mr. HUME COOK (Bourke).—I wish to obtain a somewhat clearer explanation of what the amendment means than I have been able to gather from the statement of the Minister. Does the amendment mean that when the area is selected any possibility of obtaining a port within the Federal Territory will be excluded; or does it mean that we are choosing the actual Seat of Government, reserving the right at a later stage to take in a port with the territory? It is due to the Committee that honorable members should know exactly what is meant and how far the proposal goes.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The territory is dealt with in the next clause. The purpose of the clause under consideration simply is to determine the locality of the Seat of Government.

Mr. HUME COOK.—That only?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Yes, that only. The question of the territory to be chosen will be considered in connexion with clause 3.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro).—I would suggest to the Minister of Home Affairs that the better way to amend the clause in order to attain the object in view is first to settle which site is the more favoured by the Committee, Bombala or Dalgety. We should take a vote in order to elicit an expression of opinion as between Bombala and Dalgety. If the proposal which the Minister has submitted is adopted we shall probably find ourselves blocked in the endeavour to obtain a port within the Federal area.

Mr. WATSON.—Not at all.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Then an amendment will be required in clause 3, which provides that the territory to be acquired is to be the territory mentioned in clause 2. We must first of all obtain an expression of opinion as to whether Bombala or Dalgety should be selected, and we must not deprive ourselves of the right to claim a port, the desirability of which has recommended the Bombala site to many honorable members. To lay it down in clause 2, as the Minister proposes to do, that the site selected shall be within a radius of twenty-five miles of Dalgety, would, unless clause 3 were amended, exclude all possibility of the territory embracing a port. We should endeavour to leave the Bill as nearly as possible in the state in which the Senate sent it to us. To adopt the amendment proposed by the Minister would be practically to make a new Bill of it.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The object of the Government is to get a nearer indication of the opinion of the Committee. In order that that may be done, we must first settle the question whether Bombala or Dalgety is to be chosen. That can be determined by one vote.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—I quite agree with the proposal submitted by the Minister. The words which he proposes to omit are absolutely useless for the purpose for which they have been inserted in the clause. In the first place, they provide that the Seat of Government shall be within a territory which in one direction would be 150 miles in length, and the description of the territory is then limited by a subsequent description that it shall be within fifty miles of Bombala. As applied to the Seat of Government, the two descriptions are inconsistent. The proper place in which to define the territory is the next clause.

Mr. WATSON.—If it is necessary to define it at all.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Just so; but the words proposed to be left out are absolutely useless, and are made useless by the subsequent provision that the Seat of Government shall be within fifty miles of Bombala. I can only account for the inconsistency of the clause by assuming that the various amendments proposed in the Senate created confusion. We are here not to fix a district, but to determine the Seat of Government. We should do that, and we should not leave it to a subsequent selection from a large area which may include several sites.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I agree with the honorable member for North Sydney as to the vagueness of the clause. I desire to know something with respect to the method by which the Minister proposes to ascertain the desire of the Committee. I should like to say that Governments and Parliaments have, before now, found that it is easier to create a blank than to fill it. If we create a blank in this clause as proposed, there will be nothing to prevent that blank remaining unfilled for ever, so far as this Committee is concerned, by a combination of supporters of two sites as against the supporters of a third. I am not saying this with any desire to secure an advantage for the site mentioned in the Bill, or the site which was selected a few minutes ago by honorable members, because neither of them is my first choice. We have had previous examples of combinations. To move that these words should be left out, with a view to insert other words, would be a perfectly right course to pursue, in the circumstances, if we knew that, as a matter of course, the striking out of these words would be followed by the formal insertion of the other words proposed. But once these words are left out, the whole question is again enlarged. I should advise the insertion of certain words first, if they could be agreed to, and we could strike out the superfluous words afterwards. My only desire is to secure fair play for all concerned, because, as I say, Bombala and Dalgety are by no means the objects of my primary selection in this matter.

Mr. WATSON (Bland — Treasurer).—In accordance with the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, it might simplify the procedure, and assuage any fears which some honorable members may entertain of the difficulty always liable to crop up in connexion with matters of this sort, if the Minister for Home Affairs were to withdraw his present amendment, and move the insertion, at the word "within," of the words "a radius of twenty-five." Then any honorable member, who desired to do so, could move an amendment upon the amendment, with the object of altering the word "twenty-five" to "fifty," if that should be desired.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Why not make it fifty miles in the first instance?

Mr. WATSON.—Because, in my view it is absolutely ridiculous to talk of the selection of a site within a radius of fifty miles. The necessity for getting this determination, indicate where it wishes the Federal Capital to be, and if we indicate a territory with a diameter of 100 miles, one can say that we have thus indicated where the Capital should be. It might be anywhere within that vast range of country.

Mr. CROUCH.—We could leave that to the two Governments concerned.

Mr. WATSON.—In my opinion, the Federal Parliament should indicate its choice much more nearly than that, for the benefit of the Government. I do not say that it would be putting too much responsibility upon the Government, but it certainly would be burdening the Government to ask them to interpret the will of the House in making a selection within such an area as that which I have referred to. I think that a radius of twenty-five miles would cover the maximum range of choice which should be allowed. Even that would give a diameter of fifty miles to the circle, and I am rather inclined to agree that that is a little too much.

Mr. BAMFORD.—It would cover 1,000 square miles.

Mr. WATSON.—That is a very large range. The object should be to cut the area down to as fine and definite a point as is consistent with our present information, and with the possibility that a new location may be necessary for the actual site of the Federal capital.

—that is to say, within a mile or two of the particular place we select. I think, therefore, that the better plan, following the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, would be to propose the insertion of the words I have indicated, including the words "twenty-five," and the Committee could afterwards take a vote upon the insertion of the word Dalgety in lieu of the word Bombala, if honorable members so desired.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan).—We have selected the district in which the Seat of Government is to be located, and it has now become our duty to select the site. The best way in which to proceed is to ascertain from the Committee which site within this district honorable members prefer. Four sites have been named and inspected—Dalgety, Bombala, Delegate, and Coolringdon. It appears to me that what we have to do now is to find out which of those four sites is favoured by the majority of the members of the Committee. Having done that, the Seat of Government should be fixed within a reasonable distance of the site selected, and twenty-five miles would be a more than ample range, knowing the localities as we do. We know that the Bombala site is not more than three or four miles from the town of Bombala; the Dalgety site would be within a radius of five miles of the bridge at Dalgety; the Delegate site would be within three or four miles' radius of the town of Delegate; and the Coolringdon site is well known. No doubt the choice of the Committee will be either Dalgety or Bombala. A very few miles from either place would suffice to include the site of the actual Capital, and whether we say ten or twenty-five miles will make no difference in the selection. Then we have the question of the area of the territory, which will have to be considered on clause 3. By the course I suggest, we should let it be well known that every site in this district has had a fair chance of being dealt with; whereas, if we adopt the proposal of the Government—though I have no objection to it, personally—it might be thought we were barring the claim of some sites. What we have to do now is to definitely say which site in this district is approved by a majority of the Committee.

Mr. REID (East Sydney).—I quite agree with the course the Government have taken; in fact, I think they are scarcely definite enough in the amendment. However, the amendment means a better state of things than is contemplated in the clause. So far as I am concerned, as a representative of New South Wales, though I have strongly and consistently endeavoured to procure the selection of Lyndhurst, I have the consolation, after the division which has taken place, of recognising that that division is an honest expression of opinion by the House. I accept that decision as not brought about, as some other position might have been, by any unfair means, but as a fair and honest expression of the views of the majority. The decision is much against my own views, but I have at least the satisfaction of feeling that the selection which has been made does represent the honest conviction of the majority of the members of this House. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I want to help the Government so far as I can. What New South Wales may think is another matter; it is for New South Wales to look after her own affairs in her own Parliament. I am strongly against the large area, but it must be left to the Government and the people of New South Wales to look after their own interests. I will do all I can in this Chamber to get the views I represent expressed in the provisions of the Bill; but, so long as the procedure is, as it has been, thoroughly bonâ fide, I am not going to carry my protest further. I wish to say that I accept in good faith this amendment to insert Dalgety, upon the understanding that the site is within a reasonable distance of Dalgety, as intended by Parliament. I have made no secret of my view that I should not consider the choice of Dalgety one which, manifestly, I could not regard with some sort of feeling of respect; I have never denounced that site as one with regard to which I had any sort of decided feeling one way or the other. I am prepared, so far as I am concerned, as a member of this House, to accept the decision which has been honestly arrived at, without any manipulation of votes—which expresses a preference as between Lyndhurst and Dalgety. But I do not think that, having now chosen Dalgety, we ought, in the interest of all parties, to make our selection as definite as possible in the Bill. Of course, I shall accept the Government amendment, to make the radius twenty-five miles, as an improvement on a radius of fifty miles; but I do so on the distinct understanding that the Government place upon that amendment a reasonable interpretation—that it means Dalgety, and not some other places twenty-five miles away.

Mr. WATSON.—Quite so.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Why not take a vote on Dalgety as against Bombala?

Mr. REID.—I think that would be the straightest course of all.

Mr. WATSON.—The Government should not be tied to a mile or two—there ought to be an allowance of ten miles, at least.

Mr. REID.—I desire that we should carry out the spirit of the decision arrived at by the House.

Mr. WATSON.—That is the idea.

Mr. REID.—The Government will be charged with carrying out the spirit of the decision; and the spirit is that the site shall be within the Dalgety district. If it is found that by going a mile or two away from a particular spot a better site may be found, no human being will raise the slightest objection. But it is to be understood that there must be no sort of undermining, so as to bring about the selection of Bombala.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Bombala is over thirty miles away.

Mr. REID.—The distance is greater, I think; but I should like to be satisfied by the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, that he, as the representative of the district in which these two sites are, accepts the decision of the House in regard to Dalgety—that he accepts that decision, just as I do.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That is a question for the decision of Ministers.

Mr. REID.—But I want to be satisfied that the honorable member for Eden-Monaro has not in his pocket some other site within twenty-five miles.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Coolringdon is inside that radius, and I take it that if the amendment be carried, Dalgety will be regarded as the centre.

Mr. REID.—As honorable members will see, it is not on this clause that the question of territory arises. We are now simply dealing with the spot near which the Capital is to be.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).

—I agree with the honorable and learned member for Corinella as to the way in which we should proceed. It would be a mistake, I think, to omit a large portion of the clause, with a view to inserting some other words. By so doing we may get into trouble; and we ought, therefore, to insert after the word "bounded" some words which will clearly express what is intended. The only difficulty is as to radius.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Should not the words which I think the honorable member has in mind, be inserted after the word "within"?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I suggest after the word "bounded," the following words be inserted: "by a circle, the radius of which measures seventeen miles from the township of Dalgety." That is the site marked out on the map as the Dalgety site. With a radius of fifty miles, or even of twenty-five miles, we should increase the subsequent difficulty in settling the site; and I think that a radius of seventeen miles, as marked on the map, is amply sufficient, as we have already decided on the district. I am quite in accord with the leader of the Opposition that the House has come to an honest legitimate decision. I have supported Lyndhurst all through, but I recognise the decision now arrived at as one we must respect, and, notwithstanding differences of opinion as to the relative merits of the sites, a decision amply justified by the qualifications of the site chosen. It would be a mistake to create trouble such as we have had in the past, and such as might be supposed to have got rid of; difficulty might arise if we created a large circle in which the Seat of Government must ultimately be fixed. If the Government will not adopt my suggestion, I should like to test the feeling of the Committee by moving an amendment in the terms I have indicated.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member cannot submit that amendment. The question before us now is the omission of certain words.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I am pressing that the amendment to omit certain words will be withdrawn by general consent. I should like the Government to adopt my amendment, which seems to be a simple expression of the desire of the Committee.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why a radius of seventeen miles?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Because that is the area marked out on the map, which I have studied very carefully while the debate has proceeded. It seems to me, from a view of the reports of skilled officers, that this area probably contains any site that could have had in mind when discussing the merits of Dalgety. To extend area to twenty-five miles would be to give a great deal further trouble in the ultimate decision. I think the Prime Minister admits himself that we should be wrong in making the area too large—that we should thereby complicate the final settlement. If, however, we have a radius of seventeen miles, as marked on the map, we shall keep faith with the decision of the House, and by adopting the Dalgety district with that limitation, we shall be much nearer to having the exact site fixed beyond all question. If we adopted a larger area, we should probably have other sites submitted, and the whole competition, though narrowed down to a smaller compass, would practically have to be once more faced.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume).—I think that some of the speeches which have been made upon the amendment have been a little previous. There is nothing to prevent an honorable member from moving the insertion of any site. It is not to be supposed that we are confined to sites within the South-Eastern District. I intend to move the insertion of a site which is not in that district. The balloting was no doubt honest, but, unfortunately, two honorable members were absent. Had they been here, the South-Eastern District would have been rejected on the first ballot, and the contest would have been between the Southern District and the Western District, which would have entirely altered the position of matters. Honorable members have not yet had an opportunity to give a straight-out vote for or against any particular district. I am not raising this objection for the first time now, because some time ago I suggested to the Minister that an exhaustive ballot should be taken. What we have just had has been only a single ballot, whereas an exhaustive ballot would have pitted every proposed site against every other proposed site. After the first ballot had been taken, and the Southern District rejected, there should have been a ballot between the two remaining sites, and then the southern site should have been pitted against each of those sites. That would have been an exhaustive ballot. I tried to induce the Minister to adopt that manner of balloting, because it is the only fair one. I understand, however, that now it is open to me to move the insertion of any site in the Southern District, while other members could move the insertion of Lyndhurst, Dalgety, Bombala, or any proposed site they wish. This will be the only opportunity to really test the feeling of honorable members in regard to the proposed sites.

Mr. EWING.—The words proposed to be left out must be left out before the name of any proposed site can be inserted.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Quite so. I think that the proposal made by the Minister in the first instance is the proper one to adopt.

Mr. PAGE.—Why does not the honorable member accept his “licking” like a man?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I always do so. I compliment the honorable member for Eden-Monaro on the accident which has placed him in so fortunate a position.

Mr. REID.—It was not an accident. There was too great a difference in the numbers for it to be an accident.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—As I have mentioned, there were two honorable members absent when the ballot was taken. One of them is on his way here now, and if, when an adjournment was being asked for, I had received from him the telegram now in my possession, I would have asked for a still further adjournment to enable him to take part in our proceedings.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—But the right honorable member for Adelaide was not accounted for.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member to whom I refer is in the train from Echuca, and I know what his opinion is. I think the matter too serious and important to be settled without an exhaustive ballot. Honorable members should have been given a proper opportunity to decide directly upon the sites. I do not wish now to speak upon any of the proposed sites in detail, but I shall later on refer to the conduct of one or two honorable members who would not look at a certain proposed site. I think that if the amendment for the striking out of certain words be agreed to—

Mr. WATSON.—The question now before the Committee is, what area should be taken—within what radius of any site the Seat of Government shall be located?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If the words proposed to be left out, be so left out, it will then be open to any honorable member to move the insertion of any area of country he pleases.

Mr. WATSON.—What the Minister proposes to do now is to move the insertion, after the word “within,” of other words providing that the Seat of Government shall be within a radius of so many miles. After that amendment has been carried, it will be open to any honorable member to move the insertion of the name of a site.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The question which will be put from the Chair will be, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

The CHAIRMAN.—That amendment is to be withdrawn, and the Minister is then going to move another amendment.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The amendment which the Minister intends to move seems to me not the right one. I think that he should see that his original amendment is put. The right thing to do is to create a blank in the clause. That is the first step to take. When a blank has been created, it will be open to honorable members to move the insertion of Lyndhurst, Bombala, Dalgety, Tumut, or any other name, including even that of the much-opposed Albury.

Mr JOSEPH COOK.—And the still more-opposed Lake George site.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I would not oppose the Lake George site. I never have opposed it.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member can propose the insertion of any one of the sixteen sites which he has brought forward.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I hope that the honorable member will not be offensive. If he is, he will get a Roland for his Oliver. I do not wish to say anything about his success, though, no doubt, it has been obtained by accident. I do not say that, finally, honorable members might not in any case have selected Dalgety, even if the South-Eastern District had been rejected on the first ballot; but every site and territory should be opposed to each of the others, so that honorable members may give a direct vote on them all. That is what I wish to see done.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The winning site ought to beat every other.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is so. But we have not yet got to that stage.

Mr. WATSON.—It is not proposed to prevent that.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Honorable members will see that the site which I was advocating has not yet had an opportunity to compete against the other sites, and it should have that opportunity. If honorable members by a majority select any site, they will find me willing to accept the general verdict; but I wish first to see that there is a fair competition between the sites. I regret that the Minister did not do what I asked him to do first of all, and so arrange the balloting that every site would be opposed to every other site.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It was a very difficult matter to arrange.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think so. Every site could have been pitted against every other site. Now, however the sites will have to be voted upon in the ordinary way, and I wish the Minister not to do anything which will prevent an amendment being moved under the Standing Orders—because what has been done hitherto in regard to balloting has been under a suspension of the Standing Order—to test the feeling of the Committee in regard to the sites. I do not wish to do more than that. But I should not be doing my duty to the States, to New South Wales or to Australia, if I did not see that that was done.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey).—Could we not simplify matters by moving the insertion of the name of a site after the word "be"? For instance, I might move the insertion of the words "at Dalgety." I would be open to any honorable member to move an amendment. If the words I have indicated were inserted, and others were struck out, the clause would read—

... The Seat of Government of the Commonwealth shall be (at Dalgety, or any other site that may be determined) in the State of New South Wales.

Then the next clause would have to be amended by the omission of the reference to the area mentioned in clause 2.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—My proposal would meet the views of the honorable member.

Mr. POYNTON.—I do not know that it would.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member has not heard it.

Mr. POYNTON.—I have heard one proposal, with reference to a twenty-five miles radius, which would include Coolringdon and that would not suit me. I shall not approve of any site which would have to be supplied with water by means of a pumping scheme. We know that, in the matter of water supply, Dalgety possesses a great advantage over all the other sites.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Not over all the others.

Mr. POYNTON.—Yes, it does. I am quite in sympathy with the attitude assumed by the honorable member for Hume. I am one of the supporters of his proposal and not been absent the results might have been very different.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—No, they would not. Two supporters of the Dalgety site, namely, the right honorable member for Adelaide, and the honorable member for Brisbane, were also absent.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — The honorable member for Barrier was absent, and that is why the honorable member for Brisbane stood out.

Mr. POYNTON.—I am quite sure that no honorable members wish to see a selection made by means of a catch vote.

Mr. REID. — Hear, hear. The site selected should stand against every other.

Mr. POYNTON.—Exactly. I trust that, after the site has been selected, all honorable members will assist the Government in bringing about a practical result, because it may be necessary for all of us to make a stand against outside influences in order to achieve our object. I shall wait until I hear what the Minister of Home Affairs proposes. If I do not approve of his amendment, I shall propose to insert the words, "at Dalgety" after the word "be."

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The objection to the amendment suggested by the honorable member for Grey is that it would be too rigid altogether. If it were determined that the Seat of Government should be at Dalgety, we should be compelled to select a site within the boundaries of the township of that name. I am sure that the honorable member does not wish that. The amendment which I desire to submit is upon the lines of the suggestion of the honorable member for South Sydney, that the Seat of Government should be situated within a radius of seventeen miles from the town of Dalgety, but I have framed my proposal in a somewhat different form. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, it would be better not to create a blank, but to first fix upon a site, and then to afterwards strike out any words that may be unnecessary. Before we create a blank, let us decide what we intend to do. I desire to withdraw the present amendment, and to then submit a proposal to insert after the word "within," the words "seventeen miles of."

Mr. CROUCH.—Why not specify a radius of twenty-five miles?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not care very much whether we adopt a seventeen or a twenty-five mile radius, but as we are to fix the site and not the territory, I think that the Committee should give the Government a clear indication of the locality in which they desire the Seat of Government to be, and not leave the question too open. If we adopt a radius of seventeen miles from any given point, we shall embrace an area of 900 miles, and surely that should be sufficiently large to afford the Government and their officers the necessary latitude in choosing a site.

Mr. SPENCE.—Should not the site be in the centre of the territory?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Not necessarily.

Mr. REID.—The territory could afterwards be so shaped as to insure that the Capital should be in the centre.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Under my suggested amendment, it would be open to the honorable member for Hume to propose some site other than Dalgety. All I suggest at present is that the words "seventeen miles of" should be inserted after the word "within." Afterwards Dalgety or any other site could be submitted.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—My only chance would be to move an amendment upon the first site proposed.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It would be open to the honorable member to move any amendment he chose. What he desires to obtain is a straight-out vote for or against the Tooma site.

Mr. REID.—No; the honorable member for Hume wants to pit the Tooma and Tumut sites against the Dalgety site; two against one would not be fair.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Every fair opportunity would be afforded to the honorable member for Hume to propose a site in the Southern District. He could propose his site before any other was submitted to the Committee. I shall place no obstacle in the way of his moving an amendment before that which I have indicated.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—I object to the reduction of the radius to seventeen miles.

The CHAIRMAN.—The only question before the Committee at present is the omission of certain words embodied in the amendment which the Minister of Home Affairs desires to withdraw.

Mr. SPENCE.—I cannot see any reason for the fear entertained by some honorable members that the creation of a blank would allow of an unfair advantage being taken, and of the whole question being "hung up." The disposition of the Committee is to definitely select a site, and, that being so, it will make no difference whether we create a blank or insert certain words in the first instance. I do not see any objection to the form of the amendment now before us. I hope that the Minister will not propose to reduce the radius to seventeen miles, because our object in asking for an area of 900 square miles is to prevent persons outside the Federal territory from deriving the advantage of the unearned increment accruing from the expenditure upon the Capital.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—I understood that the site was to be selected by means of an exhaustive ballot, but that course has not been followed. I have not had an opportunity to vote for any other than one site. I voted for Lyndhurst on both occasions, but if I were offered a second choice I should give my support to a site in the Southern District as against either of those in the South-Eastern District. We are determining this question for all time, and I think that honorable members should be afforded an opportunity to vote straight-out for one site against another. I admit that the Southern District was rejected upon the ballot taken in the House, but that was due to the fact that several honorable members gave the western site their first preference.

Mr. PAGE.—Which site does the honorable member now prefer?

Mr. WILKINSON.—I should give my support to the Tooma site.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member's choice has already been knocked out.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Yes, but I think that an opportunity should be afforded to myself and others to vote in favour of any site which we prefer, as against those which are embraced in the South-Eastern District.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member would have an opportunity of doing as he desires if the amendment now before the Committee were withdrawn.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—I cannot understand the attitude assumed by the honorable member for Hume. He has been fairly and squarely beaten, and I do not know what further he wants. The honorable member for Moreton is not satisfied because the Lyndhurst site has not been selected, and he now wishes to vote for a site in the Southern District. Apparently, "he dunno where 'e are." If honorable members were to be allowed to back and fill in the way suggested there would be no finality. The position was clearly defined by the Speaker, and I think that we should proceed to make a definite choice. If Tooma had been selected we should have heard no such question as that which is now raised. I agree with the right honorable member for East Sydney that we have had a good square "go" in connexion with the balloting. There has been nolog-rolling, and every honorable member has had a fair opportunity to vote for the site he preferred. I am pleased to notice that the honorable member for Macquarie is sitting back smiling.

Mr. REID.—He has made a good fight and has not turned sour.

Mr. PAGE.—He accepts his defeat like a man. The honorable member for Hume wants votes to be taken with regard to Tooma, Tumut, Tumberumba, and other sites, and will not be satisfied until Dalgety has been rejected. If both Houses decide that the Capital is to be established in the South-Eastern District we shall arrive at finality, and the honorable member for Hume will have no more picnic parties to cart around.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is a mean thing to say.

Mr. PAGE.—It is absolutely true.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is a mean suggestion.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member had nothing to say about Tooma last year, but strongly advocated the claims of Tumut. This year the Tooma site was introduced, and now that it has been rejected, the honorable member wishes to secure the defeat of the Bombala site. If he is a sportsman he should take his defeat like a man.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I always take my defeats better than does the honorable member.

Mr. PAGE.—I take them as gracefully as I can. I can do no more. If the honorable member can accept defeat more philosophically than I can, that is his gain and my loss. He reminds me of the little boy playing marbles, who, when he is defeated, exclaims: "Give me back my marbles. You did not beat me fairly." His action is equivalent to a regular school boy's trick. The Southern Monaro district has been selected by this Committee, and the Bombala area has been chosen by the Senate. Consequently, there is every prospect of an agreement being arrived at between the two Houses. Let us show that we are men by respecting the vote which has been arrived at upon this question.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I move—

That after the word "within," line 2, the following words be inserted—"the Southern District, as indicated in the recent ballot."

I submit this amendment upon the same ground that has been taken by others who have addressed themselves to the question during the course of this debate. I contend that we have not had an exhaustive vote as to which site is preferred by a majority of the Committee. Like the honorable member for Maranoa, I desire to see some finality arrived at, and I move the amendment with a view to ascertaining whether honorable members do not prefer the Tooma site to that of Dalgety.

Mr. REID (East Sydney).—I think that the honorable member is perfectly justified in the course of action which he has adopted. We do not desire to shut out any honorable member who advocates a particular site or to compel him to submit to a legitimate grievance. The amendment submitted will give the advocates of the Tooma site a straight run in this Committee. At the same time I do not pledge myself to vote for it.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I would urge the honorable member for Gwydir to withdraw his amendment. Upon the first ballot I voted for the selection of the Southern District, but when my choice was defeated I thought that the matter was at an end. I would suggest to the honorable member that he would achieve his purpose more satisfactorily from the stand-point of draftsmanship and of practical work, by waiting until the amendment proposed by the Minister for Home Affairs has been disposed of. The honorable gentleman wishes to insert after the word "within" the words "seventeen miles of," and I understand that subsequently he will move to insert after the word "of" the word "Dalgety." The honorable member for Gwydir will then be afforded an opportunity of proposing by way of amendment to insert before "Dalgety" the word "Tooma." The adoption of that course will enable the Committee to reach some finality. If the honorable member will agree to my suggestion I shall adhere to my first choice and vote for the selection of the Tooma site, although I do not suppose for a moment that it has any chance of winning. After we have turned our backs upon the vagueness represented by districts, and have set our eyes upon a definite locality, it seems to me very undesirable that we should retrace our steps. Personally I cannot understand how any honorable member can object to the course proposed by the Government. I ask the honorable member to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I must admit that the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella is a thoroughly practicable and reasonable one, and consequently I shall accept it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Mr. BATCHELOR) proposed—

That after the word "within," line 2, the following words be inserted, "seventeen miles of."

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—I would point out that the next clause provides that the territory shall be fixed within the area specified in this clause. Consequently, if we decide that it shall be within a radius of seventeen miles of Dalgety, our whole aim in seeking to secure a territory surrounding the site, so that we may obtain from it the unearned increment for the use of the Commonwealth, will be defeated.

Mr. McLEAN.—The Federal territory has nothing whatever to do with the Seat of Government.

Mr. SPENCE.—It appears to me that it has.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The word "territory" governs the entire provision. The same thing might happen if, instead of fixing a radius of seventeen miles, we fixed one of 1,000 miles.

Mr. SPENCE.—I presume, then, that after the site of the Capital has been selected we shall require to enact legislation in respect of the territory surrounding it. If that be so, of course I am satisfied; but it appears to me that in its present form the Federal territory will embrace an area within a radius of seventeen miles of Dalgety.

Mr. REID.—Absolutely. no. The two matters are quite distinct.

Mr. SPENCE.—I should like the right honorable member to explain why it is not so. It has occurred to me that a greater radius would confer a greater degree of safety.

Mr. REID.—We are now fixing the site of a city only.

Mr. SPENCE.—Then the next clause will require to be amended, because it has no meaning in relation to this provision.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I do not understand why a radius of seventeen miles has been decided upon by the Government. As the Minister of Home Affairs has pointed out that the radius proposed will embrace an area of 900 square miles, I desire to know whether the territory comprised within that area has any relation to the 900 square miles mentioned in clause 3?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—None at all.

Mr. CROUCH.—I shall vote for the amendment, upon the understanding that I do not subsequently limit myself to that territory. My desire is that the Commonwealth shall possess a port of its own. It was for that reason that I voted for Dalgety.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I move—

That after the word "of," in the words inserted, the word "Welaregang" be inserted.

I do so because of the alteration which has been made in the radius within which the Seat of Government shall be selected. It has now been fixed at seventeen miles. The Tooma and Welaregang sites are identical. The former name has been used by honorable members during this debate, merely because it is that of the township adjacent to the site, and is better known to honorable members because it is the terminal point of the visits which they paid to that district. I hold that a serious injustice will be done, not only to the people of to-day, but to those of the future, if we do not select the site which is superior, on account of its situation. In spite of all the reports which have been submitted for our consideration—and I have read them very carefully—I claim that the Welaregang site, or one within a radius of seventeen miles of it, would afford a unique position for the Federal Capital. In discussing the relative merits of the Tooma and Dalgety sites, I need not recapitulate the statements which I made upon a previous occasion. The climatic conditions obtaining at the two places constitute a most material difference between them. Moreover, the land adjacent to the Welaregang site is of better quality, and consequently far more productive than is that in the neighbourhood of Dalgety. These two factors have weighed very strongly with me in inducing me to conclude that the former site is preferable to the latter. Some honorable members affirm that the Commonwealth should possess a port of its own. If it be possible for us to secure a port—and I believe it is very improbable that we can obtain a port in connexion with the Seat of Government in the Southern Monaro district—I hold that no honorable member can express a definite opinion as to the expenditure which will be required to establish it, and to construct a railway to it. In my judgment, the possession of a port is not so essential to the Seat of Government as some honorable members appear to think. I believe that its possession would render the Capital more easy of attack than it would otherwise be.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Whereabouts Tooma is there a port?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I am not speaking of a port at Tooma. The honorable member has a habit of misconstruing the remarks of others.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I merely put the question to the honorable member; there was a possibility of misunderstanding.

Mr. WEBSTER.—If the honorable member were speaking there would be a still greater possibility of misapprehension.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Are we to have another general discussion?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I intend to express my opinions with regard to the relative merits of Tooma and Dalgety, and, if the opportunity offers, to vote for the better of those sites. If the Federal Capital were connected by railway with a port close at hand, which would be open to attack by an enemy, it would be exposed to great danger—to a danger which would not exist if the Capital were situated at Welaregang. I trust that a realization of the danger of having a port close at hand will deter honorable members from selecting Dalgety as against Tooma. It is also important that consideration should be given to the climatic conditions of the several sites. I have made inquiries from relatives and others who have lived in the Monaro district, and have been informed by them that the weather there is intensely cold, and that the winds are almost penetrating in their keenness. Surely honorable members are not anxious to select a site at which they could not reasonably reside for several months in the year. That would be the position if the Capital were established at Dalgety. At Tooma, however, the climate, in both summer and winter, is ideal, and, so far as I am aware, is unequalled by that of any other part of Australia. I trust that honorable members will recognise that we have to consider not our own personal comfort, but the desirableness of selecting a site which will cause the Capital to be attractive to tourists and others. If the Capital were situated in a picturesque spot many persons would be induced to visit it from time to time, and in that way we should secure an increased railway revenue which would assist in the payment of interest on the cost of the railway to the Capital, or on the cost of the establishment of the Federal city itself. Tooma has a water supply, which, in its volume, purity, and permanency, is equal to that of Dalgety, and it has so many other essential elements that I feel that I am doing my duty to the State from which I come in recommending that it be selected. I do not wish to labour this question, because I have already dealt fully with the Tooma site, but I submit the amendment in order that the Committee may have an opportunity to arrive at a decision that will be in the best interests of all.

Mr. CROUCH.—I desire to know, Mr. Chairman, whether the amendment is in order, as I understand that the Welaregang site is not within the South-Eastern District, which the House has selected by ballot. If honorable members turn to the resolution passed on the 27th ultimo, determining the method of selection, they will find that it provides that—

. . . A further ballot shall then be taken on the names of the remaining sites, and the name of the site receiving the majority of votes shall be reported to the House by the Speaker, and such site shall be deemed to be the site preferred by honorable members. . . The House shall thereupon resolve itself into a Committee of the whole on the Bill.

The Standing Orders were suspended, and it seems to me that we can work only within the authority of the House, and that the resolution as to the method of procedure is binding.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—On the point of order I submit that the taking of the ballot has been practically a mere waste of time. That ballot had no necessary reference to the Bill, and there is nothing in the resolution to which the honorable and learned member has referred which relates to the measure now before us. It is open to the Committee to reverse all that we have done by the process of the ballot. The ballot did not take place in the House, and does not bind us in any way. A certain method of procedure was adopted, purely for the convenience of honorable members, and the Committee is not bound or limited by it in any way.

The CHAIRMAN.—The point of order raised is that the Committee is bound by the result of the ballot. I would point out to the honorable and learned member that the Committee has no official cognizance of a ballot, and that we are dealing with the Bill now before us in the ordinary way. As the honorable member for Paramatta has said, the Standing Orders were suspended for the convenience of honorable members, and to conserve the time of the House. It will be competent for an honorable member to move any amendment, either on this clause or any other clause of the Bill, provided that it is in accordance with the Standing Orders.

Mr. HUTCHISON (Hindmarsh).—It is remarkable that, with only one exception, every honorable member who inspected the Tooma site came to the conclusion that it was the best that could be selected. Before visiting Dalgety, I was greatly impressed by what I had read and heard of its suitability, and remarked that if it came up to my expectations, it would assuredly receive my vote. I visited the district, and my expectations with but one exception were realized, the exception being in regard to the value of the soil. I should have been disappointed had I voted for Dalgety without visiting Tooma, and I feel sure that if honorable members had inspected both Dalgety and Tooma, as I did, the last named district would have secured an exceedingly large majority.

Mr. CONROY.—Would not the selection of Tooma be somewhat out of keeping with the spirit of the Constitution?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Certainly not. It would be within both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution. The Constitution empowers us to select the best site in New South Wales, provided that it be not less than 100 miles distant from Sydney; and, therefore, we should not violate its spirit by voting for any site in the Tumut district.

Mr. CONROY.—Why was it agreed that, pending the establishment of the Capital, the Parliament should sit in Melbourne?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—That compact was entered into by the representatives of New South Wales and Victoria, and seemed at the time to be satisfactory to both parties. It was a bargain, and, to my mind, New South Wales is likely in the end to have the best of it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not if Tooma be selected.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The honorable member seems to desire to secure for New South Wales the whole of the advantages accruing from the establishment of the Capital; his one fear appears to be that some advantage may accrue to Victoria.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No; we merely ask for some little advantage for New South Wales.

Mr. REID.—Dalgety is far enough away from Sydney.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—It is also so far away from Victoria as to render it impossible for that State to secure any benefit from the establishment of the Capital there. The honorable member for Parramatta is adopting a very narrow view of this question; he will be quite satisfied as long as the whole of the advantages go to Sydney.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have not said anything of the kind.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—If the Capital be established in the Tooma district, New South Wales will certainly secure the greater advantage. Had it not been considered that the Capital would be an advantage to the State in which it was established, the right honorable member for East Sydney would have fought just as valiantly for its establishment in some other State, as he did for the insertion of the clause in the Constitution providing that it should be located in New South Wales.

Mr. REID.—Why this attack on me?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I give the right honorable member the fullest credit for having made an excellent bargain for the State which he represents—a bargain in which the State from which I come will not be able to participate. The establishment of the Capital in New South Wales will be a great disadvantage to South Australia. At present the representatives of that State may attend the sittings of the Parliament in Melbourne, and at the same time give some attention to the businesses in which they are engaged; but when the Capital is established in New South Wales they will not be able to conduct any private business; they will have to remain at the Capital during the whole of each session.

Mr. REID.—They will be very desirable colonists.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—And I admit that New South Wales is a very desirable State for colonists; but I wish to secure the selection of the most eligible site in which to reside.

Mr. REID.—A burial ground.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I have only say in reply to the right honorable member that I did not see a cemetery in the Tooma district.

Mr. CONROY.—Because the place is inhabited.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I begin to think that the sooner it is inhabited the better. I am willing and anxious to see a large population settled at the earliest moment in that district. It is a much more desirable district than that of Dalgety. I deplore the spirit evinced by some of the representatives of New South Wales, who show that their one great fear is, that Victoria may derive some advantage from the selection of a certain site.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—So far there has been no such suggestion.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The suggestions may not have been actually made, but actions speak louder than words; in this instance they have spoken much louder than words.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There need be no advantage to either State.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I speak as a looker-on. I am quite satisfied with the bargain which has been made with New South Wales—the mother State—that she shall have the Federal territory within her borders. We are not going to take the Federal Capital away from her. For having the Federal Capital within her territory, New South Wales will certainly derive advantages.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is precisely what is proposed to be done—we are talking it away.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I call attention to the statement of the honorable member for Parramatta that we are going to take the Capital away from New South Wales. Away to where?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We are going to place a portion of her territory under Federal control and ownership.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We are going to have Federal control over a very small part of New South Wales, and that will lead to very great advantages to that State. In my opinion, Victoria would not have been a party to the Federal compact if it had not been that her people saw that there was going to be a very great advantage to this State through the Seat of Government being fixed in Melbourne for a considerable time.

Mr. ROBINSON.—There would have been exactly the same majority for the Constitution if the Seat of Government had been fixed at Brisbane.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I doubt that statement very much. I doubt whether Victoria would have been a party to the Federal compact if it had not been seen that a considerable advantage would be derived by this State from the Federal Parliament meeting in Melbourne. I believe that every honorable member, representing Victoria, will admit that there has been a considerable advantage in that direction.

Mr. CONROY.—How does that affect the question before us?

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! I draw the attention of the honorable and learned member for Werriwa to the fact that the front seat on the right of the Chairman is reserved for Ministers.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I am in favour of the best district being selected. We have heard the praises of another district sung by the right honorable member for East Sydney—

Mr. REID.—We are beaten, and we acknowledge it.

Mr. HUTCHISON. — I believe that all the right honorable member said of the other district was thoroughly justified. But I should have been very glad if he had been able to pay a visit to Tooma.

Mr. REID.—I should have done so, if beauty of scenery had been in my mind a chief factor. I admit that it is a beautiful place.

Mr. HUTCHISON. — I thoroughly agree that it is a most beautiful place.

Mr. REID.—I objected to it on account of its want of accessibility.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—No matter where we fix the Federal Capital, it is going to be made accessible at the earliest moment. Any part of New South Wales in which we choose to fix the Capital will be made accessible at once.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—By whom?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I shall be sorry if that State is so short-sighted as not to provide access to the Capital. In that case it will be the duty of the Commonwealth Parliament to see that access is at once provided. I am quite satisfied that that will be done. The question of accessibility is the very one that weighs with me in deciding that the best district in which to have the Federal Capital is the Tooma district. The country is as fine as any in New South Wales. It is so good, indeed, that it is only a matter of time when there must be a large increase of population, and when New South Wales would make it accessible to settlers, whether the Capital were fixed there or not. I am quite sure that that State will derive a very handsome return from the railway that she constructs to that district. Of course, New South Wales possesses so much fine territory that I can thoroughly understand that she cannot build railways to every part of the State. But I repeat that the consideration of accessibility need not weigh with honorable members. To my mind, Tooma is just as accessible as Dalgely. As far as railways are concerned, it is not so accessible as Lyndhurst; and the very fact that Lyndhurst, being so accessible, has made so little progress, does not say much in favour of our choosing a site in that district. At any rate, I am very pleased that we shall have one more opportunity, if not two, to obtain an expression of opinion from honorable members in regard to fixing the Federal Capital in the Tooma district.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—I am rather surprised that the honorable member for Gwydir should have moved this amendment, because, some few weeks ago, he advocated first choosing an area, and then proceeding with the selection of a site within that area.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I am still of that opinion.

Mr. KELLY.—I hope so, because on turning to Hansard, page 3598, I find that while the Prime Minister was speaking, the honorable member made a significant interjection. The Prime Minister was saying—

The area within the fifty-miles' radius of a given point seems to be an enormous one to select as a site for the Federal Capital—

when the honorable member for Gwydir interjected—

The site for the Capital would be selected within that area.

The honorable member was not an irresponsible interjector. As the mover of the motion then being discussed, he interjected with a knowledge of what the result of it would be. We have just chosen a site in the South-Eastern District, and the honorable member is not pleased. Surely Tooma can hardly be said to be within the South-Eastern District. Yet the honorable member moves an amendment in favour of that site, although its selection would undo the whole of the work which we have just done. For that reason I am somewhat surprised that he should have submitted this proposal. I do not propose to enter into the question of the relative merits of the sites. We have discussed that matter almost ad nauseam. Nor do I propose to follow the honorable member for Hindmarsh in his highly poetical panegyric with respect to the qualities of the almost uninhabited region that surrounds Welaregang.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Has the honorable member seen Welaregang?

Mr. KELLY.—No, but I should certainly have taken advantage of the very generous offer that was made to me to induce me to visit the site, except that, not feeling in the best of health, I feared that it might be fatal to me to visit such an inhospitable region. I do not propose to enter into the question of the relative merits of sites. I merely rose to point out that the honorable member for Gwydir seems to have reversed his former attitude. I think that the action of the Government is perfectly correct. We have reached the stage when we should deal with particular sites within the area the House has just chosen. We are dealing with them now in the best way. But I hope that we shall do nothing to stultify ourselves, by putting the question back to its position of two years ago.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I think that if the matter of the selection of the Capital Site were determined on its merits, there can be no doubt that the proposal of the honorable member for Gwydir would be accepted. If we looked at this question, not from a provincial stand-point, but from a national stand-point — and that is the aspect in which we should regard it—I believe we should have no hesitation in selecting a site in the locality indicated in the amendment. It is strictly within the Constitution. It is not only literally within the Constitution, but it is within the spirit of it also, as being within New South Wales, but not within 100 miles of Sydney. I believe that if the natural advantages and the prospective advantages to the Federation from the selection of that site were taken into consideration, it would be looked upon by honorable members in this House, and by the members of another Chamber, as the one most suitable to contain the Federal Capital of Australia. It is upon the great Australian river. It is within a district that is practically unlimited in point of its capacity for growth. I do not believe that there is a single requirement of a great national Capital which cannot be obtained near Welaregang or Tooma. It is of easy access, not only to New South Wales, being on a great trunk line of railway; but is equally easy of access to Victoria and to South Australia. I do not believe that if we were to estimate the relative advantages of Dalgety, and compare them with those of Tooma or Welaregang, there would be any hesitation whatever in choosing the latter site. Because what would the selection of Dalgety or Bombala mean to the Victorians and South Australians? It would mean a tremendous journey; we should have to go to Cooma, and then come back. The distance, as it appears upon the map, is not at all indicative of the actual distance that has to be travelled from the Southern States. There is nothing in the interjections we have heard that we shall be infringing the spirit of the Constitution in choosing this site, if we do choose it. There is nothing in the objection that we shall be favouring Victoria or any other State. And though it seems almost hopeless to expect it at this stage, I feel that we should be doing right not only to this State, but to the whole Continent, if we were to choose the Federal Capital in the district now indicated. I cannot help expressing my surprise that so many Victorian members should differ from me in the view which they take upon this subject. I believe that from every stand-point we ought to select Welaregang.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume).—I do not intend to allow this matter to go to the vote without saying a few words in regard to some of the remarks which have been made. I would allude especially to an observation made, I think, by the honorable member for Wentworth as to the distance from Welaregang from Sydney. I think I have heard the right honorable member for Enmore, Sydney make some such reference. First of all, I want to make it clear that New South Wales has practically decided to build a railway to this very spot.

Mr. KELLY.—Practically decided?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes; and the line is to be built, not in the interests of Victoria, but of New South Wales.

Mr. KELLY.—Has the line from Tumbarumba to Welaregang been even surveyed?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes; it has been reported upon, and carefully examined up to what is called Yarra Gap, which is the highest point before reaching the proposed Capital Site. The object of building that line is to tap this very district, mainly in the interests of the tra-of New South Wales. Of course, there is a double reason, to connect the head of the Murray—the river which is the main artery we have in Australia—with the lower dry plains, with a view to convey stock backwards and forwards, and to secure the Upper Murray trade. What is that trade now? Where does it go to? Practically the whole of the business at present is done with Melbourne.

Mr. KELLY.—What is the value of that trade?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is very heavy. I think the honorable member for Gippsland has some idea of its value. There are three districts, which mainly supply the Melbourne market with meat, namely, the Upper Murray, Gippsland, and the Western District of Victoria.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member should have mentioned Gippsland first; it is a long way ahead.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Probably the honorable member is right, though I should have thought that the Western District came first. Most of the stock, and perhaps the best stock, they get come from the Upper Murray. It was to a large extent to retain part of that trade for the State that the Government of New South Wales commenced a railway, which will be extended right into the very heart of the country where this site is.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Where are these facts to be found?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—They will be found by reference to the records of the Public Works Department, in Sydney.

Mr. KELLY.—In pigeon-holes there.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No. Honorable members speak about this site in a manner which betrays their absolute ignorance of the whole matter. I do not think that they knew sufficient of the geography of Australia before the site was mentioned here to be aware of its existence, which does not say much for their intelligence, or their interest in the State which they represent. This particular site, if selected, would shortly be much nearer to Sydney than it would be, even if connected by the railway of which I have spoken, because an extension of the Tumut line, which will not be a very expensive affair, will give it direct communication with the metropolis.

Mr. KELLY.—Mr. Surveyor Chesterman says that he cannot be sure that the route is a practicable one.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member need not worry about that.

Mr. KELLY.—Mr. Surveyor Chesterman's report is the only official report which we have.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And some honorable members appear not to wish for any other information. The honorable member tried to burke further inquiry in reference to this place. He told us to-night that he was afraid to visit it, because of its extreme climate, but the climate, compared with that of Melbourne in winter time, is very mild. This site is at the head waters of the only river in Australia worthy of the name, and the future large works which will be necessary for the conservation of water for irrigation in New South Wales and Victoria, and to keep the stream navigable, as required by South Australia, will have to be made in that part of the country. It is, moreover, the beauty spot of Australia. I think I have very great cause to complain of the action of the late Minister of Home Affairs—the right honorable member for Swan—in reference to the site, because I feel that he has done a great injustice to it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have never been there.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable member would not go. He would not go when asked specially, or when other members went, nor would he go previously. Yet he complains that we have not sufficient information about the place. He did not wish to see it, because his mind had been made up long ago, for other reasons. That is the real truth, and it is just as well that honorable members should know it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Until recently I had not heard of the site.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member heard of it through me a year ago.

Mr. CARPENTER.—It was referred to in this chamber last year, as Hansard shows.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes; I spoke of it last year.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But the honorable member himself was Minister of Home Affairs then.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes, and I have stated times without number that, amongst other reasons, I did not bring it forward because I thought that the people of Sydney would consider it too far south. It is not, however, so far south as the Dalgety site, nor is it so inaccessible. It compares more than favorably with that site, both in regard to accessibility, to climate, scenery, and country. The Government of New South Wales have of their own accord commenced to build a railway to the Upper Murray. It is fifteen years since the railway to Cooma was made, but there has not been enough good land discovered in the Dalgety district to warrant the extension of the line from Cooma to Dalgety. That is the difference between the two districts. One is a poor, stand-still district, while the other is rich and progressing. I feel that the Upper Murray site is not receiving justice at the hands of honorable members, largely because of the action of the right honorable member for Swan.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is the Germanton line paying?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It has not been open very long, so that it is difficult to say. But it has opened up an immense area of good wheat-growing country, which previously could not be cultivated, because of its remoteness from the railway. It did not pay to cart wheat from the district to the only line then existing. Since the Germanton line has been made, however, a great area of land has been converted into wheat paddocks, and a very large quantity of wheat was sent from Germanton last year. As the line is taken up the valley of the Little Billabong Creek, through the Yarra Yarra property, and then on through the very rich valley which I have described, every foot of the land through which it passes will be put under cultivation. I question, however, whether, if the railway were extended to Dalgety there would be any great increase in cultivation. Mr. Russell's tables show that the valley between the Kiandra Range and the range which falls to the coast is the driest valley on the high table-lands in the State, and one of the driest and least productive in Australia. I refer to these facts because I feel that honorable members do not know what they are doing in the action which they are taking. It is absurd to say that it is a long distance from Sydney to the Upper Murray site, because the distance is not long when compared with the distance to the other places which I have mentioned. With regard to the amendment, it is, of course, quite within order, and every similar amendment will be in order. If I cannot get the site which I wish for, I would vote for Lake George. When I went there two years ago I expressed myself as not opposed to the Lake George site, and I should have voted for it had it been favorably reported upon. I believe now, however, that it can be turned into one of the finest sites for an inland city, because of the immense sheet of water which would be near it. I think it will be better to choose the Lake George site than to choose a site which seems likely to be chosen. What I chiefly regret is that two honorable members who should have been here when the ballot was taken were not here. If they had been present the result would have been different.

Mr. McLEAN.—Are they here now?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I believe that one of them is. All I ask for is a straight out vote, so that honorable members may choose fairly between the various sites. That is done, I shall be satisfied. But do not wish for a vote to be taken when only half the members of the Committee are present. Therefore, I think it would be well if we determined to take a vote at a certain hour. I know that there is one honorable member who will not be here in any case; but I shall have to put up with that. If, when the question has been fairly decided, the site which an advocate is not chosen, I shall be as chirpy as is the honorable member for Eder Mooraro. I hope that I have not appeared in bad humour because the site which an advocate has not been chosen. What I feel sore about is that my late colleague did not give fair play to that site. His opinion on a matter of this kind apparently has weight with honorable members, and when he visited the site, as he was asked to do, I feel confident that his judgment would have led him to declare it to be the best site available. Many of the honorable members who visited that site had previously made up their minds to vote for Dalgety; but I believe that, with one exception, they afterwards determined to vote for Toombulga. I think that the right honorable member for Swan would have come to a similar decision. There must be something very attractive in the appearance of the district when such a change of opinion takes place. Still I do not wish to speak on this subject at any great length. What I suggest is that the vote should be taken, say, half an hour after the resumption of proceedings after the dinner adjournment. I do not wish to appear as acting, but I wish to satisfy myself that all the sites have been fairly dealt with.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Honorable members might talk at length then, just as they may now.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — I do not think so. I think that the Committee would be willing to come to a vote without much further discussion.

Mr. HARPER.—At 8 o'clock?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes.

Mr. REID.—If there is any one away I shall not object to pair. The honorable member for Riverina is here now.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I know that.

Mr. REID.—We will give you a pair for every one who is away.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Then I shall be ready to come to a vote at any moment.

Mr. REID.—That is, a pair for every one whom the honorable member will guarantee to be a supporter of Tooma.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I will give that guarantee; but I do not know how that is to be ascertained until a division is taken.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member for Bass, who is a supporter of Dalgety, has had to go home.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Then the honorable member could be paired with the honorable member for Perth.

Mr. MAHON. — No. The honorable member for Perth is paired with the honorable member for Franklin.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member for Franklin could release that pair. If pairs are found for honorable members who have to be away I have no desire to say another word on the subject.

Mr. WATSON (Bland—Treasurer).—I have not addressed myself to the merits of the different sites on either occasion when the matter has been before the House. This has not been from any disinclination to declare myself on the subject, but because on the first occasion I was animated by a desire to expedite the decision, and therefore refrained from speaking, and because on the last occasion I was unfortunately prevented from making the remarks I intended to make. Notwithstanding the fact that I have not formally spoken on the subject, honorable members have been aware of the direction in which my preference lies. I desire to say at once that, looked at purely from the stand-point of eligibility, apart from other considerations, I had a decided preference for Lake George. I voted afterwards for Tumut, because I found it was useless to waste my vote on Lake George, when there was not a sufficient number of honorable members in favour of that site to put it in the running. Since the first occasion on which I voted for Tumut, I have consistently supported the Tumut district. I believe that at Batlow we could have got an area of Crown lands of a fertility unexcelled anywhere in New South Wales—and that is saying a great deal—with an elevation that would insure a good climate, well protected by ranges on the south and west from the prevailing winds in the winter time, and easily accessible, with a comparatively small expenditure, from the existing railway. Such a site would also have been a reasonable compromise between the conflicting interests of the two great centres of population in the Commonwealth. Those were advantages which seemed to me to justify my voting for that particular district. But the suggestion now put forward that we should select Welaregang seems to me to be asking the State of New South Wales to concede too much. I think the general understanding of the spirit of the Constitution was that the site selected should be within a reasonable hauling distance at any rate of the centre of New South Wales. That, I think, was the understanding that the New South Wales people had of the manner in which the Constitution would be interpreted. So long as other considerations were met, that is to say, that the soil, climate, water supply, and features of that sort were satisfactory, I was quite willing to make a concession to honorable members from the south to the extent of meeting them half way, in order that the question might be settled as soon as possible. My object, further, was not only to insure the early settlement of the actual location, but that we might enter into occupation of it at the earliest possible moment. I have no doubt that the Welaregang site is all that honorable members have painted it; but I do say that it is not within easy distance of either the political or trading centre of New South Wales, and for myself I could not think of going any further south than the point I have indicated near Tumut. As one who has a right to regard the understanding on which the people of New South Wales acted when the Constitution Bill was agreed to, I felt that I could not go any further south than that proposal involved. We have had to-day a selection in the House of a site by a majority of honorable members, if not by an overwhelming majority, by at all events a substantial majority. There was no suggestion that any trickery had been resorted to, that honorable members had been in any way improperly influenced, or that there was anything unsatisfactory about the method adopted to arrive at the decision. It does seem to me that it is the duty of the Government primarily, and of honorable members generally, to try to have a settlement of this question arrived at as early as possible. That being so, I feel it to be my duty to stand by the selection the House has made. This matter has yet to go through many stages before everything can be satisfactorily adjusted and finally settled, and the sooner we can put before the people of New South Wales the concrete opinion of the Federal Parliament the earlier we shall arrive at the settlement we hope for in the interests of all concerned.

Question.—That the word “Welaregang” proposed to be inserted be so inserted—put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the negative.
Amendment negatived.

Amendment (by Mr. BATCHELOR) agreed to—

That after the word “of,” in the words inserted, the word “Dalgety” be inserted.

Amendment (by Mr. BATCHELOR) agreed to—

That all the words after “Dalgety” down and including the word “Bombala” be left out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3—

The territory to be granted to or acquired by the Commonwealth, within which the State of Government shall be, shall be within the area mentioned in section 2, and shall contain an area not less than nine hundred square miles.

Amendment (by Mr. BATCHELOR) agreed to—

That the words “shall be within the area mentioned in section 2, and” be left out.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I move—

That the word “nine” be omitted, with view to insert in lieu thereof the word “one.”

Mr. WATSON.—The amendment is very unnecessary, seeing that the Constitution makes that provision already.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I want to repeat the words of the Constitution—to adhere to the Constitution as nearly as I can. I do not desire to discuss the matter; it has already been debated almost ad nauseam.

Mr. WATSON.—The area of the territory has not been discussed in this Parliament.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Under the circumstances I content myself with simply submitting the amendment.

Mr. REID (East Sydney).—This matter, as the Prime Minister says, has not been debated in this Parliament, though it was discussed at great length on former occasion. I, therefore, do not propose to take up much time dealing with this phase of the question on the present occasion. I wish, however, in very few words, to express the strong view I entertain against the whole of the clause. I have always thought and contended that the main and only object of this Bill should be the selection of a site for the Federal Capital—that the area of territory around the Capital should be left as a matter of negotiation between the respective Governments. Though I may not agree with the collective view of Parliament, I recognise there is a majority in this, and the other House, in favour of a large area, and I am quite willing to let the majority have their way. But I wish to urge on the Committee that, only as a matter of courtesy and fairness, we should do that which is always done when one person has to approach another in an endeavour to settle a matter of mutual concernment. No man goes to another, if the latter has any right to be consulted, and begins negotiations by saying, "Look here, I want so much, and I will have it." That is not the language of negotiation. If the great Powers negotiated with one another in that way the world would be at war all the year round; and some of the courtesies of life ought to be preserved even on the part of the Commonwealth of Australia in Parliament assembled. As a matter of human nature and experience, those who wish to have a large area might extend proper courtesy and consideration towards those from whom that large area is to be acquired.

Mr. FISHER.—Does the right honorable gentleman propose that nothing shall be said in the clause in regard to the area?

Mr. REID.—Nothing at all. I am opposed to the whole clause, but I quite agree that the wishes of Parliament should be made clear, in order that the Government may interpret those wishes.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—This Parliament has not voted upon the question.

Mr. REID.—I should like, of course, to test the matter in this Parliament. But I take a preliminary ground against the whole clause—against stipulating 100 square miles, just as I object to stipulating 900 square miles. I am against an area being provided in an Act of Parliament, because I consider that the area should be a matter of mutual arrangement and agreement. It is not usual to legislate on matters which are to be the subject of negotiation—to begin negotiations with an Act of Parliament stipulating what one side shall have. We may begin by expressing a strong wish or desire, but in order to get as large an area as we can we ought to approach the other side with as much courtesy as we can.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Did the right honorable gentleman mention that point when he agreed to the stipulation of not less than 100 square miles?

Mr. REID.—Mention what?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Did the right honorable member state the view he now takes, when he was a party to this provision in the Constitution?

Mr. REID.—I have had the advantage, to a certain extent, of a legal training, and I know that the law is well settled as to what the expression means.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Yes, but—

Mr. REID.—Will the honorable member allow me to explain? The honorable member does not seem willing to even allow me to answer his own question. There is a supposition in some quarters that because the expression says the area shall be "not less than 100 square miles," the meaning is that the whole of New South Wales may be taken in spite of anything which the people of that State may say. Unfortunately for such a construction of words which affect the property of other people, there is a long line of decisions in the Courts on such expressions as they are used in ordinary contracts throughout the mercantile communities of the world. It is quite common in business contracts to stipulate that, say, so many thousand sheep shall be delivered "more or less;" but no one is allowed, on that account, to claim all the sheep which a man may possess, or to claim that only one sheep may be taken because that is less than the stipulated number. All those expressions are adjudged by the Courts to mean some reasonable relation to the number or quantity named in the contract as a standard. We must remember that if, in a matter of this kind, affecting the property and rights of other people, we endeavour to force a large acquisition of territory by brute strength, the question will probably come before the High Court of Australia. That High Court was created to safeguard the rights of every State against every other State, and against the whole Commonwealth; and I should be surprised to hear a construction by that Court of the words "not less than 100 square miles" as meaning that we may take 300,000 square miles, which is about the area of New South Wales.

Mr. WATSON.—It is not proposed to go quite that length.

Mr. REID.—I merely use that as an illustration. If, on the strength of the words "not less," we may take 900 square miles, we may take 9,000 or 90,000 square miles.

Mr. WATSON.—Does the right honorable gentleman mean to say that we cannot take more than 100 square miles?

Mr. REID.—The area taken must bear some relation to the area mentioned in the Constitution. If my friend admits my contention, I have nothing more to say; it is only a matter of degree. But if the Prime Minister does not admit that reasonable construction, then he thinks that we may take the whole of the State.

Mr. ISAACS.—But we do not propose to take any land by this Bill.

Mr. REID.—Then is this clause a mere expression of opinion?

Mr. ISAACS.—It is not proposed to take land, and we cannot take land by the Bill.

Mr. REID.—Surely, as business men, we are passing this clause seriously.

Mr. ISAACS.—We cannot coerce New South Wales.

Mr. REID.—That last interjection only strengthens my argument. Since we cannot coerce New South Wales we ought to approach that State in at least the same spirit of ordinary courtesy in which we should approach a tallow chandler with whom we desired to negotiate in some little matter of business. Surely we can adopt the manners which prevail amongst business men in matters of mutual concernment—in matters in which one cannot use the whip—involving it may be no more than £50, or £10, or £5. Surely the same rule of conduct should be observed by a Parliament in dealing with another parliamentary authority? I should like to point out very strongly that, whilst honorable members have an absolute right, and ought to let the Government know what their desires are as to the area of land required—I do not care whether the area required be 100 or 2,000 square miles—they ought not to pass an Act of Parliament declaring that we must have so many thousands or so many hundreds of square miles. That is not the way to go about the business; though it would be a good way if we wanted to quarrel and did not care much whether or not we got what we asked. But amongst business men, and amongst great Governments, negotiations are not begun in that way. It is obvious that both Houses are of opinion that a much larger area than 100 square miles should be acquired for the Federal Capital; that has been made clear, to my mind, as the wish of Parliament. But the Government, having the wish of Parliament fully in their minds, will be more likely to get what is wanted by entering, as a business man would enter into negotiations with the Government of New South Wales, than by making any absolute demand.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—But if this clause were dropped, would there not be an assumption that Parliament had changed its mind in regard to the large area?

Mr. REID.—Not at all; especially in the light of the ground on which the clause had been dropped. I admit that the Government naturally want some indication of what the wishes of honorable members are in reference to the size of the territory; do not at all quarrel with that object, which is essentially business-like. The Government are only acting as our agents, and as a Parliament should let the Government have some idea of what we want. But the Government are more likely to get what is wanted if they approach the Government of New South Wales in a friendly way and open negotiations, than if they declare that their principals have instructed them that they must get so much. Such a declaration would be force, not reason—it would be rudeness, not courtesy. In the affairs of mankind were carried on in that way, very few negotiations would be characterized by friendliness or cordiality. I quite see the difficulty of the Government in this matter. They have simply copied a clause that was framed by the late Parliament. I remember that the late Prime Minister, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, asked the House, in the same spirit, but in much better language than I can employ, not to insert within the four corners of the Bill an expression of opinion as a matter of legal enactment. That honorable and learned member desired the Government to be left free to do the best they could for Parliament, being of opinion that such a clause as this would embarrass, and not help them.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Both Houses were against the late Prime Minister.

Mr. REID.—But there is now a new Parliament, and this point is important enough to raise. This clause can be debated, and the Government may infer from the various expressions of opinion the general tendency of the wishes of honorable members. I have been looking again at the Bill. The title is "An Bill for an Act to determine the Seat of Government of the Commonwealth." The distinct object of the measure, therefore, is to determine the Seat of Government so far as we can determine it. The Government will then be able to proceed to negotiation with the Government of the State of New South Wales, knowing precisely the situation which has been accepted by the Federal Parliament. The provisions of the Constitution point out that the Seat of Government shall be determined practically in this way, and shall be within territory "which shall have been granted to or acquired by the Commonwealth." That say, the acquirement of the territory is precede the determination of the Seat of Government; but we are properly taking the other course, and first deciding as to the location of the Seat of Government; because it would be impossible for the Federal Government to begin at all until what had been done. That being the object of the Bill, I strongly urge upon the Committee that the question as to the area of the territory is one for negotiation. The only thing that is certain is that it is not to be less than 100 square miles. I admit that the expression "not less than 100 square miles" permits of the acquirement of some reasonable area within the standard set up by that expression. I consider, however, that an area of 900 square miles is not reasonably within the standard of not less than 100 square miles. If this point were submitted to the High Court, I would not presume to say what its opinion would be, but if it followed the decisions relating to the use of similar expressions, which have been given in the Courts for many years past—and there are a number of authorities on the point—it would probably determine that the expression was one which admitted of an excess area, but not necessarily of an excess which was unreasonably large in reference to the standard adopted in the Constitution. The provision in the Constitution is really in the nature of an agreement or a contract between the Commonwealth and the State of New South Wales. It does not follow the lines of ordinary legislation. Within the lines of ordinary legislation, and within our jurisdiction, our laws are omnipotent. We can say anything we like within our jurisdiction, and there is no power on earth to question what we do. But this is a matter which falls within those questions for the decision of which the High Court has been established—questions in which the interests or property of a State may be affected by the action of the Commonwealth Government. The High Court has been set up simply to safeguard the rights of the Commonwealth on the one hand, as against each and all of the States, and with equal care and justice to protect the rights of each and all of the States on the other hand, as against the Commonwealth.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—With the consent of the State we could take other territory.

Mr. REID.—Decidedly; by mutual agreement anything that is not criminal can be done. For instance, the New South Wales and Commonwealth Parliaments might agree to make the area of the territory 100,000 square miles. But there must be mutual agreement. I do not want to force upon the Committee my own opinion as to how large this area should be. I am putting the matter upon much broader ground. We desire to see the negotiations between these two independent powers successfully conducted. We wish them to be of such a character that they will promote good feeling and not increase any bad feeling. I think that if there is one object that a responsible statesman, or member of this House, much more the House as a body, should keep steadily in view, it is that in the exercise of all our powers, and in all the transactions in which we are called upon to engage with any of the States, we should impress them with a sense of our perfect courtesy and fairness, and of our desire to do everything in a friendly way. Now these are objects with which we all agree, and I wish to point out that the use of the word "shall" in this measure is unfortunate. After all, we are merely expressing our opinion. As the honorable and learned member for Indi has pointed out, this measure is not intended to compel a settlement of the question. It merely embodies an expression of opinion. That is the basis of my objection to the use of the word "shall." As the clause stands, we, the principals, are employing the Government as our agents to deal with the people of New South Wales, through their agents, the Government of that State. We are telling our agents, "Now you are going into a Conference with the Government of the State of New South Wales to settle this matter in a friendly way. We tell you and we tell them in advance that the Federal territory shall embrace an area of not less than 900 square miles; in other words, it shall not contain 800 square miles or 850 square miles, or even 899 square miles, because the expression 'shall not be less than 900 square miles' absolutely precludes the selection of a territory of 899 miles, and it is not precluded as a matter of opinion, but by an absolute mandate contained in an Act of Parliament of the Commonwealth." That is not the language to use in transactions of this kind. When we wish to express an opinion, we should do so in the same courteous language that other people adopt. We should express our opinion, and not issue an ultimatum. The use of the word "shall," would make the provision tantamount to an ultimatum. If the British Government sent to the Russian Government, or the German Government, or the American Government, a communication containing the word "shall" the national self-respect of Russia, Germany, or the United States would be immediately challenged. Even though a request might be perfectly equitable, and one that ought to be granted, it would, if it were thrown into the shape of an ultimatum, be regarded with hostility and indignation. The Power addressed would consider that its reputation was at stake, and would resent the adoption of such language. That is the language of war, not the language of negotiation. Let honorable members reflect upon the infinite courtesies exchanged, and the forbearance exercised between the Governments of the great nations before they come to the point of open antagonism. Let us remember the trying experiences through which Great Britain and America passed in connexion with the Alabama case, when those two great peoples were frequently on the verge of war, from which they were saved only by the exhibition of the greatest forbearance and courtesy on both sides. Honorable members will probably recollect the marvellous effect produced by the change of a few words in a despatch sent, at an exciting time, by the Government of Great Britain to the Government of the United States, when those two gentlemen were taken forcibly from the Trent. We know now that Her Majesty, the late Queen, probably under the advice of the Prince Consort, herself toned down the despatch which was being sent, and it is now believed that, if that communication had been forwarded in its original form, these two great nations would have been plunged in war.

Mr. CROUCH.—Morley, in his Life of Gladstone, shows that that was a political fiction.

Mr. SPENCE.—Surely the right honorable gentleman does not suppose that there is any risk of our being plunged in war with New South Wales over the Capital Site question?

Mr. REID.—No, I do not suggest anything of the kind. If all my honorable friend's illustrations were viewed in that spirit he would be nowhere. I am simply referring to a matter of history, by way of illustration. If the question were one of military history I should defer to the opinion of the honorable and learned member for Corio, but as it is a mere matter of recollection of historical facts I think have sufficient authority to warrant statement.

Mr. CROUCH.—I am only quoting a lay against the right honorable gentleman. I quite imagine that he may be regarded as an inferior authority.

Mr. REID.—Oh, no. I think that, as an authority, he is almost equal to the honorable and learned member; that is the highest place I could give him. I see my recollection of history against that of my honorable and learned friend. However, if I am wrong, it really does not affect the main trend of my remarks, because I think it must be obvious to honorable members that we should avoid the language of dictation. I do not believe that honorable members have the slightest desire to do that to which I am now objecting. I feel sure that no honorable member has the slightest desire to use an offensive word or one that would savour of dictation, or some other form of expression would answer the same purpose. I apprehend that the object of those who believe that a large area is absolutely necessary is to express their opinion, and to instruct the Government as their representatives in the strongest possible way. No honorable member desires that at the beginning of the negotiations, before the New South Wales Government is approached, we should deliberately use the language of dictation and ultimatum, because we should then treat New South Wales as if she were so inferior that even courtesy was not due. These may seem small matters, but from my own experience the strongest feelings excited between the States have been aroused by the use of unguarded expressions. For instance, an expression used by the late Sir John Robertson, probably as a joke, a moment of pleasantry, was repeated year after year by those who looked upon it as a kind of insult cast upon one of the most flourishing States of Australia. I know that the Committee is strongly in favour of acquiring an area of 900 square miles. I am strongly opposed to it. I should not object to it, if the Government of New South Wales were willing to grant the area. I do not wish for a moment to stand in the way of the Commonwealth acquiring 900 square miles, if New South Wales is willing to give it, but we must remember that underlying the bargain there is a gift from New South Wales of all the Crown lands within the area constituting the Federal territory. I cannot recall an instance in the history of diplomacy, or of even savage tribes, where a gift was a matter of discussion and arrangement, in which the word "shall" was addressed to the person from whom the gift was to come, and in which stipulations were made as to the amount of the gift. That would be the language of supreme authority, of brute force, and not the language of propriety, and of good taste, such as is used in ordinary business bargaining. It would not be good policy.

Mr. SPENCE.—But would not the gift of Crown lands by New South Wales apply only to lands within an area of 100 square miles?

Mr. REID.—I merely wish to suggest to my honorable friend that the Commonwealth is the party which receives.

Mr. SPENCE.—New South Wales is not expected to cede all the Crown lands within a territory embracing 900 square miles.

Mr. REID.—The interjection of the honorable member has thrown a degree of light upon this matter which has not previously been thrown upon it.

Mr. KELLY.—But the Government of New South Wales will have to surrender its power of taxation upon the residents within the 900 square miles.

Mr. REID.—I am not dealing with that aspect of the question at the present moment. I am rather interested in the interjection of the honorable member for Darling, which I have heard for the first time. According to his statement, if we obtain an area of 900 square miles, the intention is that we shall pay for all Crown lands outside an area of 100 square miles.

Mr. WATSON.—I favour the adoption of that course.

Mr. REID.—The proposal is new to me.

Mr. WATSON.—I declared myself in favour of it in Sydney.

Mr. REID.—I must have missed the statement of the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPENCE.—I understood the right honorable member to say that the Government of New South Wales were expected to give to the Commonwealth all the Crown lands obtained within the Federal territory.

Mr. REID.—That was my understanding of the matter. We are now told, however, that the Commonwealth is prepared to pay—

Mr. WATSON.—I cannot speak for the Commonwealth, but merely for myself.

Mr. REID.—It is an extraordinary proposal, because there is nothing in the Constitution which authorizes that view.

Mr. WATSON.—There is nothing in the Constitution to prevent us from following that course.

Mr. REID.—In this connexion, I may be pardoned for quoting the language of the Constitution itself. Section 125 says—

Such territory shall contain an area of not less than 100 square miles, and such portion thereof—That refers to the territory—not to the 100 square miles—as shall consist of Crown lands shall be granted to the Commonwealth without any payment therefor.

Mr. SPENCE.—According to the right honorable member's argument, the territory is limited to 100 square miles.

Mr. REID.—As a matter of legal interpretation, I take it to be so. But if I am right, the use of the word "shall" in connexion with more than the legal area is all the more objectionable. If we have a constitutional right to take more than 100 square miles—to take 900 square miles, for example—the use of the word "shall" is not so objectionable as it would be if we had a legal right to take only 100 square miles, and wished to acquire 900 square miles. In the latter case, the employment of the word "shall" in regard to the excess of 800 square miles becomes even worse than I have said; it becomes ludicrous. We cannot take territory from a State. We have no power to do so. We may acquire the properties of private individuals for the purpose of certain services of the Commonwealth, under the Property for Public Purposes Acquisition Act; but there is no power to take the territory of a State for Federal territory, except within the terms of section 125 of the Constitution. There is no other power which will enable this Parliament to read into that charter of Government 900 square miles for 100 square miles. Of course, the proposal to pay for any Crown lands outside an area of 100 square miles puts the project in a much fairer light, but it does not remove the difficulty that may be created by the wrong use of words. It rather intensifies my objection to that. If we have not the power to acquire 900 square miles, we have no right to say that the Federal territory "shall" consist of 900 square miles, because we are dealing with the property of others. Honorable members should always recollect that we are dealing with the property of others, under an agreement with them which is embodied in the Constitution. If we will not respect the terms of our own Constitution, where will our respect for the laws of the Commonwealth begin? We cannot consider New South Wales an out-cast State, in regard to which even the common courtesies of life are unnecessary. I am sure that there is no desire on the part of this Committee to treat New South Wales with any discourtesy. But since there is no desire to do that, why should we do it? We are intelligent business men, and the fact that we do not intend to say a wrong thing, is the strongest possible reason for not saying it. It is not a reason for saying it, and afterwards declaring that we do not mean it. The more we look into the matter the more objectionable does the use of the word "shall" appear. This provision really means that the Government shall endeavour to obtain an area of 900 square miles. If the proposal now put forward is indorsed by the Committee, the Government will be entitled to say, "We are prepared to pay for all Crown lands outside an area of 100 square miles." But such a declaration by the Committee will be merely in the nature of an instruction to the Government as their agents. It must not be an ultimatum to the Government of New South Wales. We do not intend to say to the Government and the people of that State, "We have settled all these matters in the Commonwealth. All you have to do is to listen to what we say, and to obey. You 'shall' give us a Federal territory of 900 square miles. It is true that the Constitution says that the area shall be not less than 100 square miles, and it is equally true that, from the point of view of law, it may be held that the area of the Federal Territory shall be something in reasonable proportion to 100 square miles, but we set all these considerations aside, and affirm that it shall not be less than 900 square miles." My first contention is that this clause ought not to be contained in the Bill. It is not cognate to the question of determining the Seat of Government of the Commonwealth, and is not covered by the title. I do not know whether that point has previously been raised, but I ask you, sir, to seriously consider it. I am not aware whether the Standing Orders of this House are exactly similar to those of the New South Wales Legislature; but in that State a rather strict rule has been laid down with reference to the inclusion in any Bill of matters which do not come within the scope of its title. I admit that the title of this measure can be altered in Committee, and the adoption of course would remove my objection. I am perfectly competent for honorable members to alter the title of the Bill, and have no desire to take advantage of a technical objection.

Mr. Reid.

Mr. WATSON.—Only the order of the Bill governs the Bill here.

Mr. REID.—Quite so. An objection to the title of a Bill can be removed by the Committee, and on that ground I will not labour the question. But the other principle has also to be observed, namely, that the clauses of a Bill shall be relevant to its scope. I submit that the scope of this measure is limited to the determination of the site for the Seat of Government, and that the intrusion into it of an ultimatum that the Federal territory—which is a different matter altogether—shall embrace an area of not less than 900 square miles is not relevant to its scope.

Mr. WATSON.—We are considering the Bill which originated in the Senate.

Mr. REID.—I do not think that fact affects the rules relating to Bills. The same rules govern us just as fully in the case of Bills which originate in the Senate as they do in the case of other Bills.

The CHAIRMAN.—There was no objection to leave granted in this case.

Mr. REID.—I am not discussing the order of leave. My object is to point out that this particular clause is not relevant to the scope of the Bill. If, in this measure, which has been introduced for the purpose of determining the site of the Seat of Government, we dealt with the question of the kind of Houses of Parliament which should be erected there, or with the expenditure to which their erection should be limited, I should consider such stipulations foreign to its scope. If the rules are not observed, we can put anything in the world in a Bill. In a measure to determine the Seat of Government we might introduce a clause which was designed to alter the criminal law. Of course the rules of parliamentary procedure are intended to prevent such abuse of legislation. Every Bill is supposed to be confined to the subjects which are relevant to its objects. I consider that this stipulation that the Federal territory shall contain an area of 900 square miles put in the form of an express condition the effect of which is that we shall have the Capital Site unless that area can be secured, is irrelevant to the scope of the measure. If, with this provision in the ill, the Government approached the Government of New South Wales and effected an admirable arrangement for the acquisition of 850 square miles of the best territory of that State, they would be obliged to return to Parliament and ask for its repeal. On the other hand, if we merely express an opinion that the Federal Territory should contain not less than 100 square miles, the Government will not be hampered in that way. I object to the clause in its entirety. I should like our views upon this matter to be put in a form in which they would express our opinion without making use of imperative language. If, instead of the words "and shall contain an area not less than 900 square miles," we provided "and it is desirable that the area of such territory should be not less than 900 square miles" the clause would be absolutely clear as an expression of opinion on the part of the Committee, and the Government would know exactly what area we thought should be acquired. In that event, however, if an area of 800 square miles were offered the Government would be free to accept it.

Mr. CROUCH.—If the right honorable member were Prime Minister he would be content with an area of 100 square miles.

Mr. REID.—What is the use of the honorable and learned member talking of what I would do if I were Prime Minister, when on every occasion that there is a chance of my obtaining that office he votes against me and against his own convictions. I am only one of the humble leaders of the Opposition.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Long may the honorable member remain so.

Mr. REID.—A number of my best friends say the same, although they are influenced by an opposite motive. If the Committee merely desires to express its opinion in a courteous way it should agree to the amendment which I have suggested.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Would the substitution of the word "should" for "shall" do?

Mr. REID.—It would be an improvement, but would be rather within the category of language which I think unfortunate. The Committee would express its views just as clearly if the amendment which I suggest were made, and the Government would have a much better chance of being liberally dealt with than they would if we approached New South Wales with a club and said, "We shall have 900 square miles of territory." It is only a mere question of verbiage. If we were at the end of our negotiations—if the Commonwealth Government found that they were met in an unfair way, that the response of the Government of New South Wales to their friendly overtures was couched in unreasonable and dictatorial language—then no one would object to their asserting their manhood and independence by employing words of equal strength. But I do not wish dictatorial and domineering language to be introduced at the beginning of what we hope will be friendly negotiations. If I went to the Attorney-General in a friendly way to settle a matter in which he had some voice, I should not begin by saying—"Look here, Mr. Attorney-General, you must give me so and so." If I did the Attorney-General would reply—"Now, Mr. Reid, do not you think we had better leave fighting to some other time? Had we not better see if we cannot meet in a friendly way, without using the word 'must' or 'shall'?" Every man of common-sense would say at once if I were to adopt such an attitude—"What sort of a man is he to conduct negotiations when he blunders at the start by insulting the other party?"

Mr. WILKS.—The use of the word "should" would be better; it is not so imperative as "shall."

Mr. REID.—I should not object to the use of the word "should." It would certainly be a vast improvement, for although it is a strong word, it is not dictatorial. A man might say—"It is my opinion, and the area should be 900 square miles"; but if he said—"It is my opinion, and it shall be 900 square miles," he would, in effect, at once introduce the shillelah. This is after all a mere phrase, but I should not take up the time of the Committee in discussing it if I did not think there was something in my objection. We do not wish to expose ourselves to criticism by the use of language which is unnecessary. It is open to us to express our views just as clearly without the use of an ultimatum. The interests involved in the working together of the Commonwealth and a State in a friendly way are surely much greater than are those at issue when two dealers are haggling over a bargain of £50. If hagglers over the smallest bargains begin their negotiations with courtesy, I think we might well emulate their example in dealing with our national affairs. In this particular case, we are not legislating for the Commonwealth. The use of the word

"shall" is perfectly proper when the Commonwealth wishes to impose a law relating to matters within its own jurisdiction; but in this Bill we are dealing with something different. We are approaching New South Wales in a matter of mutual concern, and with a desire to arrive at a mutually friendly settlement. This is not an enactment, but an expression of opinion as to what we think desirable. A man may hold as firmly as he pleases to his opinions without commencing his negotiations in an at all offensive way. I therefore throw out this suggestion to the Government. The clause will be discussed for some little time, and there will be ample opportunity for the Government to think over my proposal. I should be extremely glad if the Government would even go so far as to introduce the word "should" in place of the word "shall." If that amendment were made, we should give clear expression to our opinion without using language which, to say the least, would be unfriendly, before the merits of the question came to be discussed. As to the substantial point at issue, I am against so large an area as 900 square miles being taken from New South Wales, unless that State itself agrees to give it. If New South Wales were willing to part with 900 square miles of territory, my objection would not be so great; but I should still think that it would be a misfortune for the Commonwealth to become entangled in the control of a larger area of territory than is necessary for the exact purposes of the Federal Capital. That would be a mistake. If we acquired so large an area we should find ourselves in the same position as is Congress in relation to Washington. So far as the people living within the boundaries of the Federal territory are concerned, the Parliament of the United States has to play the part of a municipality; it has to pass municipal laws, as if it were a municipal council. There is no municipal council there.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The territory is under five Commissioners.

Mr. REID.—But under the direct control of Congress.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—They have no municipal council; the whole business is run on military lines.

Mr. REID.—Exactly; but the Congress of the United States is the legislative body. The Commissioners administer the territory under the Government of the United States. I doubt the wisdom of the Federal Government entangling itself in matters relating to municipal government.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We should have to do that even if we secured an area of 100 square miles.

Mr. REID.—The smaller the area the less irksome would be the task.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—But the same machinery would be necessary.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We have more power to make laws for the Federal territory than has Congress to make laws for the Federal territory of the United States. Under the Constitution we may give representation to the Federal territory, and make laws relating not merely to municipal matters.

Mr. REID.—Perhaps so. That would represent a different state of things. I wish to point out that I am not speaking of any voluntary agreement—by mutual agreement the territory may be as large as we like—but of our view of the matter, subject to the opinion of New South Wales. We must not forget that when the bargain was made it was a bargain for a Federal territory, for one purpose only—a Federal territory, as the home of the Federal Capital. If it had been whispered to the people of New South Wales that under the bargain by which that State agreed to find room for a Federal city we were to obtain room for experiments in land systems—to split up the territory of New South Wales in order that certain views, sound or unsound, might be—

Mr. WATSON.—What sort of experiments could we make in an area of 900 square miles? It is ridiculous to suggest such a thing.

Mr. REID.—Is it not ridiculous to urge in support of the proposal that an area of 900 square miles shall be acquired that we desire to have room to make experiments in land legislation?

Mr. WATSON.—I have never suggested anything of the kind; I have merely supported the acquiring of an area of 900 square miles, because of a belief that we should retain the unearned increment to the Commonwealth. It is not with a view to experimenting that I support the taking over of so large an area.

Mr. REID.—Quite so; but the honorable gentleman will understand that such remarks have been made?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—By the other side.

Mr. REID.—I do not say that the Government have expressed such views; but I think that the supporters of the clause as it stands gave it as one of their reasons for suggesting that we should acquire—

Mr. BATCHELOR.—20,000 square miles.

Mr. WILKS.—Why not make these experiments in British New Guinea?

Mr. REID.—I think we had better experiment with some of these schemes in British New Guinea. There would be an abundance of room for them, and a certain amount of glory would attach to the work. I wish that the Minister of External Affairs would go to British New Guinea and talk to the savages there about the unearned increment.

Mr. HUGHES.—I propose to go up there and address them on that subject.

Mr. REID.—Then the honorable and learned gentleman will have a big military force handy. The unearned increment! That is a rather vague expression, which might be applied to a very large area. We might apply it to the whole of New South Wales.

Mr. WATSON.—It is very small.

Mr. REID.—It was an argument used in support of the proposal to bury the Capital at Tooma. It is suggested that we shall obtain such an enormous advantage that the further we go from Sydney the better the bargain will be. I know, of course, that the Prime Minister does not suggest anything of the kind. The House may desire to see a large area secured; but we must not forget that the bargain did not contemplate anything but provision for accommodating the Federal Capital. Nothing beyond that was included in the compact. The moment we enter upon questions as to the unearned increment we may extend the area in a very indefinite way.

Mr. WATSON.—The increment of value will not extend more than ten or fifteen miles in either direction.

Mr. REID.—I do not know. That might be an argument for acquiring far more than 100 square miles of territory, especially if the land belonged to some one else. I think the Attorney-General will admit that if the expression in the Constitution, "not less than 100 square miles," be submitted to the Court, it will not be held to be so elastic that under it we may take as much more as we please. I do not think that legal construction is so loose as to allow of that interpretation where the property of another is to be taken. I do not, however, expect the Attorney-General to at once give me an opinion on that question. An area of 100 square miles would be a thoroughly reasonable one for the purposes of the Federal Capital. It is, of course, a mere matter of opinion; I may be absolutely wrong, and those who think that an area of 900 square miles should be acquired may be correct; but, whatever our opinions may be, the shortest way to secure what we desire, is to begin by treating the person with whom we have to deal in as courteous a way as possible.

Mr. HUGHES.—If we are to acquire an area of only 100 square miles, there will be no occasion to strike out the word "shall," because the Constitution provides that the area "shall" not be less than 100 square miles.

Mr. REID.—I feel sure that the majority of the Committee is quite against the view that an area of only 100 square miles should be acquired; but it is unnecessary to use the word "shall."

Mr. HUGHES.—The use of the word would not be considered discourteous.

Mr. REID.—I have never said that it is discourteous to ask for an area of 900 square miles. All that I say is that when one is asking a man to give him something, it is discourteous to say, "You shall give me such and such a thing." It is proposed to say to New South Wales, "You shall give us 900 square miles of territory."

Mr. HUGHES.—It is proposed to acquire that area.

Mr. REID.—But a grant is involved.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The area is to be granted or acquired.

Mr. REID.—The Constitution provides that—Such territory shall contain—the word "shall" is used there in one sense—an area of not less than 100 square miles, and such portion thereof as shall consist of Crown lands—

there "shall" is used in another sense—shall be granted to the Commonwealth—that is absolute—without any payment therefor.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Is there an area of 100 square miles of Crown lands or anything like it in the proposed Federal territory?

Mr. REID.—There are Crown lands in the proposed Federal area, and whether they comprise an area of 100 square miles or of 900 square miles, they are to be given to the Commonwealth.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—But, as a matter of fact, the Crown lands there do not represent anything like 100 square miles.

Mr. REID.—I do not say for a moment that they do. I do not think that we should find an area of 100 square miles of Crown land in any possible site for a Federal Capital; but if there be only one or fifty square miles of Crown land within the territory the land is to be given to us without payment, although it may be the most valuable in that part of the State. It might consist of a timber or a water reserve, for various reserves are to be found, and they sometimes comprise the best land that is left. If we were asking a man to give us a sheet of note-paper and some envelopes, we should address him in courteous terms; we should not say, "You shall give us a sheet of note-paper and six envelopes." That is an illustration of the point that I desire to emphasize. It is a mere matter of expressing our opinion in a courteous way. I hope that the Government will give effect to the view which I have expressed. It is easy to say "shall." We can all say "shall." But people who begin with "shall" often end differently. Amongst the civilized nations the word "shall" is generally used when negotiations have been broken off. I sincerely hope that the Government will consider the suggestion which I have made, which enables those who believe in having an area of 900 square miles, to express their opinion just as forcibly, though not in mandatory language. Personally, as I have said, I am altogether against the 900 square miles area, but on that point I feel that I am in a minority. I believe that the majority of the Committee is against me.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Up to this stage the Government have treated the Bill as an open question. But the Government do not treat the matter of area as an open question by any means. They are in favour of acquiring an area of 900 square miles, as proposed in the Bill.

Mr. WILKS.—Do they want a model territory or a model Capital?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—If the honorable member will curtail his impatience he will hear what we want. There has never been any desire on the part of this Government to start a new territory or a new State. An area of 900 square miles would make a very poor sort of territory or State for Australia. One could ride through that extent of country on a bicycle, or in a motor-car, in a little over an hour. The honorable member for Wentworth would probably through it in less than that time.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—And without a

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Do I understand honorable gentleman to say that the Government will insist upon this area?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is not an open question, as the other provisions of the Bill were.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But do they insist upon 900 square miles?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member is surely misunderstanding me intentionally. I say that the Government do not treat this as an open question. The Government treated the question as where the Seat of Government should be entirely as an open one.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The Government divided to conquer, but on this question they unite to conquer.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Now, we unite to conquer. The Government consider not less than the 900 square miles should be taken. When I say "taken," I mean that that area should be selected—should be comprised within territory to be acquired by or granted to the Commonwealth Government for the establishment of a Seat of Government. The right honorable member for East Sydney stated that the measure was declaratory; that it was an enacting measure. Of course that is true. It does not really enact anything. It is a direct expression of the opinion of the Committee, and an instruction to the Government. It is a basis of negotiation on which the Government must act.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It ought to have been expressed in a resolution not in an Act of Parliament.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That consideration is immaterial now.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is quite right in the form of a Bill.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is an instruction to the Government to negotiate for 900 square miles.

Mr. REID.—Not to negotiate; it says we must have it. They cannot take less.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Of course, the Government cannot come to a final agreement, in any case.

Mr. WILKS.—It is a declaration at the point of a revolver to New South Wales.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is nothing of the kind. This Parliament will ultimately have to decide upon the area to be acquired.

Mr. REID.—Oh, no; surely the Government will give New South Wales a word about an acre or so.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Did not the right honorable member hear me say “ultimately”? We cannot delegate our powers to the New South Wales Parliament, and this Parliament cannot delegate its powers altogether to the Government.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What is this Bill for?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is a starting point for negotiations with New South Wales, in which this House lays down in no uncertain terms the area which it thinks desirable.

Mr. REID.—The Bill does not say “desirable.”

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Is not any resolution of this House, or any measure that we pass, an expression of the opinion of the House?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is a Bill to “determine” the Seat of Government.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Yes; it is a Bill to determine where the Seat of Government shall be; and within that Bill to determine the site, we also say that the territory to be granted to or acquired by the Commonwealth shall contain an area of not less than 900 square miles. As far as the language of the measure goes—that is to say so far as concerns the objection that it is altogether too mandatory to use the word “shall”—the Government really do not feel very strongly on the point.

Mr. ISAACS.—What other word could we use if we wish to enact?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We cannot directly enact by this measure.

Mr. ISAACS.—But we do enact. We cannot take the land, but we enact the will of this Parliament that the territory shall consist of such an area.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Yes; that is the light in which the matter has been regarded throughout.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Government cannot alter a word of the Bill when it is passed.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not think it matters greatly whether the word “shall” or the word “should” is used.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The Constitution says that the Parliament shall determine “the Seat of Government,” but not the territory.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—All that we are able to do is to say that we wish to obtain 900 square miles for the purposes of the Seat of Government, and we do not desire to adopt any method of placing our views before the Government of New South Wales that may be considered by them to be unnecessarily offensive.

Mr. ISAACS.—Do the Government say that the Bill might read that the Seat of Government “should be” at Dalgety?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Certainly not.

Mr. ISAACS.—Why not?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Seat of Government “shall be” at Dalgety.

Mr. ISAACS.—Why is not that as offensive as the other phrase?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Because the Constitution gives us the power to determine the Seat of Government; but it does not give us the power to say that we shall have 900 square miles.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—As a matter of fact, as I have said, I do not think it matters very much whether we use the term “shall” or “should” in this Bill, so long as it is recognised that it is an instruction to the Government to negotiate on these lines for 900 square miles. The word cannot make any difference, because the terms which the Government will adopt in approaching New South Wales will be precisely the same in either case.

Mr. REID.—Then the Government will be more polite than their masters. Why should we not be as polite as the Government are going to be?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—This question was debated at some length on the occasion when the Seat of Government Bill was under consideration during the last Parliament. A vote was taken on this very point—whether the word “shall” or the word “should” should be used; and I find that a majority of eighteen decided in favour of the word “should,” which was substituted for “shall.”

Mr. CROUCH.—Then, why did the Government use the word “shall” in this Bill?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The measure came down from the Senate in this form. I might point out that amongst those who voted in favour of the word “should,” were the Prime Minister and several honorable members who are now sitting on this side of the Chamber. Consequently, the word “shall” was eliminated as being too mandatory. In my opinion, the chief reason for adopting the word “should” as against “shall” is that it is more likely to lead to an early satisfactory result. Because there has been, and appears to be, on the part of New South Wales, an idea that this Commonwealth Parliament is anxious—to adopt an expression which has been used in some quarters—to plunder New South Wales of a portion of her territory.

Mr. WILKS.—The representative of the Government in the Senate last session asked for 20,000 square miles.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That honorable gentleman stated this session that he was still in favour of 20,000 square miles, but that does not prove that this Parliament, or this Government, are in favour of asking for 20,000 square miles.

Mr. KELLY.—Did not this Bill originate with Senator McGregor?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member knows perfectly well who introduced the Bill in the Senate.

Mr. WILKS.—That statement was enough to frighten New South Wales.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member knows that no such request was made by this Parliament, or this Government, nor was it made by any section of this House. Because one member of the Senate—

Mr. WILKS.—The representative of the Government.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—He was not the representative of the Government then. The Government was not in existence at that time. I want to say a few words as to the reason why a larger area is suggested. It has been stated that this provision will deprive New South Wales of a large part of her territory. In speaking on the second reading of the Bill I said that 900 square miles was only the size of a moderate sheep or cattle run. I say again that it is nothing more than that. Nine hundred square miles is thirty miles by thirty. It is by no means a large extent of territory. New South Wales, during periods of her history, has parted with very much more extensive areas. The State of Victoria was a portion of New South Wales at one time. It is nearly 90,000 square miles in extent. Queensland was also a portion of New South Wales. It is 600,000 square miles in extent. There is more outcry over the 900 square miles that it is now proposed to take jointly, on behalf of all the States, including New South Wales, than there was over the cession of 600,000 square miles when the State of Queensland was formed.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The outcry is about the demand for the area.

Mr. SPENCE.—The outcry is amongst a few politicians, and is raised for party purposes.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It has been said that New South Wales will suffer a very great deprivation. It was pointed out during the second-reading debate that the unimproved value of the alienated land within a radius of seventeen miles of Dalgety is £352,000. The value of the land with improvements is £460,200.

Mr. EWING.—What is the value of the Crown land?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not know, but we can be pretty certain that the value of the Crown land will be very much less than the value of the alienated land. Those are the valuations for taxation purposes. What really will be the effect of the Commonwealth taking over this territory? The Crown lands not now in occupation will be handed over as a free gift to the Commonwealth, but really all that New South Wales will part with is the jurisdiction of this territory.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—And the revenue from taxation.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The power of taxation; but against the revenue from taxation there is expenditure to be considered, and the honorable member must see that a corollary to the power of taxation is the expenditure of the public funds of New South Wales on roads, bridges, schools, houses, and other such Government works.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It is very great just there.

Mr. WATSON.—It is considerably more than the revenue.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The revenue may be precious little, because within this area there are only 3,586 people altogether. We have had some talk about a population of 40,000.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That was for a larger area.

Mr. WATSON.—For the same area—900 square miles.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We could take Bombala, and the population of the territory would then only reach 7,000.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I point out that under clause 2 there is a larger area defined—150 miles long.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Mr. Carruthers was speaking of the proposal to take an area of 900 square miles. It was never proposed in the Senate, or anywhere else, that the area to be acquired should be larger than that. A certain area is defined clause 2, as it came down to us, but the honorable member is aware that the area proposed to be taken is only some 900 square miles within the area defined by that clause. I repeat that the only effect that will follow the taking over of this territory by the Commonwealth is that the authority having jurisdiction over it will be changed from the New South Wales Parliament to the Commonwealth Parliament. We shall have to pay the cost of government, and we shall receive the revenue from taxation, such as it is. Undoubtedly for some considerable time the Government expenditure will far exceed the revenue derived from the territory. The object of the proposal, of course, is simply that, as the Commonwealth Parliament, representing the people of Australia, will have to pay whatever expenditure is incurred in governing this territory, any increased value which may be considered unearned increment should be retained by the Commonwealth.

Mr. LIDDELL.—Why should not the Government of New South Wales get it?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Why should the people of Western Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and South Australia contribute to enrich the few land-holders who live in this district?—Can the honorable member give any reason which will justify us in increasing the value of the holdings of the people living there now by Commonwealth expenditure? If we can retain the enhanced value due to Commonwealth expenditure for the people of the Commonwealth we should do so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Whatever the area decided upon may be the land-owners adjoining will benefit from Commonwealth expenditure.

Mr. BATCHELOR. — They will, to some extent; but the contention is that we should take a reasonable area. The real question between honorable members opposite and other honorable members is as to where we should draw the line, and we propose to draw the line where we think we are justified in drawing it from the experience of great cities such as the Federal city may become. No one, at all events, can say that it will not become a large centre of population.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Do the Government propose to include Twofold Bay in the Federal territory?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Government make no such proposal. What we say is that the sphere of influence of the Federal city, if it should become a large city—and that is one of the possibilities of the future—is likely to extend over a certain area. We say further that we have a right to retain for the Commonwealth any enhanced value of the land due to the influence of the Federal city. It is useless to say that we should have an area of 5,000 square miles for that purpose, because the sphere of influence of the Federal city could not appreciably extend so far. But we know that in the case of Melbourne and Sydney this sphere of influence can and does extend to a much greater distance than thirty miles from the General Post Office in either of those cities. The proposal is not submitted in order to carry out experiments in the nationalization of the land, or anything of the sort. It was put forward by Sir Edmund Barton, when Prime Minister, as an absolutely business proposal, and supported strongly by Sir William McMillan, who was acting-leader of the Opposition at the time.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That the territory should be 900 square miles in extent?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—No, the idea of the non-alienation of land and the retention of the unearned increment.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH. — Sir William McMillan said it would make an interesting experiment in land nationalization.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is not quite what the honorable gentleman said. I looked up and quoted what he said when speaking on the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MCCOLL.—The Minister said just now that the Commonwealth would exercise jurisdiction over this territory; do the Government propose to dispossess the present private owners?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The land will be acquired by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. MCCOLL.—And will change owners.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Of course, there will be a change in the ownership of the land. Those who are now Crown lessees will, after the land has been taken over by the Commonwealth, be still Crown lessees, but lessees of the Commonwealth, and not of the New South Wales Government; whilst, so far as private owners are concerned, they will hold their land from the Commonwealth.

Mr. EWING.—But the Commonwealth Government will buy them out?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Yes, and we shall give them the absolute value of their land.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—What need is there to put that in this Bill?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We are not putting that in this Bill. We are not, in this Bill, laying down any system of land tenure. We do not here say that the land shall not be sold, or anything of the kind. All that we propose to say here is that a certain area shall be acquired as Federal territory, and that it shall be large enough to take in what we consider will be the sphere of influence of Federal expenditure on the Capital.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Government insist, I understand, that the area shall be 900 square miles in extent?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Government do insist upon that. But we do not propose to go to the New South Wales Government and say, "We insist upon 900 square miles." We desire, if possible, to come to an agreement with the New South Wales Government, and we have no reason to believe that they will not agree to the proposal we make. What is proposed cannot be held to be a disadvantage to New South Wales, nor will it be any disadvantage to the people resident within the territory. There will be a change of jurisdiction and Government in respect to the territory, and that is practically all the effect that the taking over of this land by the Commonwealth will have.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—But, instead of remaining owners, the existing owners of land within the territory will become lessees of the Commonwealth Government?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is a question to be decided afterwards, when the policy governing land tenure is adopted.

Mr. WATSON.—But we are not going to allow private ownership to continue in the heart of the Capital city.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Of course not, but we are not now threshing out the details of the system of ownership to be adopted. I hope that the Committee will adhere to the area proposed by the Government. The question whether we should use the word "shall" or "should" does not appear to me to be of special importance.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I refrained from saying anything in moving the amendment, because I thought there would be but little debate. In the first place, I am very much interested in hearing the Minister say that this matter of the area of the Federal territory is not to be an open question, as other provisions of the Bill and other parts of the procedure have been. But when the honorable member makes a distinction of that kind, I wish he would be a little more explicit, and would tell the Committee just what he do mean. Are we to understand that if an area other than that proposed by the Government is carried by the Committee the Government will refuse to go with the Bill?

Mr. WATSON.—No.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That would be the general acceptance of such a declaration as has been made.

Mr. WATSON.—We have said that it has been an open question with Ministers, as some provisions of the Bill. They have voted against each other in the matter of the selection of the site, for example; but this matter of the area is a Government question.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But, so far as Ministerial responsibility is concerned, it still to be an open question?

Mr. WATSON.—Not at all. It is a Ministerial question. We are in agreement upon it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Are we to understand that the Committee may do as they please, and that the intention only is that the Ministry shall vote together on the matter.

Mr. WATSON.—Certainly.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then I understand the position. I look upon this matter in the light of the genesis of the whole proceeding in another place. I put the statements made use of in arguing the question in another place alongside the very attenuated statements which have been made by Ministers in this Chamber. When the question had its rise in another Chamber under the control of the Government, and certainly without any effort on their part to check or curb the extravagant language there indulged in—

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Bill of last year provided for an area of 1,000 square miles.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It was acknowledged that the original intention was to make socialistic experiments.

Mr. WATSON.—On 900 square miles I gave the honorable member credit for more intelligence.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the Prime Minister would be more patient, and refrain from interjection, he would hear what I have to say.

Mr. WATSON.—There is no proposal of the Government for any larger area.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I can say that a member of the Labour Party in another place proposed an area the sides of which would be seventy-five miles long, and he changed that subsequently to an area containing 5,000 square miles. His idea was, and he made no secret of it, to give the various States an object lesson, not only in land nationalization, but also in the nationalization of industries.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member is only knocking down a straw.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable gentleman may fine it down as he pleases, but he is aware that it was intended that a social experiment should be undertaken, and that that was the root of the whole proposal.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is utter nonsense.

Mr. WATSON.—On 900 square miles?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Prime Minister has said that the Government desire to retain the unearned increment, or to get as much of it as possible, for the citizens of the Commonwealth.

Mr. WATSON.—I should say so, and so would any other patriotic man.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is not that a social experiment?

Mr. WATSON.—Not of the nature at which the honorable member is hinting.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable gentleman is too impatient to listen to me. I say that he is anxious to make a social experiment, and I think I do the honorable gentleman no injustice in saying that.

Mr. WATSON.—I say that there is no social experiment in the retention of the freehold of the land.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is an experiment as applied to a whole country.

Mr. WATSON.—The Government, of which the honorable member was a member, carried that through in New South Wales, and I helped them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No; not in the same way.

Mr. WATSON.—In a more wholesale fashion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have no objection to what the honorable gentleman is proposing to do; but I see no reason for enlarging the area beyond what is prescribed in the Constitution.

Mr. WATSON.—It is not beyond what is prescribed by the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN.—Interjections are becoming rather too frequent. I suggest to the honorable member for Parramatta that he should not adopt the interrogative form of speech, and I ask Ministers not to interrupt the honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am only anxious for information, and I should like to address some more interrogations to Ministers. I want to know what is the intention of the Government in connexion with this matter; they have not yet explained. If the two Houses reach agreement, will the Bill be sent on in the ordinary way for the approval of the Governor-General? If so, I should like to know what the position of the Government will then be, as negotiators with the New South Wales Government? Can the Commonwealth Government say to the New South Wales Government, "We want to negotiate with you as to the area of the Federal Capital," and at the same time, say, "Here are our limitations, hard and fast, under the seal of the Governor-General"? How can the Commonwealth Government begin to negotiate in a matter which has already been determined by the Parliament?

Mr. ISAACS.—Are the Government to have no limitations?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes; and I think those limitations should have been prescribed in a series of resolutions affirming the opinion of this House.

Mr. ISAACS.—Where is the difference?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The difference is that we "determine" an area, and immediately instruct the Government to set about altering that area. Otherwise, where is the object of the negotiations?

Mr. GROOM.—If we fixed the area by resolution, would the position not be the same?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The difficulty I see is that here is a Bill to determine the Seat of Government; and I take it that when the act of determination is complete, the transaction is complete, so far as we are concerned. Yet we are told that Ministers, at that point, must begin to reopen the matter which we have just determined. The whole proceeding seems to my mind, if I may say so without offence, to be just a little absurd. The proper course would have been to get an expression of opinion as clear and definite as we chose—but still only an expression of opinion—from each of the two Houses of the Commonwealth Parliament, and when those expressions of opinion had been brought into agreement, to begin the negotiations. The Commonwealth Government will look very strange if, after we have determined the Seat of Government and its size, they have to begin to negotiate with an entirely different body for the purpose of settling these very matters. This clause seems to me to be entirely unnecessary; but if we do perpetrate this legislative absurdity—for I can call it nothing else—we had better stick to the terms of the Constitution. The amendment simply re-enacts the language of the Constitution, to which no exception can be taken. But when 900 square miles, or 5,000 square miles as has been suggested, or a square, each side of which is seventy-five miles long, is put forward as the irreducible area—

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It has not been said that the territory should be a square, each side of which should be seventy-five miles long.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But that was suggested in another place. I remind honorable members that the proposal to have an area of 5,000 square miles was only defeated by fourteen votes against ten—an almost equal division. We should, therefore, meet the other Chamber with a simple expression of our opinion that the terms of the Constitution ought to be adhered to, at any rate in this period of negotiation. It is time to fix our ultimate determination after the negotiations have been completed, and when New South Wales has had, as she is entitled to have, and as the Constitution contemplates she shall have, some voice as to the location and size of the Federal territory.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH (Parkes).—Like the honorable member who has just spoken, I carefully refrained from contributing to the series of debates which have taken place on this measure, because it was evident that a large enough number of honorable members were taking part in it to bring it sooner or later to a satisfactory settlement. But at this stage I feel compelled to repeat some observations which I made last year upon this very question. The honorable member who has just sat down, has expressed an opinion with which I heartily agree. It seems to me that the whole difficulty which has arisen is the result of a misconceived form of procedure. I ask honorable members to allow me to read that section of the Constitution dealing with this matter; and I think it will then be evident to everybody who regards the question from a thoroughly impartial stand-point, that the whole procedure in regard to this Bill is misconceived. I ask honorable members to place on section 125 of the Constitution an interpretation of an every-day, common-place character, and then to say whether we are not putting the cart before the horse. Section 125 is as follows:—

The Seat of Government of the Commonwealth shall be determined by the Parliament, and shall be within territory, which shall have been granted to or acquired by the Commonwealth, and shall be vested in, and belong to the Commonwealth. . . .

There is no mistake; the meaning is no land which shall be granted in the future but land which "shall have been granted or acquired by the Commonwealth. Any one who reads that section in an ordinary way can come to no other conclusion than that it was contemplated that this House should in some way or other, intimate to the State Parliament of New South Wales the particular territory within which it was desired to select a Capital site; that the New South Wales Government should then be invited by this House—not that this House should demand it—to place the territory, including the proposed site, at the disposal of the Parliament; and that this Parliament should then pass an Act determining the site within the territory which had been so granted to the New South Wales Parliament. It has been suggested, in the course of the debate that we should introduce into this Bill the word "should" instead of "shall."

Mr. McLEAN.—Would the honorable and learned member propose to first buy the land, and afterwards select the site?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—No, I should not; I should recommend that whatever area is determined upon should be communicated by resolution to the New South Wales Parliament; that the New South Wales Parliament should then be invited to place that territory at the disposal of the Federal Parliament; that the Federal Parliament should select its Capital site within that territory, and if it wanted further territory, the latter should be acquired either by Act of Parliament or by private purchase.

Mr. ISAACS.—Does the honorable and learned member say that the land has been granted by New South Wales before we determine the site?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The land should be granted before we determine the site.

Mr. ISAACS.—Before we know where we are going to have the site?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I refer to the honorable and learned member for his opinion to the Constitution. I am not saying what I wish, nor am I saying what honorable and learned member would like to have done. I am referring only to the Constitution to show what must be done in order to conform with its provisions.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does not that section of the Constitution simply mean that before the Capital is built, the land shall have been granted or acquired?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I ask the honorable member for Gippsland to apply to this question the same common sense which he would apply to any business transaction in which he was engaged. I understand the words "shall have been" in section 125 to mean something that has occurred beforehand; not something that is to occur in the future.

Mr. ISAACS.—Occurred before what?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—If the Constitution had intended that the Capital was to be within territory which should be granted in the future, it would have said, "which shall be granted," and not "which shall have been granted."

Mr. McLEAN.—I should construe that section to mean that the territory must be selected, then acquired, and the Seat of Government then built.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I am quite with the honorable member, who will see how the difficulty of the "shall" and "should" could have been got over. Instead of passing an Act of Parliament, laying it down in black and white where the territory shall be, of how much land it shall consist, and where the Capital city shall be, and thereby tying the hands of Ministers, who are supposed to negotiate, we should have passed a resolution merely intimating the wishes of the Federal Parliament, as to the particular site which it was desired should be placed at our disposal. Ministers would then have had a free hand to negotiate, and to induce the New South Wales Government to place that territory at our disposal; and as soon as the land had been granted, we should have been in a position to choose the Capital site.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable and learned member voted for "should" last year.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—After the Bill had been passed. But I shall repeat what I said in 1903. On that occasion, after reading section 125, I said—

Evidently the framers of the Constitution assumed either that some State would grant certain territory, or that the Commonwealth would acquire certain territory, before Parliament chose a site, and, therefore, the section provides that the Seat of Government shall be determined by the Parliament, not within territory which shall be granted or acquired, but within territory which shall have been granted or acquired. No territory has been granted or acquired, and yet we are asked to pass a Bill to determine the Seat of Government of the Commonwealth.

The CHAIRMAN.—I draw the attention of the honorable and learned member to the fact that we are discussing the word "nine," in relation to the question of the area, and not the word "shall."

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The question of the use of the word "shall" or "should" has been discussed at great length by the right honorable member for East Sydney, who has been answered by the Minister.

The CHAIRMAN.—I understood that the right honorable member for East Sydney was to conclude with an amendment which would have necessitated the withdrawal of the amendment now before the Committee.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I hope I shall be allowed to answer one observation made by the Minister.

The CHAIRMAN.—But if I allow the honorable and learned member to do that, I shall have to allow other honorable members the same latitude.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The debate has now gone on for two hours, and I have naturally come into it in order to deal with the questions which have been discussed.

The CHAIRMAN.—If the honorable member for Parramatta asks leave to withdraw his amendment, and the Committee agree to that course, it will be competent for the honorable and learned member for Parkes to discuss the word "shall."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I do not now propose to debate the question further whether the wishes of the House should have been expressed in the form of a Bill; it is too late to do so. Last year, on the same ground, I took this exception to the Seat of Government Bill when it was before the House. I expressed privately to the then Prime Minister the opinion which I am now expressing, namely, that having regard to the wording of section 125, the wishes of the House should have been expressed in the form of a resolution. That course would have got rid of all the difficulty about going to the Government of New South Wales, "pistol in hand"; it would have enabled Ministers to approach the Government of New South Wales, and negotiate with them, with a free hand, for the purpose of having certain territory placed at the disposal of this Parliament. To show that I am not speaking without authority, I ask the Committee to listen to the following passage from Quick and Garrahan's Annotated Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth:—

The chief question which has arisen in connexion with these words is whether the determination of the Seat of Government rests, in the last resort, solely with the Federal Parliament, or whether the Federal Parliament is limited in its choice to sites offered by the Parliament of New South Wales. The opening words of the section strongly favour the former view; but it has been argued that the words "shall be within territory which shall have been granted to or acquired by the Commonwealth" point to a prior Act of Cession by the Parliament of New South Wales.

Therefore I am not alone in the view I hold as to the meaning of the words in the Constitution, and I need not remind honorable members that in the interpretation of an Act of Parliament it is the commonly-accepted reading of a section which is taken by a Court. There cannot be two interpretations of the words "shall have been granted," because, if the Constitution had contemplated that the Federal Parliament would choose a site within territory to be granted in the future, as we are proposing to do, the words "shall have been granted" would not have been used. I do not, I say, contend that we should now seriously consider the substitution of a resolution for an Act of Parliament; but what I have said is a strong argument in favour of our limiting ourselves to the selection of a site. If, as the honorable member for Parramatta has pointed out, we not only provide in an Act of Parliament for the determination of a certain site, but lay down the area and the limitations of the Federal territory, our Ministers will have no power of negotiation. Imagine the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth approaching the Premier of New South Wales and saying, "The Parliament of the Commonwealth has passed an Act 'determining' where the Seat of Government shall be, and I now come to you, in accordance with the terms of the Constitution, to ask you to place certain territory at our disposal." The Premier of New South Wales might be willing to talk about it; but the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth would have to say, "I cannot negotiate with you, because the Federal Parliament has determined where the Seat of Government shall be, and what the limitations and the area of the Federal territory shall be." If he came back to this House and proposed the acceptance of a smaller area than we determined upon, we should be in the extraordinary position of having demanded by Act of Parliament, something which should have to subsequently forego. Would this Parliament then pass an amending bill going back upon the original measure? If the Minister in charge of the Bill how would propose to act under such circumstances. If the Premier of New South Wales said, "The Constitution provides that the Commonwealth shall have not less than 100 square miles, and we are willing to give you 200 or 300 square miles, but will not entertain a demand for 900 square miles, we should be in the rather unpleasant position of having determined upon a certain territory which we could not get." The Premier of New South Wales might well say, "You have followed a wrong procedure. Under the Constitution you should have come to us, and told us where you desired your Capital site to be. Then we should have asked you to place at your disposal such territory as you want, and as we are willing to give. Afterwards, it would be for you to determine where the Capital should be within the territory then granted by us." I do not, I repeat, make the impracticable proposal that we should revert to the passing of a resolution; but, having made the mistake of passing in a Bill what should have been in the form of a motion—a measure which has been pointed out more than once, both to the last Government and to this Government—we should take care that the measure is sufficiently elastic to give Ministers a free hand, subject to the confirmation of Parliament, to negotiate with the Government of New South Wales. This can be done only by limiting ourselves to an expression of opinion, such as we have in clause 2, as to where the Seat of Government should be. Having done this, and a debate having taken place as to what should be the extent of the Commonwealth territory, we should refrain from passing clause 3, and leave it to Ministers to negotiate with the Government of New South Wales on the subject.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Could we not indicate what area we desire?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Yes; but the honorable member sees the objection which has been offered to the use, in the Bill, of any other word than the word "shall." The right honorable member for East Sydney has pointed out, it would be very wise to introduce into clause 3 a direction torial direction as to the area which the Government of New South Wales should place at our disposal. I see very grave objection to the proposed insertion of the words "not less than 900 square miles." I know that there are certain honorable members—though I am not aware who they are—who think that the harbor of Twofold Bay should be within the Federal territory. If that be agreed upon, whatever territory is arranged for should extend down to the sea, and include Twofold Bay; but if Dalgety were chosen as the site of the Seat of Government, more than 900 square miles of territory would be required to take in that Bay, because its distance from Dalgety is 110 miles.

MR. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Seventy miles is the exact distance.

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—An honorable member who I believe to be well versed in the subject has stated that the distance is 110 miles. That being so, if we selected Dalgety, and wished to take in Twofold Bay, we should have to arrange for a territory 110 miles long and eight or nine miles broad, which would be an absurdity. If, on the other hand, it is intended to acquire all the country within thirty miles of the Seat of Government, in order to preserve to the Commonwealth whatever value may be added to it by the presence of the Capital, it will be impossible to take in Twofold Bay. I ask honorable members whether they have any data for a reasonable expectation that there will be any great increment of value. Every one who regards the probable future of the Capital without enthusiastic and wild expectation, must arrive at the conclusion that it cannot become a great commercial centre. Commercial centres are not made; they evolve out of the economic circumstances of the country. One cannot, by establishing the Parliament in a certain place, evolve a commercial centre out of the few hotels and boarding-houses which will be erected for the convenience of those who have to go there.

MR. WEBSTER.—Not without other attractions.

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—If the circumstances of the city are such as to make it an attractive sanatorium for the whole of Australia, a small town may grow up, such as Bowral or Moss Vale, where a large number of people may go in the summer months; but honorable members have only to look at the sanatoria of Australia of thirty years' growth to see that the expected increment will be infinitesimal. To suppose that there is going to be any substantial increment at a distance of fifteen miles on either side of the Parliament House, in a district where commerce has never shown an inclination to concentrate, is not worthy of sensible men, nor would the probability justify the incurring of responsibility in holding an unnecessarily large tract of land. I shall, therefore, if the occasion arises, vote against the proposal to determine that the area of the Seat of Government shall be not less than 900 square miles. We have no right to ask New South Wales to cede such an area. The Minister instanced the separation of Victoria and of Queensland as still greater concessions, but that was an entirely different matter. At the time, New South Wales was an enormous territory which had not developed to anything like the present importance of the State; and to secure better local Government, a large part of the southern portion was made into the new Colony of Victoria, while the State of Queensland was divided off on the north. What right have we, however, when the people of New South Wales have accepted a Constitution providing for a territory of "not less than 100 square miles," to ask them to place at our disposal nine times that area?

MR. WEBSTER.—The Constitution does not say definitely that the area shall be 100 square miles.

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—I admit that the Constitution says "not less than 100 square miles"; but if we were to ask our constituents for £1,000 a year, on the ground that Parliament has the power to increase our remuneration to that amount, or if the Governor-General were to say—"It is provided in the Constitution that I am to have not less than £10,000 per annum, and therefore I ask for £50,000," the people would stand aghast. The people of New South Wales would regard the request for a larger area of territory for the Seat of Government in a similar manner. If this clause were omitted altogether we should be in the same position that we should have occupied if a resolution had been adopted. The Bill might then be regarded as a rather didactical expression of opinion on the part of this Parliament that we desired the Capital to be at such and such a place. It would then be open, and it is desirable that it should be open, for the Government to approach New South Wales and ask—not demand, but ask—them to place at the disposal of the Commonwealth Parliament such territory, of an area of not less than 100 square miles, as they felt disposed to give us. I submit, therefore, that although the Government have taken an entirely wrong course in bringing in a Bill instead of submitting a resolution, we should now do our best to so frame the Bill that it will indicate clearly what the Commonwealth Parliament desires with regard to the position of the site, at the same time leaving as much flexibility as possible for the negotiations between the Government and New South Wales. We should not pass a Bill laying down in definite terms what shall be the area of the territory, because if we do so we shall inevitably tie the hands of the Government, and assume a somewhat offensive attitude towards the Government of New South Wales, which may stand much in the way of our success in dealing with them.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I have the misfortune to differ very materially from the honorable and learned member for Parkes. I think we should be very careful to remember our duties as well as our rights under the Constitution, and that it has been committed to the Federal Parliament to determine the site of the Federal Capital, and the extent of the area of the Federal territory.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Without limit.

Mr. ISAACS.—Without any further limit than the reasonable discretion of this Parliament.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Where does the Constitution give us that authority?

Mr. ISAACS.—I am astonished that any honorable member should overlook, not merely the right, but the duty, of this Parliament to exercise its discretion as to the matters intrusted to it.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Yes, as to the Seat of Government, not the Federal territory.

Mr. ISAACS.—Does the honorable member mean to say that the Constitution committed to the Government of New South Wales the sole right to determine the area of the Federal territory? Does any honorable member mean to say that we have nothing to do but to determine the spot upon which the Federal Capital shall be built, and that, even as to that, we are to go cap-in-hand to the New South Wales Government; that we are to admit that it is only by their permission that the place we think most desirable can be selected as the site of the Seat of Government, and that if they do not choose to give us that site we shall perforce have to go wherever else they wish? New South Wales made it an essential part of the bargain that the Federal Capital should be established within that State, and with that condition, and the further limitation that the Capital should not be within 100 miles of Sydney, the Constitution provides that it shall be left to the discretion of the Federal Parliament to determine where the Capital shall be, and that the Capital when established shall be within territory of a certain size at least. When the Federal Parliament has determined in its wisdom where the Capital shall be, and what area shall be embraced within the territory surrounding it, then, and then only, will the New South Wales Government be free to exercise its discretion and accede to our request or refuse it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Then, according to the honorable and learned member's argument, we are at the mercy of New South Wales?

Mr. ISAACS.—Not solely at the mercy of New South Wales. The argument used by some honorable members would lead us to suppose that this Parliament has nothing to say with regard to the determination of the Seat of Government. I contend, however, that this Parliament has not only the first word, but also the last word, although New South Wales also has necessarily some voice in the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON.—How does the honorable member view the provision in the Constitution that the Capital shall be situated within territory "which shall have been granted to or acquired by the Commonwealth."

Mr. ISAACS.—The Constitution provides that the Seat of Government shall be determined by the Parliament of the Commonwealth. It may be determined at any time. It is further provided that the Seat of Government shall be—that is, when it exists—within territory which shall have been granted to or acquired by the Commonwealth. That is to say, we can determine now, or at any future time where the Capital shall be. But when it is established—at the moment of its establishment—it shall be within territory which shall have been already granted to or acquired by the Commonwealth. The granting to the Commonwealth, or the acquisition by the Commonwealth, is antecedent to the establishment of the Capital, but not to the determination of the Seat of Government.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—This Bill determines the territory in which the Capital shall be established, and the area of such territory.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable and learned member is departing slightly from his original argument.

Mr. JOHNSON.—But suppose the Government of New South Wales refused to grant the territory desired by the Commonwealth?

Mr. ISAACS.—Then the Capital could not be established unless this Parliament determined to take private land for the purpose. We might, if we chose, select a station embracing a sufficient area of land, and acquire it for the purpose of establishing the Federal Capital. Therefore, we are not wholly dependent upon the New South Wales Government. All that depends upon them is the grant of Crown land free of payment, and the Commonwealth has a power of acquisition, with regard to land other than Crown lands which may be obtained by grant. Honorable members grasp the wrong end of the stick when they say that all we have to do is merely to say that the Capital shall be at Dalgety, and to go no further; to give instruction to the Government; to let them enter upon negotiations with the New South Wales Government, and, if that Government chooses to say, "We will give you only 100 square miles," to rest content. Is that the will of Parliament? I think not.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—If we cannot get any more, what are we to do?

Mr. ISAACS.—Then we should determine not to establish the Capital there.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That is a distinctly Victorian view of the question.

Mr. JOHNSON.—According to the honorable and learned member the Commonwealth could demand from New South Wales the whole of her territory.

Mr. ISAACS.—We are not doing anything of that kind. As a member of this Parliament I am not willing to surrender the rights and discretion of this Parliament to the will of any State. If in our wisdom we thought that the future requirements of the Federal Capital rendered advisable a reservation of 500, 600, or 900 square miles, should we establish the Capital in a particular area, even though we could secure only 100 square miles? That is not my view. Although I have been from the first determined that there should be no unnecessary delay in the establishment of the Federal Capital, I am not willing to surrender the duty imposed upon me as a member of this Parliament to see that the best is done for Australia. We have been told that it is our duty to say nothing about the extent of the territory.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—At present.

Mr. ISAACS.—Are we ever to do so?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Yes, certainly.

Mr. ISAACS.—Then let us consider where that would lead us. We have been told that we should first pass a resolution indicating our desire for certain territory, and that the Government should then negotiate, and, if possible, secure such territory. How could the Government be empowered to do that by resolution? How could they go to the New South Wales Government and say, "We want certain territory"?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The resolution would confer the necessary power.

Mr. ISAACS.—Could the Government, in such a case, guarantee that the Federal Parliament would afterwards determine that the Capital should be established within that territory? Certainly not. Suppose the New South Wales Government said, "We will grant you 100 square miles," and the Federal Parliament afterwards determined that the Capital should not be situated within the territory granted by New South Wales? What would then happen? Are we to hamper any future Parliament? We might pass a resolution to-day, and the Government might enter into negotiations, and before the acquisition of the land was concluded, another Parliament might come into existence, and say, "We think that the site selected is an improper one, and we shall not establish the Capital there."

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—We should not be in any worse position than if we passed this Bill.

Mr. ISAACS.—I differ entirely from my honorable and learned friend. If we once pass a Bill enacting that the Capital shall be in a certain spot, and that the Federal territory shall contain a certain area, the moment the territory is acquired the Capital will necessarily be established. In that case, there would be a determination within the meaning of the Constitution; whereas a resolution could not be regarded as embodying a determination. Suppose, for instance, we could not obtain quite 100 square miles, or quite 900 square miles—according to the terms of the resolution—would the Government be empowered to acquire private land to make good the deficiency? I cannot see that a resolution would convey any such authority. Is it to be said that all the land is to be granted or acquired by the Federal Parliament, and the price paid for it, and that then the Federal Parliament is to set about considering whether that territory should embrace the site of the Federal Capital? With all respect to my honorable friends, it appears to me to be absurd to advance any such contention.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—A resumption Act would have to be passed to empower the Government to take the land, and compensate the owners.

Mr. ISAACS.—What we have to do at present is perfectly plain. We have to determine where the Capital shall be, and also the area of public land that shall surround it, and when that is done, and only then, the Government will have a mandate to set about negotiating with the Government of New South Wales, with a view to ascertain whether the desired territory can be obtained. If we can secure it all will be plain; if we cannot obtain all we require in the shape of Crown lands by grant we can acquire the balance.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—How are we to acquire it?

Mr. ISAACS.—Under an Act of Parliament.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Exactly; under a resumption Act.

Mr. ISAACS.—A resumption Act would be required under any scheme. We should have to pass a law providing for the resumptions and the payment of a fair price for the land. We should, however, proceed about our work in an orderly manner, and not in the haphazard way suggested by some honorable members. If we do not pass this clause we shall simply enact that the Capital shall be in a certain spot, and, at the same time, say, in effect, "We care not whether or not the territory embraces only 100 square miles." That is not the will of this Parliament. If we once did that, New South Wales could turn round and say "We shall not give you more than 100 square miles. You have already determined the Seat of the Government, and you cannot help yourselves." If I thought for a moment that the use of the word "shall," in connexion with the decision as to the area to be comprised within the Federal territory, would offer, in the smallest degree, an affront to New South Wales, I should be one of the first to agree to substitute some other expression. In my view, however, it would do nothing of the kind. It is not a mandate, but merely a declaration in ordinary parliamentary form to the area which shall be embraced within the Federal territory. The clause is a simple declaration that, in the opinion of this Parliament—and this is the only opinion in which Parliament can express opinion definitely—the Federal territory must contain an area of so many square miles. Then, if New South Wales sets its way to give us such territory, we establish the Capital.

Mr. KELLY.—In other words, we should not honour the bond unless we get something for it.

Mr. ISAACS.—Does the honorable member contend that the Federal compact requires us to give New South Wales the Capital; and that New South Wales is to have the sole voice in determining the extent of the Federal territory.

Mr. KELLY.—It must contain an area "not less than 100 square miles."

Mr. ISAACS.—Of course. But an honorable friend wishes to read into the Constitution the words "not more" than 100 square miles.

Mr. KELLY.—Not unreasonably more.

Mr. ISAACS.—When a power is vested in Parliament there is no limitation regarding the exercise of that power, save its own discretion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then why limit the power of this Parliament in regard to the smallness of the territory?

Mr. ISAACS.—That condition was imposed by the will of the people, who declared that the area of the Seat of Government should embrace at least 100 square miles, and as much more as Parliament chose to acquire.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why should the Parliament be fettered at all?

Mr. ISAACS.—The question which an honorable member should put is, "Why did not the Constitution fix the area?" The fact remains that it did not. It left the matter to be determined by this Parliament. I am not urging that 900 square miles is a proper area to acquire. What I am arguing is that it is for this Parliament to decide what is a proper area. The decision is not left to the will or discretion of any State.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is not left to this Parliament, either.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is for this Parliament to say, as a condition precedent to the establishment of the Seat of Government what area the Federal territory shall comprise. I read into section 125 of the Constitution, practically a direction that Parliament shall determine the area of the Federal territory. Seeing that the Constitution provides that that territory shall embrace not less than 100 square miles, it stands to reason that somebody must determine its extent. Surely it is not a matter for the Government to settle, and as it cannot be settled by the High Court, it must have been left to Parliament to determine.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The area of 100 square miles mentioned in the Constitution is in itself a limitation.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is a minimum limitation.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Parliament cannot enact that the territory shall contain an area of ninety-nine square miles.

Mr. ISAACS.—Exactly. Therefore I say that where the Constitution intends that a limitation shall be imposed upon Parliament, it expressly declares it, and where it does not intend that a maximum limitation shall apply, it does not declare it. It is idle to talk about what is reasonable. Who is to determine that?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The limitation is practically in the nature of a general direction.

Mr. ISAACS.—The limitation is to be found in our own discretion, and I hope that that will always be reasonably exercised. When we come to determine the area of the Federal territory, which is a totally different matter from that with which we are now dealing, it will no doubt be decided by the best evidence we can bring to bear upon it. I hope that nobody will even consider that by agreeing to the proposal of the Government we shall offer an affront to New South Wales. That is a course of action which I for one would not tolerate for an instant. I do say, however, that this provision is merely a declaration in ordinary enacting form of the will of Parliament. We have declared that the Seat of Government shall be within seventeen miles of Dalgety. Why should we say to New South Wales, "We shall have that site or we shall take no other?" But we do say it. We declare "We will not have the Capital at all unless you permit it to be located there." Suppose that New South Wales replies, "Oh, no; we are perfectly willing to provide you with land at Lyndhurst or Lake George, but we are not prepared to give you land at Dalgety."

Mr. KELLY.—Does not the Constitution give us the absolute power to choose a site?

Mr. ISAACS.—Of course it does, and it also gives us absolute power to fix the area of the Federal territory. It does not limit that area; it merely fixes the minimum.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And contains a general direction regarding that area.

Mr. ISAACS.—No; it is not a general direction. Upon one point I agree with the honorable and learned member for Parkes, who affirms that having fixed the site of the Seat of Government at Dalgety it is essential that we should have free access to it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I did not say that. I argued upon the hypothesis that some honorable members might think it necessary that there should be free access to the Seat of Government.

Mr. ISAACS.—Perhaps I misunderstood my honorable friend.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Most certainly.

Mr. ISAACS.—If the honorable and learned member did not argue in that way, he ought to have done so. At a later stage I intend to move that the following words be added to the clause, "and shall have access to the sea." I think it is in the highest degree important—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is 100 miles to the sea from Dalgety.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am informed that the distance is only seventy miles. At any rate, the Federal Capital should be freely accessible from the sea. I believe that the Federation ought to have full and unimpeded means of access to the Seat of Government from the sea. It ought to have the means of constructing its own railways. It ought not to be dependent on the goodwill of any State in regard to intervening land. For instance, we ought not to be entirely at the mercy of New South Wales, however well disposed that State might be, in regard to the means of access to the Federal Capital. We ought not to be compelled to travel to Cooma in order to reach Dalgety, but access to the Seat of Government through Federal territory and by Federal means of transit should be open to all the States in common.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The better plan would be to resume the whole of New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS.—Is the area of that State so limited that it cannot afford to part with what is equivalent to thirty miles square?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That is not the provision which is contained in the Bill.

Mr. ISAACS.—The measure provides for the acquisition of a territory comprising 900 square miles.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—No. It provides for the acquisition of an area of not less than 900 square miles. The honorable and learned member wishes the Federal territory to extend to the sea.

Mr. ISAACS.—Undoubtedly I do.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the honorable and learned member wish to preserve the unearned increment for the Commonwealth?

Mr. ISAACS.—That is quite another question. I am dealing now with the means of access to the Seat of Government. I take it that to provide for the expansion of the Federal Capital—irrespective of whether it has a commercial future or only a political one—a very considerable area of territory ought to be acquired. Looking to the future, we ought to see that provision is made for access to the Seat of Government from Twofold Bay through Federal territory.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Then we ought to select Bombala.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Why so?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Because it is much closer to the sea than is Dalgety.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am not discussing that matter at the present time. I think I have said all that I proposed to say, and I do hope that honorable members will recollect—as the other Chamber has recollected—that they are here to declare their will fearlessly, without offence to any State or any person. At the same time, I am absolutely certain that we are not doing anything offensive to the great State of New South Wales—I hope nobody will ever dream that we are—by affirming in plain, simple language, our determination in regard to the area which the Federal territory shall embrace. Under these circumstances, I trust that the Government will retain the clause in its present form.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—The speech of the honorable and learned member for Indi—which I will not venture to question from the standpoint of the legal interpretation which he places on this provision—rather astonished me, so far as it related to claim which he considers the Commonwealth has upon New South Wales in regard to the Federal territory. He states that rather than surrender to the will of any State he would refuse to choose a site for the Seat of Government. I can understand that declaration coming from an honorable member who desires to indefinitely postpone the selection of the Federal Capital, but I cannot understand it coming from one who is ready to promptly give effect to the provisions of the Constitution. Is our will—whatever it may be—with consideration of the rights, the equity, and even the sentiments of New South Wales, to be enforced upon that State, if that State declines to allow of its enforcement, are we to declare that we will not give effect to the provisions of the Constitution?

Mr. ISAACS.—That is not what I said. What I said, in effect, was that the will of no State should be allowed to stand in the way of national sentiment and national requirements.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—According to the view entertained by the honorable and learned member, no consideration should be given to the request of that State for ordinary fair treatment, in regard to what was understood to be the meaning of the Constitution. He has told us that according to his legal opinion, every inch of the State of New South Wales could be resumed by the Commonwealth for Federal territory.

Mr. ISAACS.—Who said so?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable and learned member said so.

Mr. ISAACS.—I beg the honorable member's pardon.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable and learned member declared that no maximum area was imposed by the Constitution, but only a minimum, and that therefore, the Commonwealth can take as much as it sees fit. As a matter of fact, I do not think that is correct in my opinion upon legal matters against the view of the honorable and learned member. Still, there are many good lawyers who entertain a very different view. I think that a Court would decide that the area of the Federal territory must reasonably approximate to the minimum of 100 square miles prescribed by the Constitution, unless, as a matter of negotiation, New South Wales chooses to grant a much larger area. I the honorable member for South Sydney, I am not averse to that State ceding a larger extent of territory if she chooses to do so, though I personally object to large areas.

MR. FISHER.—Suppose that New South Wales refuses to negotiate with the Commonwealth upon any terms other than by granting it a territory comprising 100 square miles?

MR. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not say that that State has any right to adhere too closely to the minimum area of 100 square miles. The Constitution declares that there should be an extension of that area if necessary, but the extension should be merely of a give-and-take character, for which we see necessity, or consider the natural features of the country require it. The intention of the Convention in this connexion is very clear, although it was not the Convention which prescribed the minimum area of 100 square miles. The idea of the author of that limitation was that the Federal territory should embrace an area of approximately 100 square miles. The right honorable member for Swan was its author, and from the official report of the Convention debates, I find that when the area of that territory was under consideration, he interjected, "Make it 100 square miles." A little later, in speaking, he said—

I should like to see it laid down in the Bill that the Federal area shall contain not less than 100 square miles.

MR. GLYNN.—It was also intended that the large cities should be excluded from becoming the Seat of Government by that provision.

MR. DUGALD THOMSON.—I cannot say. It appears to me that on that point arguments were advanced upon both sides. Some desired to have the Seat of Government located in the capital of a State, and others did not. Evidently the right honorable member for Swan thought that 100 square miles was a desirable area to acquire, in order that the city might be laid out in a manner worthy of its importance. Subsequently the very words which he suggested in the speech to which I have referred were incorporated in the Premiers' agreement, and embodied in the Constitution, which was accepted by the people of Australia. I do not argue that the Government of New South Wales ought not to give every consideration to the requirements which the Commonwealth may put before it. We must have a given area. In some localities one area would be desirable, and in another a different area. When we demand from a State what we do not yet know will be of the slightest value to us, and without good reason say we must have our own way, we indicate a desire to humiliate that State. It is a proposal, by taking a large area, to cut ourselves off from the State, even if the characteristics of the country we acquire render that area undesirable. The Minister of Home Affairs referred to the question as if the Bill merely provided that an area of 900 square miles shall be acquired, and the honorable and learned member for India also spoke of the same area. I interjected at the time that the Bill provides not that an area of 900 square miles shall be acquired, but that an area of "not less than" 900 miles shall be secured. That is a very important distinction. Under the clause as it stands it would be possible for the Government to ask, as suggested by an honorable member of another place, for an area of 20,000 square miles. I am altogether opposed to the acquiring of a large area, although I am not averse to negotiations on the part of the Parliament for what may be considered a suitable piece of country. I am personally opposed to the acquiring of a large area simply because I consider that it would be undesirable. No unearned increment would attach to some of the territory taken under such a proposal as this, and it seems to me that in respect to some portion of the area the Commonwealth would regret the purchase that it would be compelled to make. If it be not intended that the area to be acquired shall exceed 900 square miles, why not insert in the Bill a provision to that effect? Why not provide that an area "not exceeding 900 square miles" shall be acquired? I believe, however, that objection could be taken to even such a limitation as that, because, by taking over a slightly increased area, we might be able to secure much better boundaries.

MR. ISAACS.—We might fix a minimum and a maximum; there might, perhaps, be some reason for that.

MR. DUGALD THOMSON.—The minimum is already fixed.

MR. ISAACS.—The honorable member is referring to the minimum fixed by the Constitution; I am speaking of a minimum and a maximum to be fixed by the Parliament.

MR. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable and learned member does not propose that the area to be acquired should exceed 900 square miles?

Mr. ISAACS.—No, I say that we might provide that the area shall be not less than 800 square miles, and not more than 900 square miles.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Such an alteration would hardly be worth making. The Minister of Home Affairs spoke of the way in which New South Wales had been whittled away since the establishment of that State, and seemed to think that it had become so accustomed to that process that we had only to continue it.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I did not think anything of the kind.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable gentleman said that this area and that area had been taken away from New South Wales.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I said that there was a greater outcry over the proposal to acquire this territory than there was over making Queensland a separate Colony.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—There were good reasons for the establishment of Queensland as a separate State, but I cannot see any reason for the proposal that, without knowing how the land is to be utilized, without a knowledge of the outlines of the territory, without any information as to what area in the vicinity of the Seat of Government is worth taking over, we should take over not less than 900 square miles, whether the land be good or not. We are to provide for a minimum, and to say to the people of New South Wales, "If you disagree with our proposal we have no right to surrender ourselves to your will, and you shall get no Capital in your State." That attitude might be followed by eventualities which I should be very sorry to see. In the interests, not of New South Wales, but of Australia, I am absolutely opposed to the idea that we should acquire a territory which we may approach without setting foot on New South Wales soil. If there be anything foreign to a Federal union it is the feeling that we cannot establish our Government in any State—I care not what State it is—without the expectation that the people of that State will become antagonistic to us. If honorable members hold such an opinion, I can only say that we have not advanced far towards the realization of the true spirit of Federal union.

Mr. FISHER.—Do not all our laws indicate that we have the power to compel the States to do certain things?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is not even dreamt of in the Convention or the Federal Conference, and it has not been dreamt of in certain other Federations. What was the motto of those who advocated Federation? Was it not "One people, one destiny?" Yet here we are seen to make ourselves a separate people, to insult a State; to say to the people of that State, "We cannot put such trust in you as to allow it to be necessary for people to pass through your territory in order to reach the Federal Capital; we must be able to get from the Federal Capital to the sea without passing over a foot of soil. If we do not obtain that means of ingress, and of egress, we shall not establish our Capital in your State." Is that attitude that is calculated to breed good will between the States? Is that an attitude that is likely to make us one people with one destiny? I presume that if the area is obtained the Government will be for a large vote for fortifications, because of a fear that the people of New South Wales, or of the rest of Australia, will attack the Federal Executive. Instead of seeking to realize the Federal motto, "One people, one destiny," we are endeavouring to create two separate destinies for two people. We are saying, in effect, to the people of one State, comprising a third of the people of Australia, that we should trust ourselves to go among them, because if we did we might not be permitted to leave their territory. To my mind that is worse than ridiculous.

Mr. CONROY.—Why do we trust ourselves to come here?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If we were in danger here we might escape. We were lucky, by the Yarra, but the suggestion that we cannot trust a State to my mind, one of the lowest assumptions from which to regard the Federation. There are other good reasons for this proposal they may be considered; but can we expect any State to give us a portion of its coast line, and to cut off its own territory north and south, simply for the reason which is implied, if not expressed, that we cannot trust the people of the State to give us means of access and of egress from the Federal territory? I trust that the word "should" will be substituted for the word "shall" in the clause. The last Parliament adopted a courteous policy, and we should do the same. The honorable and learned member for Victoria says that in the Constitution the 'shall' is used in reference to the Seat of Government. In that respect greater courtesy was shown than is proposed to be displayed in connexion with the taking over of the Federal territory. The Government of New South Wales was communicated with in reference to the matter, but even before that stage had been reached it showed its willingness to assist the Federal Parliament in selecting the Seat of Government. It appointed a Commissioner, whom every one will admit was thoroughly impartial—a man without leanings to any State—to inspect a number of sites that were suggested. Over forty sites were put forward, and having inspected those which he considered at all suitable for the purpose, he furnished a report to the State Government. The State Government not only offered the Federal Parliament the choice of any of the best sites, but said—"As far as possible we shall reserve the Crown lands within these areas so that you may get as much as possible for nothing."

Mr. ISAACS.—I for one do not anticipate the slightest friction in this matter between the Commonwealth and the State.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If a demand be made for this large area of territory on the ground that we have a right to demand it—and I, in common with many legal authorities, doubt if we have that right—a difficulty will be created at the very outset.

Mr. ISAACS.—I have never said that we have a right to demand.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But the provision in the Bill is really a demand.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is merely an expression of our opinion.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I should certainly prefer to see the words referred to omitted, but, to meet the views of those who hold a different opinion, one of two other courses might be followed. We might, first of all, substitute the word "should" for the word "shall." That would be at least a courteous course to adopt. If the honorable and learned member for Indi thinks that the use of the word "should" would be less effective than would be the use of the word "shall," his opinion differs from that of others.

Mr. ISAACS.—Would it give the Ministry power to accept a less area?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — The Ministry will not accept any area without submitting the matter to Parliament. I think that the Minister has already told us that that is their intention.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not think that we should.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I certainly do not.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The agreement should be submitted to Parliament.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It will come before the Parliament. Therefore, as a matter of courtesy, the use of the word "should," as agreed to by the last Parliament, is preferable to the use of the word "shall." I should like to see the clause so amended that it would provide that an area of "not more" than 900 square miles should be taken over, instead of an area of "not less than" 900 square miles. That would indicate, at all events, that there was some limit to the authority given to the Government, and to our desire for the acquisition of New South Wales' territory. According to the Minister of Home Affairs and others, it is not anticipated that more than 900 square miles will be required. It is rather extraordinary that the honorable and learned member for Indi voted to-day for the Upper Murray district, and that several other honorable members, who share his views on this point, did the same. Half of the unearned increment attaching to the selection of that site would have accrued to land on the Victorian side of the Murray. What, therefore, becomes of the argument as to the unearned increment? I do not know what weight the honorable and learned member for Indi attaches to it.

Mr. ISAACS.—I did not say a word about it.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — But many honorable members, who have advanced that argument, voted for the Upper Murray district, although the selection of that site would have meant that half of the unearned increment would apply to land in Victoria.

Mr. FISHER.—Parliament, in its wisdom, decided otherwise.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But it was a very close vote. Is it because the State of New South Wales is concerned that the unearned increment is demanded? I do not believe that, but look at the appearances. Some members were prepared to put the Capital in a situation where half the unearned increment would have gone into the pockets of an adjoining State; but when the Capital is fixed in another position, the State in which it is located is to have no advantage from the unearned increment.

Mr. FISHER.—We think that the people of Australia, who will have to find the money for the Capital, should have the benefit of the increment.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I have been contending that we have to consider the interests of the people of Australia, but some honorable members appear to think that we are choosing the Capital for the benefit of a separate people, and that it must be barricaded round and kept away from the rest of the people of Australia. I do not object in any way to the unearned increment, if there is any, being received by the Commonwealth Government, or the State Government; it does not matter which.

Mr. FISHER.—It should be received by the Federal Government, because the people of Australia will pay the money.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—In any case the amount will not be great.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It will pay the cost of the buildings, any way.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is possible that, in the course of time, the value of the land within the Federal area may rise considerably, but not alone in consequence of the establishment of the Federal Capital there. The only suggested site where the unearned increment was likely to be considerable was Lyndhurst, because that is the only district which has great resources. But at Dalgety I am afraid that we shall have to wait for the unearned increment until land begins to get scarce in Australia. I was in Washington in 1884. It was then a skeleton city. I believe that it has improved very much since then. My visit was long after the city was established. I was amazed, first of all, at the beauty and expensiveness of the buildings, and also amazed to see that the cart-wheel streets that radiated from the centre, were nothing but skeleton streets with a few houses dotted here and there about them. I believe there has since been some considerable increase in the population.

Mr. GLYNN.—There are 300,000 people there now.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But does not that include the inhabitants of Georgetown, on the Potomac River? I doubt very much whether there are 300,000 people in the Federal territory.

Mr. GLYNN.—At the time of the century the population was given as 298,000.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is a very small territory. The whole, including the river town, does not exceed 100 square miles.

Mr. CONROY.—Probably 200,000 of inhabitants are negroes.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—In older town there are two blacks to a white, certainly, but in Washington it is that is not the case. The city may have increased considerably since I was there, apparently at that time there was very little unearned increment in Washington. If that was the case in Washington, which is situated close to the Potomac River, and right in the centre of busy coastal States, how much can we expect from an area situated in the midst of the Snowy Mountains at Dalgety? I am not finding fault with the site, but am simply pointing out that Dalgety is near no stream that reaches the sea.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Snowy River runs to the sea.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I mean the stream by which traffic can reach the sea. No traffic can at any time reach the sea by means of the Snowy River. I accept the selection which Parliament has made, but I fear it will be a very long time before there is any unearned increment from the site selected.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—Whatever doubt I may have had in the early part of the debate have been entirely removed by the honorable and learned member for Invergowrie. He talked about Federal sentiment and Federal ties, but he desires to strike the hardest bargain possible with New South Wales. His steel-pointed and calloused idea with regard to the Capital site was enough to destroy the Federal spirit in almost any member of this Chamber. He talked as though a bargain was about to be made between two foreign countries—say, between Russia and Japan—on the conclusion of the present war.

Mr. ISAACS.—What is the hard bargain?

Mr. WILKS. — The honorable and learned member read the phrase “not less than 100 square miles” to mean “as much more as we can possibly get.” If he fights so bitterly for what is contained in the Constitution, I must interpret in the same way his desire that the Commonwealth should acquire not less than 900 square miles, provided in this Bill. If the people of New South Wales have been caught once, they are not likely to be caught again in the same way. “Once bitten, twice shy.” This is where the hard bargain comes in. If the honorable and learned member interprets “not less than 100 square miles mean that we can take 900 square miles, we may expect that he will interpret "not less than 900 square miles" to mean that we can take 90,000 square miles, or even the whole of New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS.—I have not said that I agree to that interpretation.

Mr. WILKS.—I think that it is an impudent action, to put in this Bill a demand for so large a territory. The right honorable member for East Sydney said that there is too much ultimatum in it. Let me add that there is too little pomatum. The Prime Minister can easily approach the Premier of New South Wales, and say that the desire of the Federal Parliament is that 900 square miles shall be acquired. If he can show good reasons, I have no doubt that that area will be granted, and the matter will be over. But in this Bill we are not asking for negotiations. The Minister of Home Affairs points a revolver at the head of the Premier of New South Wales, and says—"I am not going to negotiate with you; my position is that we must have 900 square miles, and you had better be a good fellow, and grant it." But now the honorable and learned member for Indi says that he will not be satisfied even with that. He must have access to the territory by sea, because, he says, there is a danger that some time or other Federal members may be molested by the people of New South Wales. That, I suppose, is the Federal spirit! The honorable and learned member has the impudence to tell us that the people of New South Wales are a race of savages. He is afraid that he would not be able to travel through the territory of that State. We must give him a port. He must have a strip of territory from the Capital city to the sea, seventy miles by twelve. This attitude is not new on the part of the honorable and learned member. He played the same game in the last Parliament with the same motive.

Mr. ISAACS.—Is the honorable member responsible for what he is saying?

Mr. WILKS.—Yes, I am.

Mr. ISAACS.—I should not have thought it.

Mr. WILKS.—The occasion was when Tumut was selected. The honorable and learned member for Indi moved an amendment that the territory be stretched down to the Murray River, in order to get access to the sea.

Mr. ISAACS.—I was not even present when the vote was taken. I believe that it was the honorable member for Grampians who made the proposal, but I was not here.

Mr. WILKS.—I thought that it was the honorable and learned member who started the idea. I apologize to him for making the mistake. New South Wales did not expect to have a model territory carved out of her province. She did not expect to have experiments made in Socialism and collective industry. She took a rational view of this question, and was prepared to grant a certain area of Crown land to the Commonwealth. She did not contemplate that the Commonwealth was to take as much as it liked. If the Prime Minister can approach the Premier of New South Wales and show good reasons for a larger area being granted, probably it will be granted. But we should not demand it. The Prime Minister will find that if the people of New South Wales receive proper treatment, and are taken into our confidence, they will not be inclined to strike a niggardly bargain. They have always adopted the policy of open-handedness towards the people of Australia generally. But they certainly are suspicious when Federal members like the honorable and learned member for Indi say that they will not surrender this and that. He must have a Bill, which says that a certain thing shall be done, that there must be an area of not less than 900 square miles—and that may mean any larger area—and that there must be access to the sea. The only lesson to be learnt from this by New South Wales is either that the honorable member wishes to filch too much territory from that State, or that he wishes to further delay the selection of the site.

Mr. REID (East Sydney).—I desire to test the question I raised some time ago, and I now move—

That the word "shall," in line 4, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "should."

I recognise that, although I am opposed to an area of 900 square miles, the majority of the members of the Committee disagree with me on that point.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I am not so sure of that.

Mr. McDONALD.—The amendment to substitute "should" for "shall" was carried by a large majority last year.

Mr. REID.—I content myself at present with the amendment I have moved. I believe that it will express the view of the majority of honorable members with perfect clearness, and will avoid, what seems to me, to be a positively offensive way of beginning what ought to be a friendly negotiation.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—A great deal too much has been made of the attitude which it is assumed that the Government of New South Wales will take up. We are all agreed with the sentiment expressed by the right honorable member for East Sydney, that the negotiations on this subject between the Commonwealth Government and the Government of New South Wales should be friendly. But it has been inferred, and even asserted, that the Government of New South Wales is so touchy and sensitive on this point that they will quarrel with the Federal Parliament because we use the word "shall," and definitely state what it is we desire. Are we to understand that the New South Wales authorities are looking for a quarrel? As one of the representatives of New South Wales, I cannot help feeling that a number of other representatives of that State are raising a noise about this without any justification. We know that certain remarks have been made on the subject in the New South Wales press, and by some New South Wales politicians; but no one will tell us that the New South Wales Government will take serious notice of those statements. I think it is unfair to them to suggest that they desire to seek a quarrel with the Federal Government.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Does not the honorable member think they will, when they find that nine times the area mentioned in the Constitution is required?

Mr. SPENCE.—The area required does not matter. I am now discussing the terms in which we propose to state what we want. We are all agreed that the negotiations should be friendly, and it is but fair to assume that the New South Wales Government will recognise that, and, personally, I think it is probable that there will be very little discussion about the area suggested. It is unfair to assume that the New South Wales Government will seek to quarrel with the Commonwealth Government, or that the Commonwealth Government will carry on the negotiations from their side in a way which will be annoying or offensive. The New South Wales Government will not analyze and criticise the wording of this provision, as our legal friends have done. Such criticism and analysis may be very necessary in connexion with legal matters, but in business communications between members of Governments, who are men of the world, and have no desire to misunderstand each other, that kind of analysis in terms is not necessary. I have heard no honorable member state that he has any authority from the New South Wales Government for making the assertion that they have no objection to the terms proposed in this clause. In my judgment the New South Wales people will have no objection to a formal statement of what we are asking for.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member for Darling voted for the word "should" at last session on my motion.

Mr. SPENCE.—I do not care whether the word used is "shall" or "should" but I protest against honorable members raising a dust and a stir when all is calm, peaceful, and serene. In my opinion, it is an unfair reflection upon the New South Wales Government to assume that they will analyze this clause in the way suggested, and that if we use the word "shall" they will not negotiate with us, but that we use the word "should," they will be prepared to do so. Honorable members in this matter have been making a noise about nothing. We are entitled to assume that the New South Wales Government will act with tact and judgment, and every one admits that the present Prime Minister of the Commonwealth possesses tact and judgment.

Mr. REID.—We should give the honorable gentleman a fair start.

Mr. SPENCE.—In my opinion, the Premier of New South Wales, Mr. Wardell, Mr. Carruthers, or whoever he may be, will not quarrel with the Government over this matter. I wish to say a few words about the area. The apparent fixity in the minds of some people in New South Wales about our taking 900 square miles or even a larger area, has puzzled me. I am satisfied with the Government proposition that the area should be 900 square miles. I do not think that less than that would do. I might give one or two reasons why, in my opinion, we should acquire a much greater area than 900 square miles.

The CHAIRMAN.—The question now before the Committee is that the word "shall" be left out; with a view to inserting in lieu thereof the word "should." When that question is disposed of, the honorable member will be at liberty to refer to the area.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I think there is a great deal more in the content than that we should approach the New South

State authorities in this matter in a diplomatic way than some honorable members appear to imagine. I was quite in agreement with the policy of the late Government—who, unfortunately, did not have sufficient back-bone to stand by their policy—that the Seat of Government Bill should fix a certain site, and that the question of the territory should be dealt with by subsequent legislation, which should be the outcome of negotiations between the Commonwealth Government and the Government of New South Wales, and which should be based on information with respect to the territory proposed to be acquired, which at present we do not possess. We may deal with this matter in a reasonable, diplomatic way, or in an offensive way, and it must not be forgotten that the people of New South Wales are inclined to be a little sensitive on this subject. I remember that on the last occasion, when this matter was dealt with by this Parliament, and when, against the policy of the then Prime Minister, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, the area proposed to be acquired was stated in the Bill, the Government, the leader of the Opposition, and a large number of honorable members at once committed themselves to an attitude of hostility to the proposal. That was due largely to the way in which it was put. I ask honorable members, on this occasion, to be guided by the experience we have gained in that connexion. The late See Government, in New South Wales, was, if anything, over-friendly to the Federal Government. That is to be accounted for by the fact that it was, to some extent, a Government which had been brought into power by the honorable member for Hume, who was at first the Minister in charge of this measure. So careful were the members of the See Government not to in any way infringe upon the authority of the Federal Government, but on the contrary to consider their wishes in this matter, that although Sir John See was asked to move in the direction of suggesting a site himself, he resolutely refused to do so, and left the selection entirely to the Federal Government. But as soon as word was sent to New South Wales that this Parliament was asking for a much larger territory than that mentioned in the Constitution, Sir John See, on the very limited information at his disposal, felt compelled to take a hostile stand at once, and the debate which ensued in the State Parliament was decidedly hostile to the Federal proposal, and largely because it was misunderstood. We do not wish to have any misunderstanding with the State Government on this matter. I wish to say that, in supporting the amendment submitted by the leader of the Opposition, I am not opposed to the larger area asked for. My view is that we should adopt the diplomatic method of dealing with this business. In order to prevent friction, and to have it settled as amicably as possible, we should meet the State authorities reasonably. The experience we gained in the last Parliament should teach us that to make anything in the nature of a demand upon New South Wales is not the most diplomatic way in which to secure the concession for which we are seeking. I hope that the Government will agree to the amendment, as it will in some way tone down the request we are making.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I had hoped to hear from the Government that they intended to accept this amendment.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Government do intend to accept it.

Mr. McCAY.—I mention this, because I see that last year a number of the members of the Government voted in favour of a similar proposal.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I did not do so.

Mr. McCAY.—The Minister in charge of the Bill at present did not vote for the proposal, nor, do I think, did the then Minister of Trade and Customs; but the present Prime Minister, Postmaster-General, and Minister of External Affairs all voted in that direction, and I know they are too consistent to reverse a vote on a matter of this nature.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Under the circumstances I think, perhaps, it would be better for me to “climb down” than to ask my colleagues to reverse their vote. I admit that it is possible we shall be able to carry out these negotiations and bring them to a conclusion more quickly by using the word proposed in preference to any other word; and, therefore, I am prepared to accept the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I think there is some force in the observation that the clause as it stands leaves the area unlimited, and I suggest that there should be a maximum as well as a minimum.

Mr. REID.—That would be worse than ever; that would hamper the negotiations more than ever, because there would be an ultimatum with two extremes.

Mr. ISAACS.—If the right honorable gentleman is content to leave the clause as it is, I also am content.

Mr. REID.—I am content, rather than increase the trouble.

Mr. ISAACS.—It appears to me that my suggestion would not increase the trouble. At present it is left open to the Government to ask for as much more territory as they like, though there is a minimum below which the New South Wales Government cannot go. However, if the right honorable member for East Sydney thinks the clause will satisfy New South Wales, I have no more to add.

Amendment (by Mr. JOSEPH COOK) proposed—

That the word "nine" be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "one."

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—In regard to the matter of area, there are some considerations which I do not think have been laid before the Committee. There are several requirements of a Capital city which cannot, in my opinion, be complied with if the area be restricted to 100 square miles. For instance, commonage would be required, and there must be quarries for the necessary buildings. Further, it is desirable that the watershed and supply should be within Commonwealth territory; and there are other considerations, such as the provision of parks, a race-course on which to run the Great Federal Capital Cup Race, and other reserves for recreation. Of course, there cannot be a city in Australia without a race track; and I merely suggest these as requirements which it would be difficult to satisfy with an area of 100 square miles. Apart from the consideration of the unearned increment, an area of 900 square miles is not at all too large for the ordinary requirements of such a populous city as we hope to see at no distant date. I hope, therefore, that the Committee will not accept the amendment. In this matter we might, I think, safely trust the Government during the negotiations, to ask for 900 square miles more or less, because we cannot be exact to a yard. It is not fair to assume that the Government, composed of sensible men, will use any technical power they may possess to ask for a great deal more than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I recognise that the Committee are against me, and to save time I ask leave to withdraw my amendment. I content myself by saying that I do not think there is the slightest chance of New South Wales agreeing to any such area as that proposed; and, in opinion, such an area ought not to be granted.

Mr. REID (East Sydney).—I am glad that the honorable member for Parramatta has withdrawn the amendment. I am just as strongly as is that honorable member against the proposal to take a large area, but I recognise that the majority of honorable members present wish that, at any rate, the attempt shall be made. I bow, with great reluctance, to the decision, feeling that when matters come to negotiation, a mutually conciliatory spirit will be shown.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I beg to move—

That the following words be added, "and have access to the sea."

I have before explained why I think such a provision is desirable, and I shall say only two or three words at the present juncture. Without disrespect to any State, I think it is extremely important and desirable that there should be Federal jurisdiction from the Capital to the sea-coast possible.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Would the honorable and learned member have submitted the same amendment if Tooma had been chosen?

Mr. ISAACS.—Tooma possesses natural advantages in relation to the Murray River and in the matter of centrality, which, in my opinion, would have more than compensated for non-access to the sea. But, having chosen Dalgety, it is highly desirable, being possible and not difficult, to have access to the sea.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I ask the Minister in charge to consent to progress being reported.

Mr. REID (East Sydney).—I ask the honorable members to endeavour to conclude this business to-night. We adjourned on Friday, and this matter was discussed some time ago, and then thoroughly threshed out. A great deal of the criticism levelled at us on account of the slow progress made with our business, is, I am afraid, somewhat justified, and I do not think that this matter ought to be taken over to another sitting. It is not, though this was a new proposal, because we have discussed it on all occasions with the question of the Seat of Government has been before us.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The right honorable member means that it was discussed in the last Parliament?

Mr. REID.—I feel that we have been going slowly enough in all conscience, and that we ought to finish to-night.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—This is an amendment which requires consideration, and I should have liked to hear those gentlemen who discussed the matter in the last Parliament. It appears to me that a doubt is at once raised as to the distance from the proposed site to the sea, and that, even if that distance be seventy miles, we require to consider what access means.

Mr. REID.—The amendment means the division of New South Wales along sixty miles of country.

Mr. WEBSTER. — Many honorable members who voted for Dalgety did so because they believed that that site would have access to the sea.

Mr. REID.—There will be access; no fence will be put up.

Mr. WEBSTER.—But the honorable members referred to believed that the Commonwealth Government would have control of the means of access, and of the land in the immediate neighbourhood of the port.

Mr. REID.—And yet those honorable members voted for Tooma, where there would be no access to the sea.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I am speaking of honorable members who voted not for Tooma, but for Dalgety. I am not speaking of honorable members who voted for Lyndhurst, where there was no possibility of getting any water. There is a great difference between voting for a site with an abundance of water, and where it was thought there would be access to a sea-port, and voting for a site where, to say the least, I saw no water during my visit. The question arises how much territory do we want, and what is to be the width of the land connecting the territory with the port of Twofold Bay? What land are we to reserve immediately around the Bay for the purpose of conserving the interests of the Commonwealth in its control of that part of the territory? Honorable members for Western Australia have said that they voted for Dalgety, not particularly because of the site and its surroundings, but because they thought that some day there will be a port at which they will be able to land, and from which they can be carried by a short line of railway to the Capital without any very great inconvenience.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It is not necessary for the Commonwealth to own the land to enable honorable members to reach the Capital in that way; New South Wales will not stop honorable members.

Mr. WEBSTER.—But the question arises whether the Commonwealth should not hold that territory. I do not say that it is absolutely necessary that the land should be taken from the control of the State, because I know there would still be access to the harbor. But in view of the fact that the Capital is to be within seventy miles of Twofold Bay, it seems only reasonable that the Commonwealth should control a harbor which is open to attack by an enemy, and which it might be necessary to fortify—a work which could not be carried out by a State.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It has naval control.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Yes; but we have no guarantee that the Government of New South Wales will be willing to spend the money necessary to make the port suitable for the purpose.

Mr. REID.—Well, they would let the Commonwealth do it.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Yes, but the question is: Would the Commonwealth be warranted in the expenditure if it had not possession of the harbor? As we seem to have selected Dalgety largely in the hope that we shall thereby secure a port at Twofold Bay, it is essential that we should have a strip of territory between Dalgety and Twofold Bay which would enable us to connect the Federal Capital with the port, and a strip of land round the foreshores of the Bay, which would enable us to fortify it, and to make it suitable for the purposes of the Commonwealth. I am not able to go very thoroughly into the subject to-night, because I have not had time to examine the map, or to consider the matter in all its bearings; but if we do not get an approach to Twofold Bay, many honorable members will have voted for the Dalgety site under a misapprehension. I shall vote with those who are trying to get as much as they can under Commonwealth control. I object to the Dalgety site, but since it has been selected, I think we should give it a port for the advantage of the people of Western Australia and Tasmania, who will have to travel there by sea.

Mr. HUTCHISON (Hindmarsh).—Although I was in favour of the selection of Tooma, I had, before seeing that site, expressed myself in favour of Dalgety, and I agree with the honorable member for Gwydir that quite a number of honorable gentlemen voted for Dalgety in order to obtain a port. The right honorable member for East Sydney has said that the Commonwealth will have access to Twofold Bay in any case, because the Government of New South Wales will not put up fences to debar them; but that argument may be used in another way. It may be said that the Commonwealth Government will not put up fences. Furthermore, if the Commonwealth obtains possession of Twofold Bay, the State of New South Wales will be saved a large expenditure in making the harbor a good port. I think that if we choose a territory near the sea, it should extend down to the coast, so as to give the Commonwealth an independent outlet.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It is not necessary to make the proposed amendment in order to bring that about.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I think it is better to determine that Twofold Bay shall be part of the Federal territory, and I hope that New South Wales will show sufficient Federal spirit to agree to the arrangement.

Mr. LONSDALE.—If New South Wales shows the same Federal spirit as the other States are showing, it will not give anything to the Commonwealth.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I think that honorable members who do not represent New South Wales have shown a large amount of Federal spirit in this matter. Personally it is against my interests to have the Capital removed from Melbourne, because it is very convenient for me to be able to get home at the end of the week; but I wish to carry out the provisions of the Constitution, and I believe that it would give complete satisfaction if the Commonwealth were to be granted a territory which would have an independent outlet. Judging from the remarks made by some of the representatives of New South Wales, there will be very little difficulty in getting the people of that State to give us a port, because of the benefits which the State will receive from the Commonwealth expenditure in making the port what it should be. I shall support the amendment.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I think that it will be better to leave the matter to be settled by diplomacy than to agree to the amendment. If the Government of New South Wales is prepared to include Twofold Bay within the Federal territory, I shall not raise my voice against the arrangement, but if the State is not prepared to do so, no vote of mine will be given for the proposal, and there is nothing in the Constitution which will require it to do so. New South Wales interests are supposed to give way whenever the Federal spirit is mentioned, but the Federal spirit is a practically unknown quantity with the representatives of the other States who are dealing with New South Wales. Weighing with the members of the last Parliament was the desirability of obtaining access to the Federal Capital without going through New South Wales territory, and that, apparently, is the factor determining the decision on the present occasion. It has been led to suppose that the people of New South Wales are so hostile to the Federation that it would be dangerous to have Commonwealth territory situated entirely within that State. That does not seem to me to be a good exhibition of the Federal spirit.

Mr. MCCOLL (Echuca).—The substitution of the word "should" for "shall" makes the matter one for negotiation with the Government of New South Wales, and therefore, I think it desirable that we should insert in the clause whatever conditions we wish to impose in regard to the Federal territory. To my mind, the selection made to-night is so unfortunate, almost every respect, that some compensating advantages are required to make it palatable to the people of the Commonwealth. I believe that future generations will bitterly rue the selection of Dalgety.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member is not in order in reflecting upon a vote of the House.

Mr. MCCOLL.—The one compensating advantage which can be given—and it is to secure this advantage that a large number of honorable members voted for Dalgety—is the possession of a Federal port, and, therefore, I trust that the Commonwealth will agree to the amendment.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is hardly possible to absolutely settle this matter to-night, since a considerable number of honorable members, who did not know that it was coming on, are absent.

Mr. REID.—They should be here. I have never complained when a vote has been taken in my absence.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—This is the first time I have heard the leader of the Opposition urging the Government to go on with the business in hand.

Mr. REID.—The Government are slow that some one must drive them.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We have gone right through the Bill to-day, and certainly cannot be accused of delay in connexion with this matter. I propose to take a vote now; but the Government will agree to a recommitment, should it be desired, because a considerable number of members is absent.

Mr. REID.—That is fair, if a majority is in favour of a recommitment.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I think that the Commonwealth Government should have the right to connect the Federal territory by railway with the nearest port, should they desire to do so.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That right can be negotiated for without the introduction of the proposed provision.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Quite so. I think, however, that it is well to place these words in the Bill.

Mr. BROWN.—The right to construct a railway would be of no use unless the Commonwealth had the port too.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The port would be there, in any case. What we desire is access to a port, and we should negotiate for the right to make railway communication to the nearest port. If there were a strip of New South Wales territory between the Federal territory and the sea, the State Government might refuse to allow the Commonwealth to construct such a railway as I speak of.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Why suggest that?

Mr. REID.—One would think that we were dealing with Manchuria instead of with New South Wales.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The attitude which I think New South Wales might take up is that which is being at present assumed by South Australia in respect to the proposed Transcontinental Railway.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is gross repudiation in the case of South Australia.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That may or may not be; but it shows that the fear that some honorable members entertain that the Commonwealth may be denied access to the sea is not without foundation.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The difficulty will not be overcome by the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I admit that. I do not say that it is absolutely necessary to make a distinct provision in the Bill, because negotiations must proceed upon the lines indicated.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister will have a stream of cold water poured down his back when he begins to negotiate.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That would not paralyze me, or prevent me from carrying out the negotiations on the lines that this Parliament desires. I do not think that the amendment will make a great deal of difference, but I see no objection to inserting it in the Bill.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It will only make a further demand upon the New South Wales Government.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I cannot conceive that the New South Wales Government would refuse to accede to such a reasonable request. The amendment is simply declaratory, and I shall support it.

Mr. REID.—There is no objection; we shall all vote for it.

PICTURE BY MR. T. ROBERTS.

Senator MATHESON.—I wish to ask the Vice-President of the Executive Council, without notice, the following question:—

1. Is it true, as stated in the Argus this morning, that a picture painted by Mr. Thomas Roberts has been presented to His Majesty the King as a gift from the Commonwealth?

2. Is it a fact that this picture was itself presented to the Commonwealth?

3. By whose authority was this presentation made to His Majesty the King?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Senator Matheson kindly intimated to me this morning that he intended to ask these questions, and so gave me an opportunity to obtain the necessary information. The reply to the first question is, Yes; but I may add that the Government have had no official information, although it was understood that the picture was to be presented to the King. The Government have seen the intimation in the newspapers. To the second question

I have also to answer, Yes; but the picture was so presented to the Commonwealth on the understanding that it was to be given by the Commonwealth to His Majesty on behalf of the nation. With respect to the third question, I may state that the picture was presented on the authority of the late Government.

ASSENT TO BILLS.

Assent to the following Bills reported:—

Supply Bill (No. 2).

Further Supplementary Appropriation Bill (1902-3).

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table the following papers:—

Despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, relating to the employment of Chinese labour in the Transvaal.

Amendment of Statutory Rules, 1904, Nos. 4 and 41, governing the Military Forces.

The CLERK laid upon the table the following paper:—

Return to an Order of the Senate of 28th July, 1904, relating to the field guns in each State.

FRAUDULENT TRADE MARKS BILL.

Bill read a third time.

TRADE MARKS BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 28th July, vide page 3664):

Clause 4, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 5 and 6 agreed to.

Clause 7—

1. The registration of a trade mark under a State Trade Marks Act shall cease either—

(a) At the expiration of fourteen years from the commencement of this Act, or . . .

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—In this Bill we provide a term of fourteen years during which a trade mark shall be registered, giving power to the holder to re-register. In the case of most of the States this provision will work equitably, but in the case of New South Wales there is no limit whatever upon the term for which a trade mark now is and in the past has been registered. There are a number of trade marks which are registered in New South Wales, and which will consequently, under this provision, run out absolutely at the end of fourteen years. So that, if the clause is passed as it stands, at the expiration of fourteen years from the passing of this measure the registration of those trade marks will cease.

Senator BEST.—They can be renewed.

Senator KEATING.—But in many instances, perhaps, they could not be renewed.

Senator BEST.—Why not?

Senator KEATING.—Under which would they be renewed?

Senator BEST.—Under this measure.

Senator KEATING.—When the holder proceeded to register under this measure they might find that in some other State the Commonwealth there were persons bringing claims to the same trade marks. They would not be in the position of persons asking for re-registration, but for a registration under a Commonwealth Act, and there might be one, two, or three States from which successful opposition to registration might be encountered. Is it not the intention of this Bill, as far as possible, to secure existing rights? In second paragraph of clause 5 we read Provided that this section shall not prejudice any right, privilege, obligation, or liability acquired, accrued, or incurred under the law of any State before the commencement of this Act.

In clause 6 we provide that a State Trade Marks Act, under which a trade mark registered, shall continue to apply—

So long as the registration under that Act remains in force.

Every trade mark that is registered in New South Wales under the law of that State is perpetual, but in clause 7 we provide that at the expiration of fourteen years, from the commencement of this measure, the registration of a trade mark under a State Trade Marks Act shall cease. Those provisions are diametrically opposed to one another, so far as this measure applies to the State of New South Wales. There is, perhaps, no conflict with regard to other States. Persons who have registered trade marks have a perpetual right in them according to the State law of New South Wales. But this Bill steps in and says that at the expiration of fourteen years all trade marks registered under the State law shall cease. Our object being to preserve, as far as possible, existing and accrued rights under the trade marks legislation of the States, I should say that we pass the clause as it stands there will in many instances be a bar to registration at the end of fourteen years. There will be many persons who, when they apply to the Commonwealth office for the registration of a trade mark, will find that their application is resisted by persons in, perhaps, Western Australia, Queensland, or elsewhere. Is the intention of the Government to absolutely deprive those who are registered under the Trade Marks Act of New South Wales, at the end of fourteen years, of their right to use their trade marks?

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia—Vice-President of the Executive Council).—It will be noticed from clause 5, that the intention of the Bill is that any rights that are possessed by those who have registered trade marks will still continue.

Senator KEATING.—They ought not to be prejudicially affected by the Commonwealth law.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not think there is any great probability of difficulties arising, because, as soon as this measure becomes an Act, the great majority of those persons who have trade marks registered, and who are doing business in Australia, will register under the Commonwealth law. Senator Keating will see that the rights possessed by persons who have registered trade marks in New South Wales apply only to New South Wales. I do not think that those rights would be of sufficient value to them to prevent them from registering under the Commonwealth law. I see no objection to the clause, because everything will be done to protect existing rights. I feel sure that people who are interested will be perfectly satisfied. If persons in New South Wales, possessing trade marks rights, attempt to register under the Commonwealth law, and are opposed by some one in Queensland or Western Australia, my opinion is, that, when the machinery of this legislation is set in motion, we can trust the officers to see that justice is done.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—My opinion is that clause 7 is one of the most valuable provisions of the Bill. While it is quite true that in New South Wales, so far as the limits of that State are concerned, the proprietors of trade marks have perpetual rights, yet at the same time the very object, and design, of this Bill, as of all Federal legislation, is uniformity. It would be quite impossible to obtain uniformity did not this clause exist in its present shape. If any serious hardship were done, we should give attention to it, but practically I do not think that any hardship will accrue. First of all, the registered proprietors of trade marks in New South Wales will now have the advantage of registration throughout the Commonwealth.

Senator KEATING.—That is, if they take advantage of clause 8.

Senator BEST.—Precisely.

Senator KEATING.—They may not be able to take advantage of it.

Senator BEST.—I think that they would have no difficulty in taking advantage of the Bill. Their rights are largely conserved by clause 27, because a trade mark, which it was sought to have renewed, could only be opposed by somebody who had been honestly using the same trade mark in some other portion of Australia. Clause 27 says that—

In case of honest concurrent user, or of special circumstances, the Court may, in its discretion, permit the registration of the same trade mark, or of nearly identical trade marks, for the same goods by more than one proprietor, subject to such conditions and limitations as to mode or place of user, or otherwise, as it thinks fit to impose.

So that complete discretion is given to the Court under special circumstances to do what the merits of the case demand. In addition to which, I would observe that when clause 27 is reached I intend to ask that the same discretion shall be extended to the Registrar, and to the law officer. If clause 27 is amended in that direction I do not think there will be much room for the apprehensions of my honorable and learned friend.

Senator KEATING.—Look at the last paragraph of clause 23.

Senator BEST.—I think that provision ought to be amended also. Sub-clause 2 of clause 23 provides that—

The fact that a mark is publicly used by more than three persons as a mark on or in connexion with similar goods, shall be treated as conclusive evidence that it is common to the trade.

When we reach that clause I intend to ask that it should be amended so as to read—

The fact that a mark is publicly used by more than three persons in any one State—

As the clause stands it would certainly work very serious injustice, because the fact remains that the same trade mark is registered by various persons in several States, and the rights of all those persons have to be conserved. But in regard to the point immediately under notice, the objection is, I think, first of all met, by clause 27, particularly if it is amended in the way I have suggested; and secondly, if my honorable and learned friend thought it wise to insert in that portion of the Bill relating to renewals of trade marks a few words to the effect that special regard should be paid to registration under State Acts, such a provision might be useful. Personally, I do not consider it necessary, and I do not conceive that any injustice will arise under the clause in its present form.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—The answer given to me by the Vice-President of the Executive Council has hardly covered the whole of the ground with which I dealt. Clause 5 refers only to the application of the common law to our trade marks law in Australia. I am not sure that there are not analogous cases in Queensland, but under the New South Wales law there are trade marks in force in that State which were registered forty years ago, and the holders of which have never been, and would never be required to re-register. The position in other States has been that the term for which registration has been effective has been fourteen years, and if a man, at the expiration of that time, desires to re-register his trade mark, he is entitled to do so under certain conditions. The holder of a registered trade mark in New South Wales has rights in respect of that trade mark, which are perpetual; but in this Bill it is provided that a trade mark registered under a State Act shall cease, at the expiration of fourteen years from the commencement of the operation of this law, or from its last registration or re-registration under the State law. It is in that way that I say we are not, in this Bill, conserving rights which have already accrued and are in existence. That that is not the object of this Bill is indicated by paragraph a of clause 6, under which it is provided that the State Act under which a trade mark is registered, shall continue to apply to that trade mark, so long as the registration under that Act remains in force. All these registrations in New South Wales will remain in force, even though it should be forty years since the trade marks were registered. They would remain in force under the New South Wales law perpetually, because the rights acquired by registration under that law are perpetual. The only solution of the difficulty which has been suggested by the Vice-President of the Executive Council is that it will be competent for persons who desire to continue to hold the benefit derived from the registration of a trade mark to re-register under this Bill. What I desire to point out is that as the Bill stands at present, and unless some amendments are made later on, an applicant desirous of renewing his right may find that some essential part of his trade mark has, not in New South Wales, but in other parts of Australia, come to be publicly used more than three persons, and under clause 23 that is to be treated as conclusive evidence that it is common to the trade. Although he has secured perpetual right in New South Wales under the law there, application for the registration of his trade mark in the Commonwealth under this Bill may be blocked on that account. Unless there is an understanding that some alteration of clauses 23 and 27 will be considered, this clause should not be allowed to pass without comment. If it were so subsequently to amend those clauses might be said that the matter should have been raised on this clause. Having called attention to the question, I am satisfied that the Vice-President of the Executive Council will consider with his officers the advisability of modelling the Bill somewhat differently in order to meet the circumstances to which I have referred.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I personally think, and the officers of the Commonwealth also think, that the Bill as it stands meets all the requirements of the people of Australia. There may be some difficulty with respect to New South Wales, but when I was referring to clause 5 I said that I thought the application of the common law provided for in that clause to secure existing rights, would protect those existing rights in all circumstances. I do not think that any difficulty will arise, such as the honorable and learned senator has suggested, but when we come to consider clause 23 I shall have no objection to an amendment requiring that a trade mark must have been used by three persons in one State before it can be considered common to the trade. I admit that there might be four users of a trade mark, one in each of four States, and in such a case it would be a hardship upon the holder of a trade mark in New South Wales, if, on such grounds were decided, under clause 23, that a trade mark was common to the trade. If such an amendment as I have suggested were made, the risk which might be run by holders of registered trade marks in New South Wales will be avoided. I have no doubt that the Commonwealth officers, in drafting the measure, had the existing law in New South Wales, as well as in every other State, in view.

Senator KEATING.—I think not. Under clause 52, a person cannot re-register within fourteen years from the date of first registration.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am taking a note of every objection raised, and will bring them all before the officers responsible for the drafting of the Bill. Senator Keating can rely upon it that justice will be done, so far as it is possible, in this legislation.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 8 and 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (Registrar).

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—When we were considering the definition clause, I moved an amendment upon the definition of "The Registrar," but had to withdraw it, and I omitted to bring the question up again. I shall, therefore, have to ask the Vice-President of the Executive Council later on to recommit the clause. I have risen now to ask whether there is not in this clause a departure in the language which is used in giving the Deputy-Registrar, provided for in the clause, certain powers "subject to the control of the Registrar." Hitherto, in Acts which we have passed, we have given the Governor-General in Council, or the chief officer concerned, power to depute or assign to a deputy such of his powers as he might think fit. It occurs to me that that is a better way of dealing with the matter than to provide, as under this clause, for the appointment of a Deputy-Registrar, upon whom the powers of the Registrar are conferred "subject to the control of the Registrar." The Deputy-Registrar may give some decision which the Registrar may hold to be slightly outside of his functions. He may think that the Deputy-Registrar has made a mistake, and he may then begin to exercise his control. When we have to deal with judicial functions, the word "control" is, in my opinion, a rather dangerous word to use. I ask the Vice-President of the Executive Council whether the language here used is not a new departure, and whether he thinks it would not be better to provide that the Governor-General in Council or the Registrar might assign to a deputy such of his powers as he thinks desirable.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not see that any difficulty is likely to arise under the clause. The honorable and learned senator will notice, in connexion with the form of this Bill, that the same principle is being carried out as was adopted in the Patents Bill. I am not aware that any difficulty has arisen under that measure.

Senator DOBSON.—What is the meaning of "control," as used here? Will the Registrar be able to set aside or modify a decision of the Deputy-Registrar?

Senator MCGREGOR.—I cannot see the difficulty the honorable and learned senator raises.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 to 14 agreed to.

Clause 15—

The essential particulars of a registrable trade mark shall be one or more of the following particulars:—

- (a) A name of an individual or firm printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner; or
- (b) A written signature or copy of a written signature of the individual or firm applying for registration thereof as a trade mark; or
- (c) A distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, or ticket; or
- (d) An invented word or invented words; or
- (e) A word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods and not being a geographical name used or likely to be understood in a geographical sense.

Senator BEST (Victoria). — I think it will be found desirable to make a number of alterations in this clause, which is a very important provision of the Bill. The expression "individual or firm" in paragraph a is obviously too limited. Mr. Moulton, upon whom the Vice-President of the Executive Council has relied to some extent, amplifies the expression in this way: In clause 5 of his Bill of 1902 he provides—

That for the purposes of this Act a trade mark must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars:—

- (a) The name of an individual, firm, or limited or other company or corporation, or his or their trade name or style, printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner.

Senator GIVENS. — Have we not dealt with that in the definition clause?

Senator BEST.—No; but I point out that we may take a short cut in dealing with the matter by substituting the word "person" for the words "individual or firm" in paragraph a, because a person, according to the Acts Interpretation Act, includes a corporation, and by the amendment made at my instance in this Bill "person and applicant" include a body corporate and firm. The ground, therefore, would be largely covered by such an amendment as I suggest. In this connexion I point out, however, that the substitution of the word "person" for "individual or firm" would still be a limitation, because we should not thus include any trade name or style. To some extent, a trade name or style may be included in the word "firm," but Mr. Moulton, who is a great authority on the subject, evidently does not think so, because he uses not only the word "firm," but also the words "limited or other company or corporation, or his or their trading name or style." I shall have to draw attention to other amendments necessary later in the clause, but in the meantime I suggest to the leader of the Senate that he should leave out the words "individual or firm" and substitute for them the word "person."

Senator CLEMONS.—Is it necessary to substitute anything at all? Paragraph a would be absolutely free from any ambiguity if it stopped at the word "name."

Senator BEST.—I think it is necessary, because a name might be the name of an animal.

Senator GIVENS.—We have the names of animals already—"Bulldog" stout, for instance.

Senator BEST.—Yes; but I point out that we are here dealing with the proprietors of trade marks. This clause deals with the essential particulars of a trade mark, and the trade mark must be registered by a person.

Senator CLEMONS.—I see no objection still to what I have suggested.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable and learned senator might register a trade mark as that of the "Lightning Soap Company."

Senator BEST.—The designation of the trade mark itself does not touch the point with which I am now dealing. Mr. John Smith might register as a trade mark "The Lightning Soap Company," or "The Bulldog brand" for any particular class of goods. It will be observed that other paragraphs of this clause contemplate other things with which I shall deal when we come to them, but the intention of paragraph a is that in the registration of a trade mark certain essential particulars shall appear, and what is contemplated is the name of the person or corporation. I move—

That the words "individual or firm," line 4, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "person."

Senator MCGREGOR.—I wish the Committee to consider which of the suggestions made by Senator Best would be most beneficial—whether we should multiply the terms in the way he has indicated as appearing in Mr. Moulton's Bill, or use the word "person." The Government have no objection to either amendment; their desire is merely to make the Bill as perfect as possible, and they are receiving the benefit of the assistance of Senators Best, Keating and other honorable senators in their endeavours to that end. Personally I think would be sufficient in this case to substitute the word "person" for the words "individual or firm." The object of the officer who drafted this Bill was to make it short and comprehensive as possible. I should like to hear the views of other honorable senators. I am willing to accept the amendment, because I think would be an improvement. It will be noticed that paragraph a applies only to something which has been printed, impressed, woven, or stamped on goods.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—What I agree with what Senator Best said, I cannot see that there would be any danger in simply leaving out the words "of an individual or firm." What is essential in paragraph a is that a name shall be printed, impressed, or woven. There is nothing essential about the words "of an individual or firm." I think it will be perfectly safe to omit the words but I shall object to their being replaced by other words.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—The clause deals with the essential particulars of a registrable trade mark, and has nothing to do with firms, limited liability companies, corporations, or individuals. If these words were left out, it would entitle an individual firm, a limited company, or a corporation to register any name that it chose. Senator Best suggested that the words were omitted, the name of an animal might be registered. But we should not that be allowed? We have several cases of the names of animals being registered as trade marks.

Senator BEST.—That is provided for in paragraph c.

Senator GIVENS.—I think that by leaving out these words we shall simplify the definition, and cover the ground as effectively as the honorable and learned senator desires. I shall vote against the retention of other words, because, in my opinion, they are not necessary.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I wish to draw attention to certain words which appear to be in their wrong place. Ought not the words "printed, impressed, or woven" in paragraph a to be placed at the end of the clause in order to qualify other forms of trade marks? As it stands

Now, it is only the name of an individual or firm which is qualified by those words. But surely it would be more correct to put the words at the end of the provision in order to make them qualify all classes of trade marks.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I would point out to Senator Millen that the words to which he refers are necessary in paragraph a, but not in the other paragraphs. There might be a similarity of names at any time, and the essential thing in paragraph a is that the name shall be printed in a particular and distinctive manner. Suppose, for instance, that the words "John Smith" were to be registered as a trade mark. The trade mark would not consist in the name "John Smith" only, because if it did that would deprive other persons of that name of the right to use it. The registrable fact would be that the name is printed in a particular and distinctive manner. In the case of paragraph b a written signature does not need to be printed, certainly not in a particular and distinctive manner, because the very signature provides the particular and distinctive manner. Again under paragraph c there is no necessity to have a distinctive device or ticket printed in a particular and distinctive manner. If we provided that a distinctive device should be printed in a distinctive manner, and a firm selling the goods wished to advertise them in all parts of the world, that would prevent anybody from printing the device. What necessity is there to print an invented word in a distinctive manner? The fact that an invented word is registered would prevent any one else from using it, and the invented word becomes a distinctive trade mark. I submit that it is only in paragraph a that it is necessary to use the words—printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—After hearing Senator Givens emphasize how necessary it is that the trade mark must be distinctive in some way or other, I am surprised to find that he is prepared to support the omission of the words "of an individual or firm," because that is the one thing which gives the quality of distinction to a particular trade mark coming under paragraph a. The object of the whole clause is to make the essential particulars something absolutely distinctive, so that there shall be nothing about a trade mark that will come under this head, which will rob the rest of the trading community of the right to use it. If we omit those words, will the name be that of a place, or of a man, or of a body? Supposing that a man were to take the name of an article and brand "table" in a distinctive way, how far would another man be entitled to use that in connexion with his mark? How far would it be regarded as being a mark in which the person registering it had some right of user? What we wish to secure under this clause is that the essential portion of the trade mark shall be as far as possible separated from the additional matter. I doubt whether a person could register a simple shield in respect of goods. There would have to be about the shield something else which might be additional matter.

Senator MILLEN.—In New South Wales a shield with a lion across it is registered.

Senator KEATING.—The simple branding of the lion on the shield creates a distinctive label. It is the association of added matter with a simple device which gives the trade mark its distinctiveness. Then you can separate easily and accurately the added matter from the essential portion which comes under this clause; but if the words "of an individual or firm" are omitted from paragraph a, the term "name" is so extensive that it does not qualify it at all.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Might it not open the door to fraud if "name" were left out?

Senator KEATING.—My objection is that if we simply say "a name" we do not qualify it by saying what the subject is.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why should we?

Senator KEATING.—A man cannot register an ordinary word.

Senator MILLEN.—Under paragraph c I could register the "Table" brand of boots.

Senator KEATING.—I am not dealing with that paragraph. The whole position here is that the name has to be printed, impressed, or woven, as particularly as possible, and limited to a certain class of subjects. That has been the tendency in the legislation, not only of the States, but of England. We know that decisions have been given in regard to each and every one of these paragraphs to which we expect to look for guidance.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I do not think that Senator Keating quite grasps the full import of this clause. To my mind it presents a series of alternatives, and nothing else. Senator Givens and I are encouraged to omit the words "of an individual or firm" by paragraph e. It has been contended that a mere name is not sufficient, and that there should be added to the name something to connect it with an individual or firm or corporation. If honorable senators will refer to paragraph e they will see that a far wider scope is offered there in the registration of a trade mark. There is one limitation only. What it practically says is, "In making your trade mark, and applying for its registration, you can use any word, but you must use a word if you use a name." Subject only to this limitation it does not refer to the character or quality of the goods, or have a geographical bearing. We can all recollect a hundred and one different words which are registered as trade marks, and which do not refer to the character or quality of the goods, and which have no geographical bearing. It is quite obvious that in paragraph a what is essential is that a name shall be printed, impressed, or woven. If a person were to propose to register a trade mark an inquiry would be held to ascertain whether the trade mark came under any one of the limitations in this clause. If it happened to be a name printed, impressed, or woven in a particular and distinctive manner, it would be accepted at once, because it complied with paragraph a. It has not to comply with all the limitations, but only with one. I see no reason for the omission of that paragraph. Why should we not facilitate the registration of trade marks? I would point out to Senator McGregor that the essential part of paragraph a is not a name, and an indication of an individual or firm, but the operation of printing, impressing, or weaving. I can conceive it quite possible that it might be absolutely necessary for a trade mark to be woven into or impressed or printed on certain articles. We have the authority for this provision in the English Act.

The CHAIRMAN.—Does the honorable and learned senator wish to leave out the word "of" before the words "an individual"?

Senator CLEMONS.—I thought it had been done. I shall move to strike out all the words in paragraph a after the words "A name."

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I shall be only too pleased to withdraw my amendment, for the purpose of enabling Senator Clemons to move his amendment, but I think the Committee would make a mistake if it yielded to his suggestion. It has been laid down that paragraphs a, b, c, d, and e are to be read independently, and not conjunctively. That was the subject of a dispute for many years, but ultimately it was decided that they were to be read independently. Therefore, in dealing with this matter, we have to look at the object of the clause. It has been held in English legislation that in connexion with trade marks, a word or words have no reference to the quality or type of the goods can be used. It is therefore, necessary that, in dealing with this amendment, we should make paragraph a apply to the name of an individual or of a corporation or firm. If we take paragraph a in the manner suggested by my honorable and learned friend, it would be quite competent to register as a trade mark the name of an article itself—such as rice, boots, or any other commodity which it was proposed to sell.

Senator CLEMONS.—No, because that would be in conflict with paragraph e.

Senator BEST.—My honorable learned friend has admitted that the provisions are to be read independently, conjunctively. If so, it would be competent to register as a trade mark "rice" or "boots."

Senator CLEMONS.—It would never be held so.

Senator BEST.—My honorable learned friend cannot get away from this proposition. In fact, it has been laid down in the Solio case that these provisions can be read independently.

Senator GIVENS.—That case decides that they can be read independently, not that they must be read independently.

Senator BEST.—They must be read independently. It was said that Solio was in reference to photographic paper, and referred to the quality of that paper, consequently it was held that that could not be used. Ultimately it was held that it could be used, and the general principle was laid down as a matter of fixed law, that the provisions were to be read independently and not conjunctively. Even in British legislation, we have it laid down as a principle of trade marks law, that it is undesirable that any word or words should be used which have any bearing or reference to the quality or character of the goods. If that is a sound principle laid down in paragraph e, it is unnecessary under paragraph a, to enable the chan-nd quality of the goods to be shown by trade mark. As I have already pointed out, if the words "person or corporation trading concern" are not inserted in the way I have suggested, it would be quite possible to register "easy walking boots" as a trade mark.

Senator CLEMONS.—No; it would not.

Senator BEST.—I am absolutely certain on that point.

Senator CLEMONS.—That would be applying a decision under one Act to a totally different Act.

Senator BEST.—No, it would not, indeed. All it would be necessary to say would be, "I want to have impressed on a particular portion of my goods the words, 'Easy Walking Boots.'"

Senator GIVENS.—That is not a name.

Senator BEST.—"Boots" is a name. "Rice" and "fish" are names. They describe the character and quality of goods by name. That is what the result would be, and, consequently, I see very serious objections to the alteration. I think the proper course would be to strike out the words "individual or firm," and substitute the words "a person." That would be more in consonance with British legislation, and with sound principles of trade marks law.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Senator CLEMONS) proposed—

That the word "of," line 4, be left out.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I think we are losing sight of the real object of paragraph a. That object is distinct from the object of every other paragraph of this clause. I would suggest to Senator Best that we should leave out the word "individual," and substitute the word "person," leaving in the word "firm." He will recognise that the word "person" has a very wide meaning under the Acts Interpretation Act, and that it will fulfil the whole object of the paragraph. I will show the object of it. Suppose there are a number of persons carrying on business. They may be named William Jones, John Jones, and Andrew Jones. Or there may be two or three persons named John Jones carrying on business in a particular part of Australia. They may all wish to register their names as their trade marks. Paragraph a provides that the name of a person or firm can be registered if it is printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner upon the goods sold. If the name "John Jones" were to be registered without being impressed in a distinctive manner upon the goods, the name would not be a trade mark. In that case, there would be nothing to particularize John Jones, of Swanston-street, from John Jones, of Footscray. But the clause provides that any number of persons or firms can register their names or the name of a firm, no matter if it is the name of any other person or firm, so long as it is printed, impressed, or woven in a distinctive manner upon the goods. That is the whole principle of the provision. The object is to make the matter so clear that the public will not confound Thomas Brown, of one place, with Thomas Brown, of another. It is a necessary provision in a Bill of this description. If we substitute the word "person" for the word "individual" it will, I believe, include a firm. But we must retain the paragraph. The other paragraphs would have no effect without it.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I have just been reminded that an amendment has been made in the definition clause, of which I was not aware. My difficulty was as to whether the words "individual or firm" would be sufficiently comprehensive from a legal point of view. But since Senator Best has informed me that we have already passed an amendment in the definition clause which gives to the term "person" the fullest possible definition that can be thought desirable, my chief objection to these words has disappeared. I therefore ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I move—

That the words "an individual or firm," line 4, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "a person."

Honorable senators are aware that we have already altered the definition of the word "person," so that it not only comprises a corporation, but also a firm. I think that the words "person, corporation, or firm" pretty well cover the whole case, though Mr. Moulton, in his Bill, uses the words "an individual, or firm, or limited or other company or corporation."

Senator MULCAHY (Tasmania). — I think that if we wish to make the definition more comprehensive, the terms used by Mr. Moulton in his Bill are better than those which we propose to use. I am not quite sure whether the word "person" will be quite so comprehensive as the terms which Mr. Moulton has used. I do not like to interfere with the drafting of a Bill in Committee, but we should know exactly what we are doing, and I doubt whether the word "person" is sufficiently comprehensive to cover all that it is desired to cover.

Amendment agreed to.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I now intend to ask the Committee to strike out the whole of paragraph c, with the object of substituting Mr. Moulton's provision, which is an infinitely better one. His provision is as follows:—

The original signature or copy of the original signature of an individual, being either his own name or that under which he bond fide carries on his business or businesses, or of a firm being the bond fide trading name or style under which they carry on their business or businesses applying for registration thereof as a trade mark.

I have also seen the last Bill drawn up by Mr. Moulton, and in it he makes a very important alteration, which certainly should appear. The provision there reads—

The signature or in the case of a corporation or company the name written in some distinctive manner of the individual or corporation applying for the registration, or the predecessor in the business.

I am quite indifferent as to which of these is accepted; but I suggest that the Vice-President of the Executive Council should accept one or the other, because, as the clause at present stands, it would not be competent for a man to register a trade mark bearing the name of the predecessor in the business. We know that in connexion with many old-established businesses the name of the old firm has been adopted for years. The clause provides, as an essential particular—

A written signature or copy of a written signature of the individual or firm applying for registration thereof.

And it says nothing whatever about a power to register the name of a predecessor.

Senator GIVENS.—I suggest as a short way out of the difficulty the leaving out of the words "individual or firm," and the insertion of the word "person" as we have done in paragraph a. That would cover everything.

Senator BEST.—The honorable senator will see that it would not, because that might not include a predecessor in a business.

Senator GIVENS.—Yes it would, if the business was being carried on in his name, sign, or title. Such an amendment would make the clause consistent throughout.

Senator BEST.—I think it would be wiser to have the name of the individual applying or the predecessor. In the preceding paragraph we have provided the name of the person being printed interwoven or impressed in some particular and distinctive manner; but in this paragraph what is contemplated is the written signature of the applicant. I believe that the paragraph as it stands does not go far enough, and it should include the name of the predecessor in the business. I move—

That paragraph b be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the following paragraph (b) A written signature, or a copy of a written signature, of the individual, being either his name or that under which he bond fide carries on his business or businesses, or of the firm, being the bond fide trading name or style under which they carry on their business or businesses, applying for a registration thereof as a trade mark.

I admit that if I had a little time I could possibly cut down this paragraph to some extent.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Why have the amendment printed for the benefit of honorable senators?

Senator BEST.—This is merely a verbal alteration, proposed on recognised authority.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not think that such an alteration is really necessary. The more definite we make our legislation the less trouble there will be in administering it. The object of this paragraph is simply to enable an individual, firm, to register his or their name—that is, the written name, or a copy of the written name. That is the distinctive feature of this paragraph. The essential particular in this instance, is the written signature of the individual or firm. With respect to the difficulty pointed out by Senator Best—and I am sure members of the Committee are indebted to the honorable and learned senator for the trouble he is taking in connexion with this legislation—if a firm is trading under the title of Johnstone Jones, and Co., those particular persons may have been dead a long time, and the firm may be in the hands of Young & Brown, who are carrying on the business in the name of Johnstone, Jones, and Co. They would, of course, have a perfect right under this paragraph to register the written signature of the firm of Johnstone, Jones, and Co., or a copy of it. I think it would be far better to leave the paragraph as it stands. The draftsman has, in this instance, much simplified the matter. I believe the paragraph carries out all that is required, and I hope honorable senators will pass it as it stands.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I have no desire to unduly embarrass the leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator McGREGOR.—I quite understand that the honorable and learned senator is doing his best to improve the Bill.

Senator BEST.—In my amendment I have adopted the words of Mr. Moulton, because he is such a recognised authority. Senator GIVENS has suggested the leaving out of the words "individual or firm," with a view to substituting the word "person." That would be an improvement upon the paragraph as it stands, but the objection to that lies in the fact that what is required here is the written signature or copy of the written signature of the person, and as "person" includes a corporation, and a corporation has no written signature, but a seal, the result might be to restrict the meaning of the word "person" to some extent. If Senator McGREGOR has any objection to the wording of my amendment, I suggest another alteration of the paragraph, which would be very simple, and readily followed. It is that the word "person" be substituted for the words "individual or firm," and that, after the word "thereof," the words "or his predecessor in business" be inserted.

Senator McGREGOR.—I am prepared to agree to that.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments (by Senator BEST) agreed to—

That the words "individual or firm," line 8, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "person."

That after the word "thereof," line 9, the words "or his predecessor in business" be inserted.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I desire now to draw the attention of the Committee to a matter to which I referred very fully when speaking on the second reading of the Bill, and to submit a further amendment. The object is to preserve old trade marks that are not registered. In this connexion, I am following the principles laid down in British legislation on the subject. I move—

That the following new paragraph be added—

"(f) Provided, however, that any word or words, letter, figure, or combination of letters or figures used as a trade mark before the first day of January, 1901, may be registered as a trade mark under this Act."

A somewhat similar provision was inserted in British legislation on this subject, for the preservation of old trade marks which had been in existence, I was about to say, almost for centuries, but at all events for a great many years. The date fixed in the English statute was some day in the year 1875, and what was provided was that trade marks in existence prior to that were not to be prejudiced by the Act. I submit this amendment on the same lines, in order to preserve a number of our old trade marks, and there are hundreds of well-recognised brands and trade marks in use in Australia, that are not registered. Only on the last day of meeting of the Senate an honorable senator mentioned to me a case which had come under his notice professionally, where a trade mark had been in existence for twenty or thirty years, and under the law of South Australia the actual proprietors of it were unable to register it, because some of the essential particulars required under the State law prevented that being done. I contend that if a man has, by his enterprise, given great value to a particular trade mark, and by the expenditure of money has increased the reputation of his goods upon the market, and those goods are known to the public as meritorious, he should continue to have the benefit of his trade mark, and should not be prejudiced by our legislation. I am not in this matter introducing any novel principle, but endeavouring to follow practically the terms of British legislation on the subject. I may be asked why I fix the date as the 1st day of January, 1901. It is necessary to fix some date, and as the Commonwealth came into existence on the 1st January, 1901, that was the date from which our legislation must start—it certainly could not go behind that date. I therefore suggest that that is a very proper date to insert in this instance. I believe that the adoption of this amendment would but do justice to a number of enterprising men who are the proprietors of well-established trade marks.

Senator GIVENS.—The honorable and learned senator is referring to trade marks registered before the 1st January, 1901?

Senator BEST.—No; to trade marks that have not been registered. I remind the honorable senator that if they had been registered they would be protected under this Bill.

Senator GIVENS.—The proprietors could not have valued the trade marks very much if they have not registered them.

Senator BEST.—I point out to the honorable senator that, by reason of the requirements of the State laws with respect to the essential particulars of a trade mark, it may not have been possible to register the trade marks to which I refer. It is my desire that the rights of the owners in these trade marks should be preserved by this Bill. I am not wedded to the 1st day of January, 1901; I should be content if honorable senators decided to go ten years back; but I think that the 1st day of January, 1901, would be a date consonant with the Commonwealth legislation.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—It has been judicially decided that a mere combination of letters that do not in themselves form a word would not come within paragraph c of this clause. There are some marks, the essential particulars of which, not from the legal or statutory point of view, but from the commercial point of view, consist merely of letters used in combination. We hear, for instance of "G.B.D.," "C.B.B.," and other combinations of that kind applied to particular classes of goods. We know as a matter of fact that it is only by reason of the fact that they are used in association with some simple device, which may be a circle, a wreath, or an oval-shaped device, that they have been registered as trade marks.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—They are generally the initials of a firm.

Senator BEST.—There is the combination "I.X.L."

Senator KEATING.—They are generally the initials of a firm, and they are used in association with some such device as I have mentioned. A difficulty is that it is competent for other persons to use these combinations of letters when separated from the particular device. There have been one or two instances in Australia where people have claimed to use particular combinations of letters, which, from the commercial, if not from the legal or statutory point of view, form the essential particulars of trade marks; and persons who have gained credit for a particular brand of goods having a certain trade mark, have thereby been defrauded. I am disposed to believe that the amendment moved by Senator Best will meet that difficulty, and probably the honorable and learned senator intended that it should. I had intended myself to move the addition of a new paragraph to the following effect:—

Any combination of letters not forming a word or of figures, or such letters and figures combined together.

But I think that Senator Best's amendment will effectively deal with the matter.

Senator BEST.—It will deal with a recognised old trade mark.

Senator KEATING.—If Senator BEST has that in contemplation, I have very much pleasure in supporting the amendment as moved.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16 agreed to.

Clause 17—

Except in the case of a trade mark properly registered in any State under a State Trade Marks Act, a registrable trade mark must not contain

- (a) the words "trade mark," "registered," "registered design," "copyright," "entered at Stationers' Hall," "counterfeit this is forgery," or words to the like effect; or
- (b) a representation of the King, the Queen, or any member of the Royal Family.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I cannot see the necessity for striking out of a trade mark such words as are mentioned in this clause. If a thing is bonâ fide registered as a trade mark, and anything on its label indicates that fact, that gives further assurance to the public. What the clause means is that in future it shall not be compulsory for a merchant to use the words "trade mark," "registered design," "copyright," and "entered at Stationers' Hall," in a trade mark. I am quite aware that the trade mark regulations of Great Britain contain this particular provision, but so far as I have not been able to discover why should exist. I would suggest to Senator McGregor that the words "trade mark," "registered," "registered design," "copyright" should be omitted. I can well understand a representation of the King or the Queen, or other members of the Royal Family being excluded.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am informed that this clause embodies the practice in England. In the absence of the provision it might be found that those who had registered trade marks might have written or printed the words "registered trade mark" or the word "registered." If it were to simply use the word "registered" it would not be a false description under the Fraudulent Marks Act, and no prosecution could take place. The object of the provision is to prevent the use of these words in unregistered trade marks.

Senator BEST.—Why not leave out the clause?

Senator MCGREGOR.—It is far better to accept the clause, especially when it remembered that we are only going on the lines followed in the old country.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—We are not exactly following those lines, because this clause is really taken from the regulations made under the British Act. Clause 70 of this Bill reserves to the Governor-General in Council the power to make regulations, and for many reasons it would be desirable to leave out this clause, and, if necessary, to deal with the subject by regulation. If it is dealt with in a special clause, it will be a limitation of the power contained in clause 70. It will be much better to leave the whole question to be dealt with by regulations. In these circumstances it will not do any harm if we omit the clause.

Clause 22—

A trade mark must be registered in respect of particular goods or classes of goods as prescribed.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I hope that Senator McGregor will see his way to embody in the Bill, at a future stage, the regulations which have been in use for many years in Great Britain and the several States. These have been approved by use so long that he will make the measure more complete by including them in a schedule. There will be no difficulty in complying with my suggestion, because I learn that regulations have been prepared, I suppose, in anticipation of the Bill coming into operation at an early period. I have spoken to some business men on this subject, and they all say that it would facilitate operations to have the regulations embodied in the Act. I shall ask my honorable friend to allow me to move in that direction at a later stage, if he should not see his way to take that course.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am aware that regulations have been drafted to classify the goods to which trade marks shall be applied, but I am not so clear that the readiest way to transact business would be to bring down an immense schedule, containing nearly all the goods which are dealt with in the Commonwealth. When the regulations are laid upon the table in accordance with the Act, every honorable senator will have an opportunity to examine them, and to move for the amendment of any objectionable regulation. We are living in a progressive age, and we can never tell when a new article of food or clothing may be invented. It is much easier to deal with a case of that kind by regulation than by a special Bill. But out of deference to Senator Best, I shall refer the matter to the officers concerned, and get an expression of opinion from those who have been responsible for the drafting of the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 23—

1. If a trade mark—

- (a) contains parts not separately registered by the proprietor as trade marks, or
- (b) contains matter common to the trade or otherwise of a non-distinctive character, the Registrar or the Law Officer or the Court, in deciding whether the trade mark shall be entered or shall remain upon the register, may require, as a condition of its being upon the register, that the proprietor shall disclaim any right to the exclusive use of any of those parts, or of that matter, to the exclusive use of which they hold him not to be entitled, or that he shall make such other disclaimer as they think needful for the purpose of defining his rights under the registration.

Provided always that no such disclaimer shall affect any rights of the proprietor of the trade mark except such as depend upon its registration.

2. The fact that a mark is publicly used by more than three persons as a mark on or in connexion with similar goods shall be treated as conclusive evidence that it is common to the trade.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—The first alteration I desire to suggest in this clause is the insertion of the words "in his or its discretion" after the word "may" in sub-clause 1. That word is sometimes read as "shall," and it would be a fatal thing in many instances were it read as "shall." It will be noticed that if a trade mark contains a matter common to the trade it may be rejected from the registry, or that if it is the case of an application for a trade mark in these circumstances it may be rejected. That would be manifestly unfair, because hitherto a particular brand or trade mark, such as the Lion brand or trade mark, has been registered by six different proprietors in six different States. And under sub-clause 2 of this clause most serious hardships might be worked. The second suggestion I have to make is that after the word "persons" the words "in any one State" ought to be inserted. I understand that the Vice-President of the Executive Council will agree to this amendment, and, therefore, I move—

That after the word "may," line 8, the words "in his or its discretion" be inserted.

In this amendment I am following the principle laid down in clause 27, which has to be read in conjunction with the present provision.

Clause 24—

Except by order of the Court, the Registrar shall not register in respect of the same goods a trade mark identical with one belonging to a different proprietor which is already on the register in respect of such goods, or so nearly resembling such a trade mark as to be likely to deceive.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—I should like to draw attention to the verbiage in this and one or two other clauses on the same page. The amendment which I intend to move does not in any way affect the principle of the clause. According to clause 22 a trade mark may be "registered in respect of particular goods or classes of goods as prescribed," and I suggest that in clause 24 similar terms should be used, so as to prevent any doubt in construction. The goods can only be like goods or like classes of goods; and, therefore, I move—

That the words "the same," line 2, be left out.

Senator MCGREGOR. — I think the amendment submitted is an improvement, and, therefore, I have no hesitation in accepting it.

Clause 27—

In case of honest concurrent user or of special circumstances the Court may, in its discretion, permit the registration of the same trade mark or of nearly identical trade marks for the same goods. . . .

Senator BEST (Victoria).—It will be observed that according to clause 23 the Registrar or the Law Officer or the Court, in deciding whether a trade mark shall be entered or remain on the register, may require a disclaimer, and I think it would be wise to make a similar provision in clause before us. I move—

That after the word "the," line 2, the words "Registrar, Law Officer, or the" be inserted. The amendment will give the Law Officer power to do what the clause now permits only to the Court. There are many similar cases which it would be almost harsh to require people to have to take to Court, when they could be dealt with efficiently by the Registrar or Law Officer. Keeping in mind that there are separate registrations in different States, and the difficulties which may arise therefrom, I submit this amendment with a view to simplicity and economy.

Senator MCGREGOR. — I agree with Senator Best that it is a desirable amendment. There are many cases which the Registrar or Law Officer might be able to settle without putting the parties to trouble, to say nothing of the expense going before the Court. If any injustice is done by the Registrar or Law Officer, an appeal may be made to the Court.

Clause 29—

Where under the provisions of this Act a registered trade mark is required to be proved for any purpose, the Registrar or the Court . . . may . . . accept user of an associated registered trade mark . . .

Senator KEATING (Tasmania). — Is there any reason why the Law Officer should not have power to deal with such matters as are contemplated by this clause, or has there been an omission in the draft? I should think that if the Registrar has the power the Law Officer should also have the power. I move—

That after the word "Registrar," line 3, the words "Law Officer" be inserted.

Clause 30 agreed to.

Clause 31—

1. Any person claiming to be the proprietor of a trade mark, may make application to the Registrar for the registration of his trade mark.

2. The application must be made in the form prescribed and must—

(c) State an address within the Commonwealth as an address for service:

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I do not think that the words "as an address for service" are sufficiently wide to cover service of a legal process. No doubt they would be sufficient for the purpose of service of any notice in connexion with an application. I see that Mr. Moulton, in his draft Bill, uses the words—

The address so furnished, or any address subsequently furnished, shall be a sufficient address for the service of any notice or any legal or other proceeding in connexion with a trade mark, the subject of such application.

I suggest the striking out of the words "an address for service," and the insertion of words based upon those used in Mr. Moulton's Bill.

Senator DAWSON.—Surely a trader's address would be known to the Postal authorities.

Senator BEST.—The amendment is intended to facilitate the working of the office. The officials cannot search over Australia for the owner of a particular trade mark. He must leave his address with the office, and must understand that service at that address is sufficient. That is a valid and good principle. I move—

That the words "as an address for service" be left out with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "The address so furnished, or any address in Australia subsequently furnished shall be a sufficient address for the service of any notice or any legal or other proceeding in connexion with the trade mark, the subject of such application."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause also consequentially amended, and agreed to.

Clause 32—

1. Every application must be lodged by being left at or sent by post to the Trade Marks Office.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I suggest that in connexion with this clause we should follow what was done in the Patents Act. The clause provides that every application must be lodged at the Trade Marks Office. I wish to provide that the application upon being lodged shall be forthwith referred by the Registrar to an examiner who shall search the register, and ascertain and report whether a previous trade mark has already been granted, and as to the desirability or otherwise of limiting the grant to one or more States. That is in consonance with section 39 of the Patents Act, which provides that—

Every application and specification shall forthwith be referred by the Commissioner to an examiner, who shall ascertain and report as to—

(a) Whether the title has been stated as prescribed;

(b) whether the invention has been described as prescribed; and

(c) whether the application and specification are as prescribed.

I wish to have due regard paid to trade marks which have already been issued in other States. By that means we shall ultimately obtain a system of trade marks that will be applicable in all the States as far as possible.

Senator DAWSON.—There is a very wide difference between the Patents Office and a Trade Marks Office.

Senator BEST.—They are to be the same office.

Senator DAWSON.—In the case of a patent, a man comes along with a novelty; but a trade mark is simply a coloured design.

Senator BEST.—No. It may be a device or a distinctive symbol of some character. My suggestion is that care shall be exercised in the issue of Commonwealth trade marks to see that they do not infringe trade marks already issued.

Senator DAWSON.—I agree with that.

Senator BEST.—That is my whole object. I move—

That after the word "office," line 2, the following new sub-clause be inserted—"1A. Such application shall be forthwith referred by the Registrar to an examiner, who shall search the register herein provided for, and also the various State registers, and ascertain and report whether the proposed mark has been already wholly or partially appropriated, and the desirability or otherwise of limiting the grant to one or more States."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 33—

1. An appeal shall lie to the Law Officer from any conditional acceptance or any refusal by the Registrar of the application.

2. The Law Officer shall hear the applicant and the Registrar, and shall decide whether and subject to what conditions or modifications (if any) the application shall be accepted.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I think that in this case there should also be an ultimate appeal to the Court.

Senator KEATING.—There is.

Senator BEST.—The honorable and learned senator will pardon me, there is not. It is somewhat anomalous, but it is only in cases where there is opposition that the applicant can appeal to the Court under clause 42, which provides—

1. Any party aggrieved by the decision of the officer may, in the time and in the manner prescribed, appeal to the Court.

2. The Court shall hear the applicant and the opponent, and determine whether the application ought to be refused or ought to be granted with or without any modifications or conditions.

In order that the Bill might be made symmetrical, an ultimate appeal to the Court should be allowed in this case also.

Senator DAWSON.—Would not that be tautology. Under clause 42 any party aggrieved by the decision of the Law Officer may appeal to the Court.

Senator BEST.—I remind the honorable senator that clause 42 refers only to opposed applications. I desire to have the same principle applied where the Registrar or Law Officer refuses applications which are not opposed.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I desire to take the sense of the Committee with regard to these appeals. In my opinion, we have rather too many of them. In connexion with this clause, there is only one appeal from the Registrar to the Law Officer, but Senator Best desires that there should be a second appeal from the Law Officer to the Court. In respect of applications, which are opposed, the Bill already provides for two appeals. I think we might well cut out one of these appeals. I ask whether it is constitutional or right to have an appeal from the Registrar to the Law Officer. The Law Officer will be the Attorney-General, or the Solicitor-General, and I can scarcely conceive of a case in which any legal question may be involved, where the Registrar will not seek the advice of the Law Officer. In the circumstances, the Attorney-General, having the administration of the law, will not desire to have anything to do with its judicial features.

Senator BEST.—It is specifically stated in the Bill that the law is to be administered by the Minister of Trade and Customs, or other Minister administering that Department.

Senator DOBSON.—If the Registrar is in doubt in connexion with any application, he will no doubt seek the assistance and advice of the Law Officer before giving his decision, and in such circumstances of what use is it to give the applicant an appeal to the Law Officer when he will already have had that officer's opinion in the decision given by the Registrar? In such a case it might be necessary to give the applicant an appeal to the Court, but there should be no necessity for an appeal to the Law Officer. In many of these matters we do not permit an appeal at all. I understand that under the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill it is proposed that the award of one Judge, which may settle questions of momentous importance, and involving thousands of pounds, is to be final. Why there should be two appeals given in this case I am at a loss to understand.

Senator KEATING.—In the case of opposed applications there may be only one appeal to the Court, under clause 43.

Senator DOBSON.—I am aware of that, but the applicant if he chooses may have two shots. He may appeal from the Registrar to the Law Officer, and from the Law Officer to the Court. I think it is not wise to allow two appeals. In order to test the matter, I move—

That the words "Law Officer," line 1, be left out with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "Court."

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I quite realize that there is some force in the argument of Senator Dobson, but we are incorporating nothing new in these provisions. As a matter of fact, in the experience of the States, it has proved to be very convenient to be able to go to the Law Officer, whose decisions have, as a rule, been very satisfactory. If the applicant is to be obliged to go to the Court, that will simply mean increasing the expense which he will have to incur. So far as the Attorney-General is concerned, when he knows that it may be his duty to adjudicate on trade marks matters, he will be most careful not to advise, and consequently the Registrar could not go to him for advice.

Senator DOBSON.—I say that he should be able to go to him for advice.

Senator BEST.—Under the Victorian law he would go to the Crown Solicitor, but the "Law Officer," according to the definition in this Bill, is the Attorney-General or Crown Solicitor of the Commonwealth. The principle introduced in this Bill is consonant with the legislation in the States; but, of course, it does not necessarily follow on that account that it is right.

When we can add that the provision has worked well in several of the States, there can be little reason for any serious apprehension, such as that entertained by Senator Dobson. I think that, on the whole, the public will be benefited by the provision as it stands, because, if applicants are obliged to go to the Court they will be put to additional expense.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable and learned senator is suggesting that they should have the right to appeal to the Court, after appealing to the Law Officer.

Senator DAWSON.—Senator Best is giving the power to appeal to the Court, if they think they do not get fair play from the Law Officer.

Senator BEST.—As to the other objection raised by Senator Dobson, if the Registrar could not get the advice of the Attorney-General, he would have to do as is done in the States in innumerable instances—he would have to get the advice of a Crown Prosecutor, or one of the other legal officers associated with Crown Departments, and, in the last resort, he could consult outside professional opinion.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—With regard to the apprehension of Senator Dobson that, in some cases, the Registrar may be cut off from the legal advice of the Law Officer of the Commonwealth, I point out that, in such a case, possibly what the honorable and learned senator desires would be given effect to, and there would be a direct appeal from the Registrar to the Court. If the Registrar consulted the Attorney-General as Law Officer of the Commonwealth in a doubtful case, and he refused an application, and if the applicant desired to appeal against that refusal, it is not likely that the Attorney-General would agree to sit in a judicial capacity to review a decision for which he was himself responsible. Under clause 43, if both parties consent, an appeal may be made direct from the Registrar to the Court. If we provide that, in the case of unopposed applications, an appeal may be made by both parties direct to the Court, I am satisfied that in every such case as is contemplated by Senator Dobson, all parties having, as they would, a sense of decency would agree to a direct appeal to the Court. The Attorney-General would not care to review his own decision, and certainly the Registrar would not ask the appellant to go with him before the Law Officer, who had already advised him to refuse the application. If we were to re-insert the clause, we might rely upon it that in every case where the Law Officer had been consulted the appeal would be from the Registrar direct to the Court.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—Senator Best tells us that the present practice is incorporated in the Bill, and has worked very well, and that applicants have found that it is an inexpensive way of appealing to the Law Officer. But Senator Keating says that if the Law Officer were consulted, and had a hand in guiding the decision of the Registrar, he would, as a matter of course, refuse to take the appeal. I take it that if the Act entitled the applicant to appeal to the Law Officer the latter could not refuse to take the appeal, and he would not advise the Registrar in such a way as to make himself judicially and officially responsible for the advice given. On the contrary, they would have a friendly talk over the matter, the Law Officer would advise the Registrar, though not so fully and thoroughly as he would do when appealed to, and a decision would be given. An appeal would then lie to the Law Officer, and, as a matter of course, it would have to be accepted. I am inclined to think that Senator Keating is wrong, but still I contend that we are unnecessarily giving the right of appeal to the applicants.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania). — I shall oppose the amendment, because we are dealing with the whole class of cases, and we cannot legislate for a whole class by reference to individual cases. If we compel every individual whose application is refused by the Registrar to go to the Court we shall act wrongly. This is not a case where the rights of others are necessarily involved. It is the case of an application which has been duly notified, and to which there has been no opposition, but for some reason or other the Registrar has declined to register the trade mark. It is proposed to compel that man to go straight to the Court, when he might be allowed to appeal in a quick, simple, and inexpensive way.

Senator GUTHRIE.—By seeing a member of Parliament?

Senator KEATING.—No; by going to the Attorney-General. The matter would have to be heard by that Law Officer in a judicial capacity. This provision is inserted in the Bill because in many of these instances the Law Officer is quite competent to decide whether the Registrar had or had not made a mistake, and to decide the point more expeditiously and less expensively to the party concerned than could the Court. If we were to take away that right, and compel him to appeal to the Court, he would not feel inclined to go to all that expense and bother. If, in a knotty case, the Registrar did consult the Attorney-General or the Crown Solicitor, and, acting on his advice, refused the application, the good sense and decency of the Registrar and Law Officer, and the demand of the applicant himself, would combine to cause any appeal from that decision to be made, not to the Law Officer, but to the Court, if provision be made that by consent the parties can go direct to the Court. But a large number of the unopposed applications will, I take it, be refused by the Registrar, acting on his own sense of what is right and wrong, without reference to the latter officer. It would be entirely wrong in these cases to require a man, in order to assert his rights, to go to the expense of resorting to the Court. We ought to give him a simple, cheap, and expeditious mode of getting the matter settled by a competent officer, who may be called upon to act judicially in a matter which is outside his own Department.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I would appeal to Senator Dobson to withdraw his amendment. I know that he is animated by a desire to consult the best interests of the public, but I fear that he is not doing so in this instance. We cannot afford to ignore our actual experience. At the present time, when an application is refused by the Registrar, the applicant has only to walk to the office of the Attorney-General, and lay the case before him, at very little expense, to get a settlement. If in such cases an applicant were compelled to appeal to the Court, it would prevent a number of very deserving persons from getting their just rights.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I am hardly convinced by my honorable friends. I think that there are too many appeals provided for. Senator Best, who has asked me to withdraw my amendment, desires to add another appeal against a refusal to accept an application; but the Registrar would not reject an application unless it was perfectly plain that the applicant had no status. I shall be quite content to take the sense of the Committee on the amendment.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I would also ask Senator Dobson to withdraw the amendment, because throughout the Bill the Law Officer is put in a similar position to the Registrar. It will be much better for the applicants if they can get the opinion of the Law Officer before they are obliged to go to the Court. Senator Dobson knows that if there is no opposition to an application for the registration of a trade mark, and it is found to comply with all the provisions of the law, it will not be refused. The reason for an application not being granted by the Registrar might be an intimation of some opposition. If an injustice were done to an applicant or an opponent of an application, by either the Registrar or the Law Officer, he could go to the Court. In my opinion, it would be time enough for him to go to the Court when the injustice was done. It is very wise to afford the public an opportunity of exhausting every means of settling the difficulties before they appeal to the Court. I have no fear of any political or other influence being brought to bear on the Registrar or Law Officer. Those officers would know that the applicant could still appeal to the Court, and that knowledge would keep them on the straight track.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment (by Senator BEST) agreed to—

That the following new sub-clauses be added:

3. Any party aggrieved by the decision of the Law Officer may, in the time and in the manner prescribed, appeal to the Court.

4. The Court shall hear the applicant and the Registrar or Law Officer, or both, and determine whether the application ought to be refused, ought to be granted, with or without any modifications or conditions.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment (by Senator BEST) proposed—

That the following new clause be inserted—

“33A. If the applicant and the Registrar consent, an appeal shall lie direct from the Registrar to the Court without any appeal to the Law Officer.”

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I should like to hear what the Minister in charge of the Bill has to say to this proposal, which appears to me to be bad legislation. One can quite understand that where an application is opposed, both parties may consent to a certain appeal; but when it is desired to appeal against the decision of the Registrar, why should the consent of the latter have to be obtained by the applicant? Personally, I must say, I do not like the proposal. If an applicant chooses to avail himself of the more skilled, capable, and experienced tribunal, he ought not to be required to get the consent of the Registrar.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The Bill would be better without the proposed new clause. Even if such a provision were inserted, it ought to be as a sub-clause of clause 33, which should deal with the whole matter. The case contemplated is where there is an application for registration, and there is no opposition except by the Registrar. If the applicant is not satisfied, he has the option to go to the Law Officer, and if he be dissatisfied with the decision of both Registrar and Law Officer, he may go to the Court. I do not see any necessity to give either the Registrar or the applicant the option of going to Court, without any reference to the Law Officer.

Senator BEST.—If both consent, what does it matter?

Senator MCGREGOR.—There is proper machinery provided by the Bill, and if the parties ultimately find it necessary to go to the Court, that machinery is available. I agree with Senator Dobson, that there seems no reason why an applicant, even in the absence of the Law Officer, should have to ask the consent of the Registrar to go to the Court, to which, in any case, he ultimately has the power to appeal.

Senator BEST.—The first words of the proposed new clause might be struck out.

Senator MCGREGOR.—But I do not think that the new clause is necessary; the machinery in clause 33 is quite sufficient.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—In the proposed new clause, I merely adopt the machinery which is provided in clause 43, which says—

If both parties consent—that is to say, the Registrar and the applicant—

an appeal shall lie direct from the Registrar to the Court without any appeal to the Law Officer.

Senator DOBSON.—That applies to cases where there are two parties.

Senator BEST.—But there are two parties in the case contemplated by the proposed new clause, and the same two parties that are referred to in clause 43, the Registrar being really the opponent. If Senator McGregor has any objection to the proposed new clause, as it stands, I am perfectly willing to make it read as follows:—

If the applicant so desires, an appeal shall lie direct from the Registrar to the Court, without any appeal to the Law Officer.

Proposed new clause amended accordingly, and agreed to.

Clauses 34 and 35 agreed to.

Clause 36—

Any person may, within three months . . . lodge at the Trade Marks Office a notice of opposition . . .

Senator BEST (Victoria).—In Victoria the time allowed for lodging notice of opposition is one month, and I suggest that in this case, two months might be adopted as a compromise.

Senator MCGREGOR.—This is a Bill which embraces the whole Commonwealth; and while a period of one month might be reasonable in a single State like Victoria, it would prove totally inadequate when it was desired to give an opportunity to persons residing in Western Australia or Queensland to give notice of opposition. If Senator Best had moved that the notice be extended to six months, I should not have objected.

Clause 37 consequentially amended, and agreed to.

Clause 39—

1. Within one month after the lodging of notice of opposition, or such further time not exceeding two months, as the Registrar on application made within one month allows, the applicant may lodge at the Trade Marks Office a counter-statement, in duplicate, setting out the grounds on which he relies to support his notice.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I am told that one month is quite insufficient for the lodging of notice of opposition. I therefore suggest that the term should be made three months, and likewise that the two months for which the time may be extended should be made three months. I think that the Vice-President of the Executive Council has himself suggested the very best reasons why the time should be extended. My attention has been drawn to this matter by one or two gentlemen who have had very great experience in connexion with trade marks, and they assure me that the time allowed by the Bill is not sufficient.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I accept the amendments.

Senator BEST.—I move—

That the words "one month," line 1, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "three months"; that the word "two," line 3, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "three"; and that the words "one month," line 4, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "the first-mentioned three months."

When an application for registration has been accepted and has not been opposed, and the time for notice of opposition has expired, or has been opposed, and the opposition has been decided in favour of the applicant, the Registrar shall register the trade mark as on the date of the lodging of the application. . . .

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—I draw attention to the drafting of this clause. The words "the opposition has been decided in favour of the applicant" are curious as a form of drafting. We often hear of objections being made to an application, and the objection is heard, and the objection is decided in favour of the applicant. In clause 40 it is provided that the Registrar shall fix a day for the hearing, and shall decide—whether the application is to be refused or whether it is to be granted.

In clause 42 it is provided that the Court shall hear the applicant and the opponent and determine whether the application ought to be refused or ought to be granted.

Everywhere else, when reference is made to the hearing of an application the language used is "whether the application shall be refused or granted," and not whether the "opposition shall be decided in favour of" the applicant or opponent. I suggest that we should adhere to the language used in clause 42, and I move—

That the words "the opposition has been decided in favour of the applicant" be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "has been granted."

Clause 52—

The Registrar may, on application made by the registered proprietor of a trade mark in the prescribed manner, at any date not later than fourteen years from the date of the original registration or the last renewal of registration, as the case may be (in this division termed "the date of the last registration"), renew the registration of the trade mark for a period of fourteen years from the date of the expiry of the period of the last registration.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—This clause applies to trade marks that are registered in the Commonwealth, and it is stated that the Registrar may, on the application of the registered proprietor of a trade mark, "at any date not later than fourteen years from the date of the original registration" renew the registration. Does that mean a State registration?

Senator DAWSON.—Both State and Commonwealth registrations are included.

Senator KEATING.—What I have already said earlier to-day will go to show that there is a necessity for an amendment. If the proprietor of a trade mark is to be limited to fourteen years from the date of the original registration for a renewal of the registration, obviously there will be many people in New South Wales—and I think some in Queensland—who will be unable to re-register trade marks. It is thirty-five or forty years since many of these people obtained registration, and the rights they obtained as the registered proprietor of trade marks are not to be regarded if this clause passes as it stands. It seems to me that there should be some provision to enable the proprietor of a trade mark registered in New South Wales with a perpetual right under the State law instead of merely a right for fourteen years, to obtain re-registration as from some other date under this Bill.

Senator DAWSON.—That would come under clause 50. I think that fourteen years is a fairly long term.

Senator KEATING.—It may be, but the rights under the New South Wales law are perpetual, and they exist at the present time. There should be some modification of this clause to meet such cases. I hope that even though the clause should be passed in its present form, the Vice-President of the Executive Council will consider an amendment to meet these special cases before we finally dispose of the Bill.

Senator DAWSON.—We might give priority to an application for a renewal of registration in such cases.

Senator MCGREGOR.—If the clause agreed to now, and the Bill reported, I will see that the position in this respect, as reported to the Committee, will be laid before the officers who drafted the Bill. If they cannot give valid reasons why the clause should remain as it is, I shall have no objection to the recommittal of the Bill to enable such an amendment to be moved. Senator Keating thinks necessary.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I move—

That the following new clause be inserted:—

“ 53A. Where a trade mark has been removed from the register for non-payment of the prescribed fee, the Registrar may, within three months from such removal, if satisfied that it is just so to do, restore such trade mark to the register on payment of the prescribed additional fee for renewal.”

It will be noticed that clause 53 provides for the removal of a trade mark from the register if the fee is not paid. I desire here to incorporate a provision taken from the Victorian Act enabling the Registrar, where the default arises from some mistake, to restore the trade mark to the register on payment of a prescribed additional fee within a certain period.

Senator DAWSON.—That is really a provision for a fine for non-payment of the fee?

Senator BEST. — Yes, the applicant would, of course, be fined in such a case.

Proposed new clause agreed to.

Clauses 54 to 57 agreed to.

Clause 58—

There shall be kept at the Trade Marks Office a register of trade marks wherein shall be entered particulars of—

- (a) all registered trade marks, with the names and addresses of their proprietors;
- (b) notifications of assignments and transmissions, and disclaimers; and
- (c) any other matters relating to registered trade marks which are prescribed.

Senator DOBSON (Victoria). — Under clause 53 the Registrar is required to send notice in the prescribed manner to the registered proprietor of the date at which the existing registration will expire. That is a very important provision, and if the register is to be complete, one of the paragraphs of clause 58 should provide that the register must contain the date of registration and the date at which it expires. I therefore move—

That after the word “proprietors,” line 5, the following words be inserted, “together with the date of registration and expiry thereof.”

Senator DAWSON.—That is covered by paragraph c.

Senator DOBSON.—It is true that under paragraph c we could get in anything. But we can have no register worthy of the name unless there is an entry of the date of registration and the date of expiry thereof.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The date of expiry is shown by the Bill to be fourteen years from the date of registration.

Senator DOBSON.—It would be more complete if the register contained an entry of the date of registration, and the date of expiry thereof.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Senator Dobson's amendment will not, I think, do either good or harm. As Senator Playford has said, the Bill provides that the date of expiration shall be fourteen years after the date of registration, but if Senator Dobson believes that there ought to be an entry in some place in the register of the date of registration, and the date of the expiry thereof, there can be no objection to it.

Senator DOBSON.—In hundreds of cases the date of expiration will be at irregular intervals, because a part of the term of registration will have passed under the States laws.

Clause 68—

1. The Court may, on the application of any person aggrieved, if it is shown that there has been no bond fide user of a trade mark for a consecutive period of two years since the date of the last registration thereof, order its removal from the register, unless it was at the date of the application in bond fide use and had been so for a period of six months immediately prior to the date of the application.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—A prominent merchant of Melbourne has written to me a letter, in which he says that two years is too short a period to fix. Perhaps I had better read the letter to the Committee:—

With reference to clause 68, page 13, the opinion of mercantile houses interested in trade marks is that the consecutive period should not be less than five years, instead of two years, as proposed. Changes of fashion, the failure of markets and the inability to procure the raw materials, also the endeavour on the part of a manufacturer to supersede an article bearing a certain trade mark by another of a different brand, reserving the right to go back to the original trade mark if thought desirable, and many other arguments may be adduced in favour of a lengthened period. I have my doubts whether the clause is necessary at all, because it is hardly likely that a manufacturer of standing would care to use a trade mark which had been employed for a similar article by another firm, but it might give an opportunity to unscrupulous people to avail themselves of the established reputation of a mark in the event of a temporary cessation of its use.

In my opinion the position would be fairly met by substituting three years for two years. Therefore, I move—

That the word "two," line 4, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am quite willing that this amendment should be made, because in Australia circumstances might happen which would make it almost impossible for a man to do business with the article for which he had registered a trade mark. In South Australia, for instance, a dairy factory or company might register a trade mark in connexion with butter. If a drought were to come for two or three years, it would be impossible to produce the article, and when prosperous times did return the company might find that somebody else had registered their trade mark. I think that three years is a very fair compromise, and therefore I accept the amendment.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 69 agreed to.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I desire to introduce a new part, dealing with trades union marks, and to that end, the law officers have drafted for me a number of clauses. I move—

That the following new clause be inserted :—

PART VIA.—TRADE UNION MARKS.

69a. In this part of this Act—

"Trade union" means any trade union registered as such under the law of any State or any organization or association of workmen or employes registered under any law of the Commonwealth or of a State relating to conciliation or arbitration for the prevention or settlement of industrial disputes; and

"Trade union mark" means a distinctive mark or device adopted by a trade union for the purpose of designating the products of the labour of the members thereof.

This subject was introduced by myself on a former occasion in an attempt to alter the definition of "applicant." It was then pointed out, however, that the proposal would necessitate the alteration of a number of clauses, and that any slight difference between this particular kind of trade mark and others, might lead to some confusion. On the whole, it was thought better, if the object desired had to be attained, to propose a new part, containing the necessary clauses. The new clauses, the first of which I have moved, are intended to enable a trade union to register a label or a trade mark, to be used for the purpose of showing that goods have been produced under fair conditions. This is by no means new legislation, so far as other countries are concerned. Several of the State Parliaments in the United States have passed Acts of a similar character, though legislation of the kind is somewhat new in the British Empire. In Western Australia, however, in the case of the Bootmakers' Union, the provisions of the State Trade Mark Act were availed of to register a label which was lent out to employers who worked their factories under fair conditions, and who used it to mark their goods. It was thought by the union that they had power to prosecute any person who used the label without authority, but the matter was never tested in the Law Courts. I am told by some of the members of the Senate that if a union could register such a label under the Western Australian Act, such registration would stand the test of law. Whether that is so or not, I am not in a position to say, but, at any rate, the same object is gained in the United States under separate legislation providing for the registration of labels, brands, or marks used by labour organizations. I have here the Act passed in the 120th session of the New York Legislature in 1897, which practically carries out the intention of the clauses which I now submit to the Committee.

Senator BEST.—Are the clauses now proposed founded on the provisions of the New York Act?

Senator PEARCE.—The clauses are based on the New York legislation, though quite different wording is used; the same end is arrived at by similar machinery. There is provision for a union to register and be the proprietor of a device, mark, or label, and for a penalty for the illegal use of such label.

Senator BEST.—Under the New York law, is anybody at liberty to use the label who manufactures under trade union conditions?

Senator PEARCE.—Any manufacturer who carries on his factory under trade union or fair conditions may apply to the secretary of a union for leave to use the label.

Senator MILLEN.—Who is to be the judge of the fairness of the conditions?

Senator TRENWITH.—Senator Pearce has better simply speak of trade union conditions.

Senator PEARCE.—A trade union has o power to compel an employer to use a label; that is left as a matter of arrangement. It may be to the advantage of an employer, who works his factory under trade union conditions, to have his goods marked with the brand of the union; and he public could have no better guarantee that the goods are produced under fair conditions.

Senator BEST.—Do I understand that a non-unionist employer, although he manufactured the same goods under trade union conditions, would not be entitled to use the label?

Senator PEARCE.—If the union cared to refuse the use of the label, certainly not.

Senator BEST.—That is unionist preference all over again.

Senator PEARCE.—No, it is not. The object of the label is to give the buyer an opportunity to know that the goods which he purchases are produced under fair conditions, and the trade unionist is concerned in seeing that those conditions are observed. In Western Australia there were boot factories, which were largely non-union, but which, because they were worked under agreement drawn up between employers and employed, were allowed to use the label.

Senator BEST.—Then a trade union may do as it likes in that connexion?

Senator PEARCE.—Certainly; and in what other manner could the matter be dealt with? There must be some responsible body; and there is nothing to prevent a small body of non-unionists forming a union. But the arbiters in that case would be the great body of the public. There are no means of compelling the general public to buy these goods, and if the employer finds that the great body of the public do not like the label he will not use it. The employer depends upon the great body of the public to buy his goods.

Senator MULCAHY.—What about a State like Victoria, where the Wages Boards determine the conditions of labour?

Senator PEARCE.—They determine the wages and conditions in Melbourne, but not in the country districts. It might be an additional inducement to the general public to buy goods if they knew that they were made under fair conditions. Consequently, its use might be an advantage to the manufacturers. I admit that the great body of the public, who are the great body of the consumers, are not trade unionists. but I believe that the great body of the public are desirous to purchase goods made under fair conditions, whether trade union conditions or any other. Hence the advantage to the public of using a trade union mark. In no case in Western Australia did the trade unions ever attempt to force the mark on any employer. Usually, the employers were glad to have an opportunity to use the mark to show the public that their goods were produced under fair conditions, as against goods which were produced under unfair conditions.

Senator MULCAHY.—Not necessarily.

Senator PEARCE.—I am speaking of a case where I know that some goods were necessarily produced under unfair conditions. An amicable arrangement was made between employers and employés, and all the goods produced under those conditions could be stamped with the trade union label. Some employers, however, did not adopt those conditions, and did not have the advantage of using the label. The label was an advantage both to employers and employés as well as to the general public, who were able to say when they purchased goods —“Here is a mark which denotes that this boot was made under fair conditions.” This legislation will enable those who are the best judges to have an opportunity of registering, and becoming the proprietors of a mark.

Senator DOBSON.—I understood the honorable senator to say that the existence of Wages Boards in Victoria would obviate the necessity of having trade union labels in this State. Does not that show that this is a State, not a Commonwealth, matter?

Senator PEARCE.—While all the goods manufactured in Victoria may be made under fair conditions, there still remains the import trade. I can imagine Victorian employers saying that they would like to have the use of this mark to show the public that the goods which they placed upon the market were made under fair conditions, as compared with imported goods.

Senator BEST.—That would be very unfair.

Senator PEARCE.—It is not more unfair than to enable a man to say, by means of a mark, that certain butter is Victorian, not New Zealand butter.

Senator BEST.—It is unfair against other manufacturers.

Senator PEARCE.—Where is there any unfairness when all are equally entitled to the use of the label?

Senator BEST.—They would not all be entitled; it is for the trade unions to say who shall use the label.

Senator PEARCE.—The unions may allow the use of labels to as many employers as care to apply for them.

Senator BEST.—They may, if they like.

Senator PEARCE.—They would naturally do so. Honorable senators are looking at this matter as if the labels would be used by the trade unions in a hostile spirit. Their object in using them would be to encourage employers to produce their goods under fair conditions. To say that they would endeavour to constitute a monopoly is not reasonable. Is it not the object of trade unions to have a majority of the employers conducting their factories under fair conditions? That being so, they would naturally concede the use of a label to every manufacturer who cared to apply for it.

Senator BEST.—There may be a factory worked by non-unionists, but, under the same terms as a factory worked with union labour. The label might be refused to the non-union factory. A union might say that they would not grant its use to non-union factories.

Senator PEARCE.—I do not believe that there is a State in Australia where that would be possible. That would be the worst policy that the trade unions could adopt. Their policy would naturally be to grant the use of the label to all employers who were working their factories under fair conditions.

Senator BEST.—Would the honorable senator consent to a clause compelling the unions to do so?

Senator PEARCE.—I would not consent to compulsion with regard to unions any more than I would consent to compel any manufacturer to grant the use of his trade mark to other persons. I say that this is a proper provision. The label would be the property of the trade union that registered it, and they would have a perfect right to refuse the use of it to those who did not observe the conditions under which the use of the label was given.

Senator MILLEN.—The clauses do not say that.

Senator PEARCE.—In practice that would be the result.

Senator MILLEN.—We can look only to what the clauses provide.

Senator PEARCE.—Honorable senators seem to be under a misapprehension in thinking that a union would endeavour to make a monopoly of the use of a label. would be madness for it to do so.

Senator MILLEN.—We are entitled draw that conclusion from recent events.

Senator PEARCE.—I do not think it is to the interest of the unions to have the majority of the factories working under fair conditions, and it would be illogical and foolish for them to grant the use of labels to a minority only.

Senator MILLEN.—The clause would enable a union to force the employers adopt conditions which it dictated.

Senator PEARCE.—It would not state any conditions to the employers, I would say, "If you adopt such such conditions we are willing to let use our label as an indication to the public that you have adopted those conditions. After all that is a power which should long to any union or any employer.

The label served as an encouragement to goods, it would be an encouragement manufacturers to conduct their factories under fair conditions. If the use of label served as a discouragement to the employers would disregard it. I am aware that it may be said that I am bringing forward something which is new so as English legislation is concerned. Nevertheless, the proposal is not to be condemned simply because of its novelty.

It may be said, perhaps, by some of the honorable senators that we are stretching very wide the interpretation of a trade mark. The old idea of a trade mark has been very much attenuated by some of the decisions which I have seen in reading the literature of this subject. We find that goods which have passed through a number of hands finally branded with a trade mark by a person who had nothing to do with their origin. Here are goods in the manufactured state. The present owner of them had nothing to do with their manufacture.

Yet we find them bearing a trade mark signifying the name of a person who had nothing to do with their origin. The man who puts his trade mark upon them is little more than an agent. He has added a single penny to their value.

Has he added a single process to their manufacture. That shows that the argument that a trade mark must denote the origin of the goods has been very much attenuated by legal decisions.

Senator DRAKE.—Is not the honorable senator talking of a trade description?

Senator PEARCE.—No, I am talking of a trade mark, and I am answering arguments used against my proposal when I first submitted it. A trade mark does not necessarily denote property in goods.

Senator BEST.—It does as applied to certain goods, and it also incidentally relates to the good-will.

Senator PEARCE.—I have here Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, which gives the following definition of a trade mark:—

A trade mark is—

(a) A mark lawfully used by any person to denote any chattel to be an article or thing of the manufacture, workmanship, production, or merchandise of such person, or to be an article or thing of any peculiar or particular description made or sold by such person;

(b) Any mark or sign which, in pursuance of any statute in force for the time being relating to registered designs, is to be put or placed upon or attached to any chattel or article during the existence or continuance of any copyright or other sole right acquired under the provision of such statutes or any of them.

The Constitution gives us power to legislate in regard to trade marks, and I should think that it gives us power to step out of the groove, and does not bind us down to model our laws entirely on English or State laws. I admit that my proposal is somewhat different from the old idea of a trade mark. It is an extension of the principle. But I contend that it serves the same purpose, inasmuch as a trade union mark is a mark which indicates to the buyer of the goods something concerning their origin.

Senator CLEMONS.—What does it guarantee?

Senator PEARCE.—It guarantees that the goods were made under fair conditions.

Senator MILLEN.—Made under conditions which the men consider to be fair.

Senator PEARCE.—Made under conditions which the owner of the trade mark considers to be fair; and he has a right to say that the goods are made under fair conditions. If a union were to exercise its power in a tyrannical and suicidal manner, and made the majority of the factories hostile to it, only a minority of the goods sold would bear the union mark. That would be so much the worse for the union. Their object from a selfish point of view is not to induce the minority of the factories to use their mark, or to have a minority of the goods sold bearing that mark, but to get the majority of the employers to use it and the majority of the goods sold to bear it.

Senator CLEMONS.—In other words, to spread trade unionism.

Senator PEARCE.—Not necessarily, but the spreading of the conditions which trade unionism stands for, that is, fair conditions.

Senator BEST.—But apart from that, the honorable senator does not propose to give an opportunity to non-unionists working on the same conditions, to go to the Registrar, or anybody else, and insist upon being equally provided for.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes. Non-unionists will have an equal right to come together as a trade union, to register under the Trade Union Act, or under the Conciliation and Arbitration Act, and then avail themselves of these provisions.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why should they? What has this to do with fair wages?

Senator PEARCE.—It has everything to do with the provisions of this Bill. I have to say, in answer to the interjection made by Senator Best, that the provisions do not confer a monopoly upon any person. They will give a right to the use of a trade mark, but they will give the same right to any other body of persons in the community. If non-unionists consider themselves aggrieved by these provisions it is open to them, by adopting similar machinery, to become possessed of a trade mark, which can be attached to all goods manufactured under their conditions.

Senator CLEMONS.—Without joining a union?

Senator PEARCE.—Certainly, they would have to join a union to do this. If they object to a trade union being allowed to register a trade mark, the alternative is for them to form a union of their own.

Senator MILLEN.—They cannot do so; there can only be one union in each trade.

Senator PEARCE.—Where does the honorable and learned senator get that idea from?

Senator MILLEN.—From the practice in New South Wales.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable and learned senator is altogether wrong. Even in his own State, there is more than one union in the same trade. He must know that there are two shearers' unions in the same trade.

Senator MILLEN.—Two registered unions?

Senator PEARCE.—I am not sure that they are both registered.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator must know that only one of the shearers' unions is registered?

Senator PEARCE.—I can tell Senator Milten that while there may be only one of the unions registered, under the Conciliation and Arbitration Law, they are both registered under the Trade Union Law.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Fifty unions in the same trade may be registered under the Trade Union Act.

Senator PEARCE.—That is so; there is no limit to the number of unions in the same trade that may be registered under the Trade Union Law, which is in existence in every State of the Commonwealth. It is, therefore, idle for honorable senators to say that the men to whom they have referred would have no redress. I notice that some of my honorable friends opposite are eager to seize these provisions as a red rag; but I trust that they will not allow any prejudice which may exist in their minds, as the result of the last few years of press education on trade unionism, to influence their opinions upon this question; nor will they allow the fact that these provisions are not to be found in English law to determine their vote upon these clauses.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I hope, before I sit down, to convince even Senator Pearce, that I have no desire to approach the discussion of this new clause in that spirit of antagonism which is supposed to mark the bull at the appearance of a red rag. I desire to point out what appears to me to be an extremely serious defect in the proposal submitted to the Committee. The honorable senator has affirmed, and the clause indicates it, that the object of this proposal is to enable trade unions to register for themselves a trade mark, and, having registered it, to permit employers who employ union labour to use it. The honorable senator referred to those who employ labour under fair conditions, and I asked him, by interjection once or twice, who was to be the judge of fair conditions. His reply was that the union which was the proprietor of the trade mark would be the judge. I am not now speaking against the general principle of these clauses, but I desire to point out a possible condition of affairs which I think would constitute a very gross injustice to probably a very large number of employers. Let me submit to Senator Pearce a case in which, acting under a common rule, approved by the Arbitration Court of New South Wales, an employer was employing union labour under conditions which the Arbitration Court had said were fair. Some little dispute arises between the men and their employer, in connexion with some minor matter, outside the award of the Arbitration Court, and they take the dispute before their union. The result is that the union says to the employer, "though you are employing union labour, shall not allow you to use our trade mark."

Senator DAWSON.—If the mark is registered, how can the union do that?

Senator MILLEN.—Because the union that registers the trade mark becomes proprietor of it, and will be able to refuse to allow a particular employer to use it, though he may be employing only union labour.

Senator PEARCE.—What inducement would the union have to do so foolish thing as that?

Senator MILLEN.—The inducement might be to force an employer to make some concession other than that required by the Arbitration Court. The honorable senator has frequently referred to the fact that it might be an advantage to an employer to be able to satisfy the purchaser of his goods that they were made by union labour. I admit that there is a great deal in that contention, but it is just because of that advantage that the trade union proprietor of the trade mark would be able to exercise a process of leverage on the employer. If the honorable senator would provide that any employer or manufacturer who employs union labour should be entitled to use the trade union trade mark, my objection to the clauses would be very largely minimized. If his sole object is to have goods manufactured by union labour so branded, I am unable to see how the honorable senator can object to the suggestion I now make, that all employers of manufacturing goods by union labour should be entitled to use the trade union mark.

Senator PEARCE.—I could not conceive of a union refusing so reasonable a request.

Senator MILLEN.—Then the honorable senator has no objection to what I suggest.

Senator PEARCE.—There must be a property in the trade mark.

Senator MILLEN.—I remind honorable senators that what we are dealing with is not the practice which may spring up under the law, but the shaping of the law itself, and the practice to be developed will be in accordance with the way in which we shape the law. Senator Pearce says that he cannot conceive of a trade union refusing to any one employing trade union labour the right to use the union trade mark; but I still submit that a case may arise in which an employer, employing only union labour, might be refused the use of the union trade mark, because of some conflict on minor matters between himself and the unionists in his employ. Senator PEARCE, when asked who is to judge whether the conditions of labour are fair, in order that a trade union may decide whether the use of its trade mark is to be permitted to a certain employer, tells us that it is the very men who are concerned who must be the judges in their own case. If the honorable senator would agree that any employer working in the Commonwealth with union labour, should have the right to the union trade mark, my objection to his proposal would largely disappear. But I cannot give a vote in support of a proposal which appears to me to place in the hands of a trade union a power beyond anything ever attempted by any Arbitration Court, or any arbitration law, of which we have had any knowledge yet. I put it to the honorable senator to say whether the object he has in view would not be met by what I have suggested?

Senator PEARCE.—I have said that I can conceive of no case such as that referred to by the honorable senator, where a trade union would refuse the use of the union trade mark.

Senator MILLEN.—I can. The honorable senator need only look down the list of cases awaiting adjudication by the Arbitration Court of New South Wales, and he will find that two or three score of employers, who are carrying out the decisions of the Court, and employing union labour, are cited before the Court because of minor grievances with their employes.

Senator PEARCE.—Because they have infringed the awards of the Court.

Senator MILLEN.—No, because of minor differences with employes. The honorable senator has, however, given me my answer when he says that the trade union concerned is to be the judge in this matter, and not the Arbitration Court.

Senator PEARCE.—How would the honorable senator make the Arbitration Court a judge of trade union labour? The honorable senator is aware, also, that, so far, there is not an Arbitration Court established for the Commonwealth, and that there are no factory laws or Wages Boards in operation in Tasmania.

Senator MILLEN.—I take the cases with which I am dealing under the Arbitration law in New South Wales, and I say that I can mention many instances where men are employing trade unionists, and in all fairness they should be entitled to the use of the union trade mark. Does the honorable senator propose to take from those employers of trades unionists the right to stamp on their goods the fact that they were made by trade unionists? If his object is merely to provide that goods made by trade unionists shall be so marked, there can be little objection to the proposal. But if he intends to leave it to certain people to say that certain goods made by trade unionists may be stamped with the union trade mark, whilst other goods also made by trade unionists shall not be so marked, I must say that I am entirely opposed to his proposal.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—Senator Pearce will remember that when I first heard of these amendments I expressed my doubts as to whether they were constitutional. I regret to say that my doubts on the subject have not yet been removed, and the honorable senator has himself rather shirked the point. He has said that the existence of Wages Boards in Victoria renders it unnecessary for trade unions in this State to apply for a union trade mark.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator did not say anything of the kind.

Senator DOBSON.—But he got out of the difficulty by saying that there was an import trade. We have nothing to do in this Bill with the putting of labels on imports.

Senator PEARCE.—Imports would not be eligible, so I could never have said anything of the sort.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator has admitted that, because there are Factories Acts and Wages Boards in Victoria, these provisions would not be wanted in that State.

Senator PEARCE.—I never admitted anything of the sort.

Senator DOBSON.—I understood the honorable senator to admit that; if he did not, I withdraw what I have said; but I am under the impression that his admission went nearly to that extent. I think that the honorable senator has himself shown that this is a State matter, and not a Commonwealth matter. We know there have been motions submitted in another place, by which it has been sought to have the industrial life of Australia brought under Commonwealth law, instead of the workmen of each State being subject to their own local laws. That has not yet been accomplished. This is, to my mind, a purely trade union and industrial matter, and has no connexion whatever with the question of trade marks. If the honorable senator will look at the last two lines of the last new clause he proposes, he will find that he absolutely prevents these trade union marks from being trade marks at all. One of the essential qualifications of a trade mark is that it is property which can be assigned and dealt with, and which passes with the good-will. In the last new clause which Senator Pearce proposes, he provides that—

A trade union mark shall not be assigned so long as its registration continues. The very wording of the clauses before us cuts the ground from under the honorable senator's feet.

Senator PEARCE.—Would it not be possible for us to make that provision with respect to an ordinary trade mark?

Senator DOBSON.—Certainly not. An ordinary trade mark has a common law meaning and common law rights attached to it, and rights in every State of the Commonwealth. It has a distinctive meaning. Senator Pearce has said that what he wants is a trade union label to be attached to goods made under what he considers to be fair conditions, but we could not call a label of that sort a trade union trade mark. Supposing that one bootmaker had his window filled with boots bearing the label, "These goods are made under fair conditions," and that the bootmaker in the next shop had his window filled with boots bearing no label, and supposing that the boots in each shop were offered at exactly the same price. On Saturday night the wives of working men would naturally go to the shop in which the boots were labelled as I have described. I think it would be grossly unfair to give these labels a kind of legal sanction, and to imagine that other unions who made similar goods under fair conditions had not a right to label them with those words. I cannot vote for these clauses, and the clause before the Committee will not become law with my consent. Let the wording of these labels be confined to the fact that the goods were made under trade union conditions, or under arbitration conditions, or under the award of an Arbitration Court. But it is not proper to give to any section an exclusive right to the use of the expression "fair conditions."

Let the labels state the conditions under which the goods were made, and leave it to requiring persons to see the award of the Arbitration Court or the trade union rule. We ought not to give to any set of men the right to use the words "fair conditions" when other men who are equally entitled to use those words do not get the privilege because they do not come forward and employ an agent to register their trade union mark. The fact that several efforts have been made to vest this Parliament with the right to pass industrial legislation ought to show Senator Pearce that his clauses are ultra vires. It cannot be contended for a moment that they deal with the subject of trade marks on which the Constitution empowers us to legislate. On the contrary, they simply deal with trade union labels, which ought to be dealt with by the States in Factor Acts.

Senator TRENWITH (Victoria).—I think that the objections to the proposal of Senator Pearce have no foundation in fact. Senator Dobson sees the danger of persons being clothed by this provision. He has passed, with the authority to use the words "These goods are made under fair conditions." I do not see any provision in the new clause which would grant that power. Apparently, what is sought is that trade unions, which are held by many persons to be institutions of very great advantage to the public weal, should have the power to indicate, and give the right to traders to indicate, that certain goods were made under the conditions they prescribed.

Senator MILLEN.—It is limited under the new clause to trade unions.

Senator TRENWITH.—That is different from the point which was raised by Senator Dobson, and which I am dealing with. I take it that if the case assumed by Senator MilLEN could arise no injustice would be done, because the device could only have a moral value. It could have no positive value unless what was behind it impressed itself on the minds of intending purchasers. That is the great point to be considered. If we assume, for argument's sake, that trade union would damage the value of a trade mark by doing the extremely illogical thing which the honorable senator indicates possible—

Senator MILLEN.—Will the honorable senator admit that it is possible under the new clause?

Senator TRENWITH.—I should say that it would be possible for a trade union to decide to sell the use of its registered mark to a single individual, but that is so improbable as to be practically impossible, for the reason that directly it so acted, that fact would be advertised, and the mark instead of being an advantage in the eye of the intending purchaser would be a disadvantage. Therefore, no injury would be done in that case, except to the unfortunate person who had bought the right to use the mark.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator is going to an extreme that I never suggested.

Senator TRENWITH.—I admit, that very often it is only by taking an extreme case that one can show the rectitude of one's argument. But if a trade union were to do the lesser thing, which the honorable senator indicated, that is to refuse the use of the mark to an employer who was complying with all the conditions prescribed by the trade union—

Senator MILLEN.—No, by the Arbitration Court.

Senator TRENWITH.—I confess, at once, that the awards of Arbitration Courts are not covered by the provision, and I do not agree with Senator Pearce when he says that trade unions in this State would think the registration of a mark unnecessary. I think it is quite likely that they would. There might be in connexion with trade unions some conditions which the public would approve, but which had not yet received the sanction of the Legislature, and therefore a trade union mark might be of great advantage to a trade union, and to those who desired to purchase the products of trade unionists. I prefer to keep out of the discussion of the question of fair or unfair conditions. Of course, we started properly with the assumption that trade unions are organized for the purpose of obtaining fair conditions for their members. And it is a reasonable assumption that goods which are made under the rules prescribed by trade unions are more likely to be made under fair conditions than goods not so made—at any rate, fair to the trade unions. Of course, I know it is arguable that trade unions may prescribe conditions that are unfavorable to the employer. But that is a question in connexion with the trade mark which rests entirely with the public. For the purpose of securing custom, trade marks are affixed to goods having specific qualities preferred by the public. I think that a very large majority of the people in the Commonwealth prefer trade union conditions, and would like to see them generally observed. There are many reasons why persons who approve most heartily of trade unions are not trade unionists. There are many avocations in which the difficulties of organizing are so great that persons who approve of trade unions, and would, if they could, be members of trade unions, find that they cannot be trade unionists, but would be very glad to know how they could purchase goods which were marked as having been made by trade unionists, and thereby be assured that, in connexion with their production, conditions were observed of which they approved. I cannot see how any injury could be done to any person by allowing A, B, or C, to register a device, and say, "These are the goods that we make." I can see at once an objection to allowing them to say, "These goods are made under fair conditions," and so deprive others of the right to publish that statement. That I admit at once might be a very serious injustice, but it could be no injustice to any one to allow A, B, or C to say, "These are the goods which we make."

Senator MILLEN.—A, B, or C might be making the goods, and might still be refused the right to use this mark.

Senator TRENWITH.—That, while possible, is so improbable as to be practically impossible; and, while possible, if done, would frustrate the end that the person had in view in doing it, and, therefore, it would work its own cure.

Senator MILLEN.—It is not done, perhaps, in one case out of fifty.

Senator TRENWITH.—That is a bare possibility, and I do not like to strain an argument. It is highly improbable that a trade union would so act—to me so improbable as to be impossible; but if it did so act, the person injured thereby would at once take the opportunity of advertising the fact in such a way as to turn it to his account. It would be so suicidal an act on the part of the trade union that I, with Senator Pearce, cannot conceive that it would be done. I see a difficulty in compelling a trade union to grant the right to employers employing union men. I see the possibility of a man employing ten union men and ten non-union men. In that case the employer could conscientiously say that he employed union men. But what this mark is intended to indicate is that the goods are made entirely under trade union conditions, and, therefore, a man who employed union men to half the extent of his establishment—

Senator WALKER.—And who paid non-union men the same wages.

Senator TRENWITH.—That is unimportant for the present. Supposing, for argument sake, that there was a very strong desire in the public mind for the goods which were produced by red-haired men, and that the latter desired to register a trade mark. There might be black-haired men who were producing a splendid article and paying the same rate of wages. It seems to me that there would be no injustice done to anybody by providing the means by which the public could be assured of the fulfilment of that desire. Therefore, I shall support the amendment of Senator Pearce. I should be glad, of course, if any practical guarantee against even the shadow of injustice could be afforded; at any rate, I feel quite sure that Senator Pearce does not desire to do any injustice. It is generally known that this legislation does not prevail in other parts of the world to any great extent, for the reason that trade unionists in the past have had very little voice in the making of the laws. Class legislation, which is now complained of, but does not exist, did exist in the past to a great extent. The term "governing class" had a distinct meaning; and in many parts of the world, it has a distinct meaning still, namely, that the government is exercised by a very small minority, who control the whole of the people.

Senator CLEMONS.—Is the honorable senator referring to present circumstances in the Commonwealth?

Senator TRENWITH.—If the honorable and learned senator desires, I shall refer to present circumstances. What I say is that in the past the term "governing class" had a distinct meaning in the mother country, but as the governing class became extended, legislation was controlled by larger numbers of people, until, as in Australia, the whole people came to govern, greater security was afforded. In countries where such legislation does prevail, the franchise is extremely broad, and, as in Australia, the whole people govern instead of the few. I feel that no injustice is likely to rise out of these clauses. In view of legislation we have already achieved, to a considerable extent, and which we are achieving from day to day, I question whether the same necessity exists for such provisions as has existed in the past. They can, however, do no harm, and in many instances will be good. At any rate, people will be afforded the opportunity to give expression to their views on this question in the course of their daily trade. We may adopt Senator Pearce's proposals, feeling sure that wherever a union is so unwise as to adopt the course suggested by Senator Mill the injury, instead of happening to an individual, will happen to the organization, probably with advantage to the individual.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not think there is any possibility of our finishing this discussion to-night, and I suggest that progress be reported.

Progress reported.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT BILL

Bill returned from the House of Representatives, with amendments.

In Committee:

Clause 2 (Determination of Seat of Government)—

House of Representatives' Amendment.—"That portion of New South Wales bounded to the north by a direct line running from the town of Pambula to the town of Cooma, thence west to the border of the State of Victoria, within fifty miles of Bombala" and in "seventeen miles of Dalgety."

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia—Vice-President of the Executive Council).—Considerable time was occupied on a previous occasion in discussing the merits and demerits of the various proposed sites. The Bill has since been considered, and at considerable length, by the House of Representatives; and yet the amendments made by that Chamber are so much in conformity with what was decided in the Senate, that I do not think we ought to have much difficulty in coming to an agreement. I move—

That the amendment be agreed to.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I am sorry I cannot compliment the Government on its conduct of business either in Committee or in the House. Progress was reported on the Trade Marks Bill, on the plea that we could not conclude its consideration to-night; and at a moment's notice, we find ourselves in Committee on another measure. Such a course cannot, I think, inspire much confidence in the conduct of the business by Government.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I thought that the honorable senator was in a hurry to fix the Capital site.

Senator MILLEN.—Senator McGregor always appears to find us in a hurry when he desires us to fall in with his wishes. There is a fair and reasonable way of doing business which is generally followed by Governments. To pass from one Committee to another when there is no urgency, but with a possible object in view, is not a proceeding which commends itself to me. So far as the amendment is concerned, I want to very briefly state my position. I quite recognise that, in my opinions on this question, I am in a hopeless minority in the Senate; and that being so. I have no intention of wearying honorable senators by reiterating the objections which I feel to locating the Capital in the Monaro district. At the same time, I wish once more to place on record my opinion—of course I am in a minority, and must bow to the majority—that a serious mistake is being made—serious, not only as regards the interests of my own State, but also as regards the interests of the Commonwealth. A large portion of the session of the Federal Parliament must be during the winter months, owing to the date on which the Senatorial elections take place, and for that reason I think we are making a serious mistake when we place the Federal Capital at an elevation of 2,500 feet in one of the coldest districts of New South Wales.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Do not discuss the merits of the sites.

Senator MILLEN.—I do not propose to do so. The majority of members in another place hold a different opinion, and I believe that I am correct in assuming that the majority of honorable senators will agree with the decision arrived at elsewhere. It only remains for me, as a representative of New South Wales—to which State the Dalgety site is distinctly distasteful—speaking from my knowledge of the district, to once more express the opinion that a serious mistake is being made in regard to the interests of Parliament itself.

Senator PEARCE.—Is the Dalgety site distasteful to New South Wales, or distasteful to Sydney?

Senator MILLEN.—I am more intimately connected with the country districts than with the metropolis, and I think I may fairly claim to speak for New South Wales. I merely refer to that, however, as a second count. I believe that in the interests of Parliament itself, and of the members of the Parliament—in the interests of the satisfactory conduct of business—we are making a great mistake.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I, like Senator Millen, bow to the wisdom of the majority.

Senator MILLEN.—Not to the wisdom, but to the numbers.

Senator WALKER.—I desire to place once more on record my opinion that the best proposed site was Tumut. That site is approached by railway communication, and is half-way between Melbourne and Sydney, while it possesses a climate which would, at all events, suit our friends from north of the tropic of Capricorn. Dalgety will be very cold in winter, and I find Melbourne quite cold enough for me. It is enough to freeze one's blood to think of spending the winter months in a place swept by cold westerly winds from the snow-capped mountains. Although I lived in Scotland in my youth, I spent twenty-five years in Queensland, so that I can well appreciate the difference between the climate of one site and another. However that may be, this Government will, I think, have the honour of settling this question, provided they are reasonable, and do not ask New South Wales for an area of anything like 900 square miles. Dalgety is admitted to have the best water supply amongst the sites proposed, and that is a great advantage. But, unfortunately, judging by the appearance of the country, it will be a long time before there are any decent-sized trees there. There are certainly some magnificent granite boulders, but, I fear, rather poor soil. I hope that we shall not ultimately regret the selection we may make. I give my adherence to Dalgety as probably the second best site, but I do not depart from my preference for Tumut.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I agree with Senator Millen that this is scarcely a seemly way of treating an important measure. I say that, because it is an extraordinary state of things that we should rush out of Committee upon another Bill, in the belief that the subject under consideration cannot be exhausted this evening, and then rush into Committee to discuss the Seat of Government Bill.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The circumstances are different; this Bill has been before the Senate previously.

Senator CLEMONS.—And it comes back, with a message, asking us to reverse our previous decision.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—No.

Senator CLEMONS.—In my opinion, it does to a considerable extent. The Senate, as we all know, decided upon the site of Bombala.

Senator MULCAHY.—No.

Senator CLEMONS.—I was present, and know what we decided. I will put it in another way. I am aware that certain honorable senators think that the Capital site should have access to the sea. I suppose that Senator Mulcahy agrees with me with regard to that. I am also aware that certain honorable senators voted in favour of a site in the Monaro district, because they considered that it gave us access to the sea. The selection originally made by the Senate has been considerably changed; and while the Vice-President of the Executive Council is apparently inducing honorable senators to believe that the site selected will have access to a port, and that the decision of the Senate in that respect is not in any way interfered with by the amendments which have been sent up from the other House, I say that the position is considerably changed. I shall probably be told to look at clause 3, and that I shall find it stated there that the territory to be granted should contain not less than 900 square miles, and have access to the sea. I believe that some honorable senators are sufficiently gullible to imagine that the Bill, as it stands, gives us that right. But I say without the slightest hesitation that it does not. If we have a sufficiently large area to include Eden, of course, we have the same access to the sea that we originally desired. But the words which have been inserted in clause 3 do not give us what we desire.

Senator DAWSON.—Suppose we had an area large enough to give us access to a navigable river. Should we not then have access to the sea?

Senator CLEMONS.—If we have a sufficiently large area to carry the Federal territory down to Twofold Bay, we shall have access to the sea. But the clause, as it stands, does not give us that access. Personally, I am not very much concerned with that aspect of the question, and am not going to quarrel with the House of Representatives. But I think it is a perfectly fair thing to point out what the meaning of the Bill is. The words which have been added to clause 3 are not worth anything at all, and if any honorable senators desire to insist upon the point of accessibility to the sea, they should not accept the amendment.

Senator DOBSON.—The words added to clause 3 must have some meaning.

Senator CLEMONS.—Any one may have access to the sea, no matter where he is. But the words which have been added mean nothing whatever. They are worth nothing.

Senator MULCAHY.—The words are only an affirmation.

Senator CLEMONS.—The matter is in this form, because the Federal Government have no absolute power to concede any territory to New South Wales to concede any territory. It is only an expression of opinion, and such it is an extraordinary thing to appear in an Act of Parliament. But the circumstances are unprecedented. The justification I can find for it is that the Bill itself is absolutely unprecedented. We have no possible parallel to it in the whole history of legislation. We are practically creating a new precedent, and I suppose that is a justification for the insertion of words which do not ordinarily appear in an Act of Parliament. I do not wish to deal with the question at any great length, but if I have created any doubt in the minds of honorable senators, I only say that while I am prepared to support the Bill, and while I am glad to see that the whole question is now practically settled, at the same time I think it is somewhat unfair to some honorable senators who are not present, and who have had no opportunity of knowing that a final decision upon the question is to be arrived at in the Senate to-night, that the Bill should be taken at this hour. I think it is a mistake, under these circumstances, that the Vice-President of the Executive Council should have projected this measure in the Senate at this time. So far as I am personally concerned, however, I have no objection to what is being done.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—There seems to be some misunderstanding concerning the amendment which another place has inserted in the Bill. I do not know whether there are two or more Dalgetys within the Commonwealth, or whether there is only one place of that name. I know that there are several places in Australia the names of which are duplicated.

The Bill, as amended, as I understand, provides that the Capital site shall be at Dalgety.

Senator KEATING.—It must be in the State of New South Wales.

Senator GIVENS.—If that point is clear, I have no objection to make. I trust that the Committee will unanimously agree to the amendments which have been made by another place, because, as has been pointed out, the territory which has been chosen by the House of Representatives includes the territory which the Senate favoured. As the House of Representatives are practically agreeing with us, and have simply fixed the site more definitely, there is no reason why we should not agree with them. We have been told by Senator Walker and Senator Millen that the choice is a very unwise one. Considering that we have been dealing with the matter for nearly four years, and have had an enormous amount of information concerning the different sites, I do not see how we could arrive at any wiser decision if the selection were delayed. I place no reliance upon the evidence of interested people. I place little reliance upon the objections of Senator Walker. In some cases, in order to defeat legislation to which he is opposed, he points out that one-half of the Commonwealth is unfit for habitation by white people, owing to the climate being too hot. On this occasion, with the object of defeating another provision to which he is opposed, he tells us that the place which has been selected is too cold for white people. But the race from which we have sprung is not a tropical race by any means. There are several honorable senators who come from the northern portion of the British Empire—from the mountainous districts of Scotland. Those who come from the colder regions are amongst the healthiest and most vigorous people we have amongst us. It may be that it will prove to be an advantage to the Commonwealth to fix the Capital site in a part of Australia where we shall be able to rear a hardy and vigorous race.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Where we shall have a race of Highlanders.

Senator GIVENS.—Probably we shall be able to rear a race of people who will go about with bare knees, looking exceedingly picturesque. I think that Dalgety is about as good a place as could have been chosen. I have seen all the sites which are favoured by considerable numbers of honorable senators, with the exception of Tooma. Bombala has some advantages over Dalgety, but at the same time Dalgety has very considerable advantages which Bombala does not possess, notably, in respect of the magnificent water supply, which is sufficient for a very large population, and at the same time gives us an opportunity of generating almost unlimited electric power of the very cheapest kind, by the utilization of the powerful streams of water which flow in the vicinity. Therefore, I shall vote with the very greatest pleasure for the final selection of Dalgety, as the site for the Federal Capital, and I hope that the time is not far distant when the Senate will be sitting there and enjoying the benefits which will accrue to us from the magnificent climate of that district.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I must extend my sympathy to my New South Wales friends in their sorrow at seeing this measure rushed through in the manner now proposed. After the many protests which the New South Wales senators have entered against the slow manner in which the Government have dealt with the selection of the Capital site, they must have undergone a considerable transformation, since to-day we find them joining Senator Dobson in protesting against undue haste. Considering that they have never been pleased at the speed which has hitherto been manifested in dealing with this question, and that they are now protesting against haste, we must arrive at the conclusion that this Bill has been responsible for a most remarkable change in their minds. With regard to Senator Clemons' protest against the adoption of the amendments of the House of Representatives, I would point out to him that practically what has happened is that the other House has come into line with the Senate. We have always been in favour of the selection of a site in the Monaro district, with a port. In the last Parliament the Senate declared itself almost unanimously in favour of the Monaro district. At the elections a large majority of honorable senators who favoured that district were returned, proving conclusively that the people of Australia are in favour of fixing the site there. It is also a fact that the majority of the Senate was of opinion that Dalgety was the best site in the Monaro locality. Therefore, the House of Representatives has practically come round to our view. I claim this Bill as the product of the Senate.

Senator CLEMONS.—Does the honorable senator consider that accessibility to a port is an essential?

Senator PEARCE.—We consider that this Bill secures that advantage.

Senator MILLEN.—Was not that the reason why Bombala was first inserted?

Senator PEARCE.—No; because Senator Smith pointed out that a radius of fifty miles would include Dalgety.

Senator CLEMONS.—Did not the question of acquiring the port of Eden weigh in the selection?

Senator PEARCE.—Certainly; but that was only one of the many advantages which we believed that the Southern Monaro sites possessed. I consider that New South Wales has much to thank the present Government for. They have grappled with the question from the outset, and have lost no opportunity of pushing it forward; and they have to-night given the Senate an early opportunity of putting its final imprimatur upon the Bill. I shall cause no further delay, than to say that the choice made by the House of Representatives meets with my full approval.

Senator TRENWITH (Victoria).—There is just one matter to which I think reference ought to be made. Senator Clemons has said that the expression in clause 3, "and have access to the sea," means nothing. Perhaps if we were dealing with an Act of Parliament, which should be interpreted entirely upon its verbiage, the honorable and learned senator would be right. But it happens that we are dealing with a measure which is properly an expression of opinion in connexion with the matters with which it is concerned. The only affirmation in it that is positive is, that the Federal Capital site must be within a certain area. The amount of land that is to be acquired is a matter for negotiation.

Senator CLEMONS.—Is it? There is a limit even to that.

Senator TRENWITH.—It is true: that the Federal Parliament proposes to say that the area should not be less, but it has not said that it shall be more than 900 square miles.

Senator CLEMONS.—But it may be 9,000 square miles. Does the honorable senator contend that?

Senator TRENWITH.—Speaking for myself, I should be delighted if it were, but I do not contend that. I contend that the two Houses of the Federal Parliament are united in declaring that the Federal territory should comprise an area of 900 square miles.

Senator CLEMONS.—And by that the honorable senator means 900 square miles or thereabouts; a little more or less.

Senator TRENWITH.—I should say that if it happened that we could not get 900 square miles exactly—say, within a couple of inches, we should not quarrel about the couple of inches.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable senator means up to 905 square miles, about Senator TRENWITH.—I mean what I am saying, that the Federal Parliament thinks that the area should be 900 square miles.

Senator CLEMONS.—Would that take from Dalgety to Twofold Bay?

Senator TRENWITH.—If it were narrow enough it would take us there and bring us back again. The honorable and learned senator has said that the expression "and have access to the sea" means nothing, but I say that, in view of the fact that this Bill will be considered, together with the discussion that took place in passing it, it is largely an expression of opinion for the purpose of future negotiations between two independent Parliaments. There is not the slightest doubt that these words "access to the sea," will be interpreted as Senator Clemons has suggested, to mean that we should have access to the sea of some one else's territory, but that we should have access to the sea through Federal territory. Therefore, for all practical purposes, that clause is as definite as it need be. It is as definite as it could be made for practical purposes. Clearly, the object of Parliament in saying that we should have access to the sea is, that we shall have that access through Federal territory the whole way.

Senator BEST.—It is an instruction to the Government.

Senator TRENWITH.—Certainly; and for that purpose it is sufficiently definite. But I do not desire that it should go forth that it was not clearly indicated that the access to the sea should be all the way through Federal territory. If that impression were to go forth it might then be argued in the negotiations that the Federal Parliament recognised that the expression did not mean anything more than that there should be some route by which we could get to the sea, and not necessarily through Federal territory.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable senator has strengthened my argument in the same direction, and has completely created a great impression.

Senator TRENWITH.—Great minds often run together. I regret the amendment which practically shuts out Bombala, because I think it would have been better to have retained the widest possible range of choice within the area we had described. My own view is that Dalgety is the better site, but I am still sorry that the amendment to which I refer has been made. However, I do not think it of vital importance, or that we should lose the Bill because of it. It is, however, of very great importance that we should settle this question, and that a perplexing, vexing, and disuniting bone of contention should be removed. I feel now that there will be a more rapid approach to the proper Federal spirit that should exist, and does very largely exist, and which I believe will in the near future be complete and entire. In my opinion, this question while hung up had more influence than any other I can think of in keeping apart in sentiment and mind at least two, and possibly more, of the States of Australia. When this Bill is passed we shall not necessarily proceed immediately to this place, which Senator Walker has said is too cold for white men, but a cause of dissension will have been removed, and we shall be able to settle down to the consideration of the next question which presents itself to us—the question of ways and means. We cannot erect the Federal Capital without funds.

Senator FRASER.—We are not likely to get there in a hurry.

Senator TRENWITH.—That is quite likely; but a year or two, or three or four years, are nothing in the life and history of a Commonwealth such as ours. I think, however, that it is of importance that the question of the location of the Capital should be settled, in view of the fact that such a strong feeling has existed in the minds of many persons on the question. Though we are in splendid temper this evening, I could not but deprecate the slightly sneering, or perhaps I should say the bantering tone of Senator Pearce when he got up to congratulate the representatives of New South Wales. I think that we should, so far as possible, forget that we represent New South Wales, Victoria, or any other State, and should always feel that we represent Australia. The removal of this question will probably do more than anything else to bring about that very desirable feeling amongst honorable senators.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—It appears to me that throughout our discussions there is too much feeling shown and too little business done; too much prejudice in the assertion of rights, and too little statesmanship. Senator Millen has said that in the expression of his views he feels that he is in a hopeless minority, and I am greatly in sympathy with the honorable senator. I have much the same feeling with regard to my views when inside this chamber, but I have the satisfaction of knowing that a very large majority of the people outside agree with me in believing that we are considering this matter about a generation before its time.

Senator TRENWITH.—That is a consolation which the representatives of minorities always have.

Senator DOBSON.—Although Senator Trenwith has put his point nicely and clearly about the passage of this Bill doing away with feelings of hostility, I do not quite agree with the honorable senator. I should like to remind him that we may give way a little too much to these feelings. If we are going to treat the transcontinental railway in the way in which we have treated this question, honorable senators from Western Australia will only have to sing loud enough to secure the construction of that line. They will tell us it is necessary in order to maintain the Federal and national feeling which should follow the adoption of the Constitution.

Senator MATHESON.—Hear, hear.

Senator DOBSON.—I hope that Senator Matheson does not think that I believe in any such nonsense as that?

Senator MATHESON.—I know that the honorable and learned senator believes in the Federal feeling.

Senator DOBSON.—I do, but it is not going to be brought about by honorable senators on one side clamouring for something as if they ought to get it at once, and the rest of us, like a parcel of children, giving in to the clamour. I do not propose to decide any question in such a way. I have yet to be shown that the choice of a Capital site, at which half the members of the Committee are sneering, will allay the feeling which is said to exist in New South Wales. I have yet to see whether the pledge, if it was a pledge, made by the Prime Minister is to be carried out. That honorable gentleman said that any one who would advocate the building of the Federal Capital at an early date would be guilty of the grossest extravagance. I remind honorable senators that in the opinion of the Prime Minister the Federal Capital will not be built for twenty years to come.

Senator MILLEN.—Has the Prime Minister said that?

Senator DOBSON.—I have yet to learn that the indecent haste with which we are now proceeding with this matter will allay any feeling whatever, or bring about any broader or more Federal spirit. I do not agree that Ministers are to be congratulated upon the undue haste with which they have asked us to deal with this matter. We have on three occasions busied ourselves with the Trade Marks Bill, and have three times considered the clauses submitted by Senator Pearce, and now when we have got them well into our heads the debate upon them has been adjourned, and we have been asked to consider the question of the Capital site. Many honorable senators who have taken a great interest in the settlement of this question are not present, and there is not one absent who could have had the slightest idea that this matter would come on for discussion this evening. Ministers have no right to ask us to enter upon the consideration of this question at this time of the night. I have an amendment to propose, but before I move it I should like to say that I recognise that a large majority of honorable senators will probably be against me. Personally, I should be glad if the Committee did not consent to the amendments made in the Bill in another place. Honorable members in another place have restricted our choice to a site within seventeen miles of Dalgety. It is possible that Dalgety is preferable to Bombala, but by adopting the amendment of another place we shall be restricting our choice and restricting the choice of the experts who, with their instruments and levels, will have to decide on the best place for the Capital. If the words of the clause as passed by the Senate, "within fifty miles of Bombala," take in Dalgety, and the port of Eden, I should prefer that those words should be retained. I can see no reason why we should be asked to accept the amendment, except that it is thought we should deal with this matter with undue haste, or that possibly Ministers are expecting an early political death, and they desire to have the credit of passing this Bill.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable learned senator might give us a chance to make our will.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not begrudge Ministers any credit to which they are entitled. They are entitled to much credit on many points, but they are not entitled credit for postponing the consideration of the Trade Marks Bill in order that it might proceed to consider this Bill. The point referred to by Senator Clemons, not been quite disposed of by Senator Trenwith. I am inclined to believe that if the High Court had to construe the words referred to, it would possibly give them an interpretation which Senator Trenwith indicated. But why should there be doubt on the subject? It is a matter of very great importance, because I do hesitate to say that Southern Monaro Dalgety was chosen by the Senate and the House of Representatives simply because it was felt that a selection in that district would give us access to a port. Surely it is a right thing for us to see that we get that access. But I am not quite certain that we shall get it. The words used are—

Not less than 900 square miles, and have access to the sea.

That may mean by a strip of land one chain or twenty chains wide—one mile or five miles wide.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable and learned senator mean an increase of area in order to get a port?

Senator DOBSON.—There might not be territory sufficient to take us to the port, except by a very narrow strip indeed. I should like my honorable friends to consider whether it is wise to limit the choice of a site in the territory by the experts. I believe that a majority of the Senate favour Dalgety now more than Bombala. But why should we not have a radius of fifty miles in which to choose the site for a Capital instead of a smaller area?

Senator BEST.—What is the suggestion of the honorable and learned senator?

Senator DOBSON.—My suggestion is that we should disagree with the amendment of the other House, because the clause, as it left the Senate, would give a wider choice to the experts. I would ask honorable senators to consider how we have wobbled about in this matter, how on every occasion we have started before we were ready, and how at the last moment a site has come to the front which many of us have never and none of us had heard of until the last few weeks. Tooma secured almost as many votes as Lyndhurst. Let it be borne in mind that when a number of us travelled by coach and visited Dalgety not one of us saw with the skilled eye of Sir John Forrest that it was a good site, or dreamed a few months ago that it was preferable to Bombala. We did not take sufficiently into account the question of water supply—the potentialities of the Snowy River which runs through the territory. We did not attach sufficient importance to the enormous electric power which could be generated by means of that water. We have made all these mistakes by proceeding with undue haste, and without that expert evidence which is necessary. We have now chosen the site, although one expert, who was expressly sent to make an official report, told us that we ought not to choose Southern Monaro without making a more thorough and exhaustive inquiry into the climate. At Bombala I was told by at least a dozen persons that in a severe winter the snow lies on the ground for three or four days together, and that when the winter is not severe it lies on the ground for about six hours. But I was pleased with Southern Monaro. At the same time, our experts tell us that we ought not to make a choice until we have made further inquiries.

Senator TRENWITH.—London is a pretty fair sized town, with something like the same snow conditions.

Senator DOBSON.—I am quite aware of that fact; but my honorable friend knows that most persons who can get out of London in the winter time go.

Senator TRENWITH.—Generally about 5,000,000 stay.

Senator DOBSON.—I have heard from a relative that a great many persons can stand two winters, but not a third winter.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable and learned senator wishes to put the Bill on the shelf for a while.

Senator DOBSON.—I desire the Bill to be considered in a statesmanlike and exhaustive manner. I do not desire, like my honorable friend, to pass the amendments of another place without consideration, and then go into Committee on another Bill.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable and learned senator has had four years in which to consider this Bill.

Senator DOBSON.—Every time we have been asked to consider this question we have not been furnished with the necessary information. My honorable friends may think that they are doing the right thing tonight. They may pride themselves on the fact that they are in a majority here, but I believe they are in a hopeless minority outside.

Senator MULCAHY (Tasmania).—I do not agree with the sentiments which have fallen from my honorable and learned colleague. I hope that we shall not make any alteration in the Bill, though I should like to see clause 3 eliminated. If we wish to give an expression of opinion to our Government the proper way for each House to proceed is by resolution. In that way we could have given the Government some definite expressions of opinion.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator object to the Government negotiating with New South Wales?

Senator MULCAHY.—I object to loading the Bill with a mere expression of opinion. I do not think it will reflect on our legislative wisdom if we make a mere expression of opinion the subject of an enactment. While I strongly support the selection of a site, and believe that practically the best site has been selected by the Houses, I do not consider that by assenting to these amendments I am necessarily committing myself to any large expenditure. I think that we should be acting directly in opposition to the wishes of the people of Tasmania generally, and of all sensible people throughout the Commonwealth, if we were to indulge immediately in any very large expenditure. It is a consolation to me to know that the disposition of this Parliament is not to borrow. I recognise that if the money has to be provided out of the annual revenue we shall proceed cautiously enough.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 3—

The territory to be granted to or acquired by the Commonwealth, within which the Seat of Government shall be, shall be within the area mentioned in section 2, and shall contain an area not less than nine hundred square miles.

House of Representatives' Amendment.—Omit "shall be within the area mentioned in section 2, and shall," and insert "should."

Senator MCGREGOR. — After the lengthy discussion on the previous amendment, I expect that this amendment, by reason of its simplicity, will be accepted with very little loss of time. When the previous amendment was being considered I felt tempted on several occasions to rise and express my opinions in opposition to the views of some honorable senators, but I was so anxious to see this Bill carried that I refrained from exercising my privilege. I move—

That the amendment be agreed to.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—I wish to once more record my objection to the insertion of the word "should" in this clause.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It is only done out of deference to New South Wales.

Senator KEATING.—Exactly. On a previous occasion when an attempt was made by some honorable senators to insert the word it was pointed out that we could not use the word "shall," because it did not rest entirely with this Parliament to ultimately decide the actual extent of territory.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Did not a previous Government consent to the use of the word "should"?

Senator KEATING.—The members of the present Government resisted the use of that word, as I did. It was decided by the Senate, to send the Bill down to the other House, with the word "shall" in this clause, trusting, however, to the good sense of the Government of New South Wales, to recognise that there was no attempt on the part of this Parliament to coerce that State, or to usurp any legislative rights, but that it merely wished to adhere to a legislative word, which should be used in such circumstances. Last night another place was asked to again exhibit deference to New South Wales, by substituting "should" for "shall." I agree with Senator Mulcahy, that this clause is an affirmation of something which should not be found in a legislative enactment. It is not an enactment, but a mere recommendation, or an expression of a pious wish, and its proper place would be in a resolution passed by each House, as an instruction to the Government, that when they approached the Government of New South Wales, they could say just as easily as they can say now, and with far better grace, "We come to you with this Bill, and these instructions, which express the will of our Parliament, so far as it can be given legislative form, and beyond these instructions we are not to go in negotiating with you in the matters which must be dealt with by us, a matter of contract or bargain." However, the clause is there, and the object those who are considering the interests Australia generally, and not the interests of the few, whom Senator Dobson sees to, is to see that this Bill is done with as speedily as possible. As soon as it has been dealt with, and our Government can proceed to negotiate with New South Wales, no doubt a great deal of present irritation and friction will disappear. I, for one, feel that, although we shall have passed the Bill, yet, even if our Government succeed in selecting a site ultimately, neither this nor a succeeding Parliament will launch out upon extravagant expenditure, as so many persons, who are opposed to the selection of a site for the Capital, are so fond of telling the people. I am confident that we shall proceed cautiously and slowly, that we shall cut our coat according to our cloth, and that the Capital, though its construction be entered upon early, will not be completed before a generation or two has passed. I trust we shall take such steps as are necessary under present circumstances, to establish a territory in that portion of New South Wales which will ultimately be decided upon, which shall not belong to the people of any State, but shall be the common property and heritage of the citizens of Australia for all time, and that we shall gradually, as the years go by, make a centre which shall be worthy of this Commonwealth.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—I believe that it was a great mistake on our part to insist upon using the word "shall," because we had no constitutional right to do so. We must bear in mind that, in the territory "shall have been granted and acquired" by the Commonwealth, the land is vested in and belong to the Commonwealth; we have no right to fix on a site. We are not passing an Act of Parliament, but really it is merely a means of informing the Government of New South Wales that our desire is. According to the Constitution the area shall not be less than 100 square miles; but does any man in his senses believe that the High Court would decide that we could take 200 square miles without the consent of New South Wales?

Senator TRENWITH.—Yes, if that land were required for the Capital.

Senator PLAYFORD.—All the Commonwealth can do is to express a wish for a larger area than that mentioned in the Constitution; and in such an expression I quite agree. I trust that New South Wales will accede to any request of the Commonwealth in that direction; but, at the same time, we have no power to force that State to hand over 900 square miles.

Senator KEATING.—Our wish should be expressed by resolution.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Why not express ourselves in language that is intelligible?

Senator CLEMONS.—An Act of Parliament is not a vehicle for the expression of wishes.

Senator PLAYFORD.—This is a most exceptional measure; though I admit it might have been better to convey our wishes by a joint resolution of the two Houses, I am entirely in agreement with the choice which has been made. Though I have never seen the territory myself, I think I am able to judge of its merits from the reports of intelligent people who have visited it; I can read the details as to the temperature, the rainfall, and the quality of the soil.

Senator FRASER.—Rainfall in a poor country is not much good.

Senator PLAYFORD.—But no rainfall in a poor country is worse. Very rich country with very little rainfall is not half so good as poor country with a heavy rainfall. I have judged this site from the reports of others, and have paid special attention to the report given by Sir John Forrest. That gentleman was in no way interested in any particular site, but made his investigation with an open mind. He was at one time a surveyor, and, with his full knowledge of land, gave his opinion unmistakably in favour of Dalgaty. Personally I should have liked the site to be nearer Twofold Bay, because it is important that the Federal Capital should be connected with a port. But we cannot get everything we desire; and we know that at Dalgaty there is sufficient water power to generate electricity for railways and for manufactures within a certain distance, at the least possible cost. As to climate, I prefer cold to heat, as I think the majority of people do. Those who come from the north, and have been enervated to a certain extent by tropical conditions, will at Dalgaty be braced up for future usefulness. As to the necessary expenditure, my idea is that no money should be borrowed in connexion with the Federal Capital; that all expenditure necessary for providing accommodation for Parliament ought to be met out of the revenue. We have lately heard a great deal about Socialism, and have been told how inadvisable it would be to establish anything like socialistic conditions on the Federal Territory. All I have to say is that if the Commonwealth Government, when they acquire the land, are foolish enough to part with the fee simple, the people of Australia will curse them in the future, because no greater mistake could be committed. We know what the result of parting with the fee simple has been in other parts of the world. In the city of Adelaide I know of acres which originally sold for £5 or £10, but which, on their unimproved value, are now assessed at £20,000. I was never more struck in my life with the importance of not parting with the fee simple as I was during a visit I paid to Singapore. I called upon the Governor, and, speaking of the magnificent buildings I had noticed in the town, I asked him on what tenure the land was held. He informed me that it was leased by the Government for fifty years or ninety-nine years, there being a clause stipulating for certain improvements; and the result of the system is that in the course of time the whole of the property will fall into the hands of the Government. Very little taxation is required there at present, and the possession of this property will render taxation unnecessary in the future.

Senator FRASER.—Singapore is a Crown Colony?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Yes; some extremely socialistic plans are tried in Crown Colonies, very often with a considerable amount of wisdom. I am exceedingly glad that the House of Representatives has practically come to the same conclusion as has the Senate in regard to the site for the Federal Capital. I was afraid, from what had taken place previously, that there might be considerable difficulty; and it is exceedingly gratifying that the result is so good, so far as we have proceeded.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—Some remarks which have been made this evening may create a feeling approaching alarm amongst the people of the district in which the proposed Federal territory is situated. It has been affirmed that after the passage of the Bill there is no intention to borrow money for the purpose of carrying its provision into effect. I wish to point out that once the Federal territory is acquired it will be absolutely necessary for the Commonwealth to borrow an amount sufficient to pay for private property which it may be necessary to take over.

Senator PEARCE.—But not to compensate the owners.

Senator MILLEN.—Having assumed this territory, we cannot allow it to remain for the periods which have been mentioned—periods ranging from four to twenty years, or from one to two generations—without paying for the property which is claimed. The remarks as to the delay which will take place before any money is expended or borrowed apply only to the building of the Capital, and not to the compensation of those whose private property may be interfered with.

Motion agreed to.

House of Representatives' Amendment.—At end of clause add "and have access to the sea."

Senator MCGREGOR.—No argument is, I think, necessary to impress on the minds of honorable senators the importance of this amendment. I believe a large majority of honorable senators recognise the advisability of having access from the Federal Capital to the seaboard, and for that reason I shall not occupy time in recommending this amendment. I move—

That the amendment be agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported; report adopted.

SELECT COMMITTEE: TOBACCO MONOPOLY.

Motion (by Senator PEARCE) agreed to—

That the Select Committee on Tobacco Monopoly have leave to extend the time for bringing up their report to this day four weeks.

Senate adjourned at 10 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 10 August, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Mr. LEE presented a petition from the Women's Christian Temperance Union of New South Wales, praying the House to prohibit the introduction, sale, and manufacture of intoxicating liquors in British New Guinea.

Petition received.

CAUCUS MEETINGS.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Has the attention of the Prime Minister been directed to a paragraph which appears in this morning's Argus, and is to the effect that yesterday the Legislative Council of Victoria held a caucus meeting? Can the honorable gentleman inform the House if there is any difference between the procedure reported to have been adopted by the Legislative Council of Victoria, and that followed by the Labour Party and other parties?

Mr. WATSON.—I have not seen the paragraph referred to, but, no doubt, the system of holding caucus meetings has preceded in every case from the one general source, and is worked in the same fashion by every party.

Mr. EWING.—It is spreading.

Mr. WATSON.—May not that be due to the example afforded by the party to which the honorable member belongs? The Labour Party has not been in existence sufficiently long to influence the other parties in this matter. The caucus is a new invention in Victoria, and I understand that it was recently used in connection with the choosing of the presiding officer of the more representative branch of the Victorian Parliament.

COLONEL HOAD.

Mr. PAGE.—Is it true that the Commonwealth military representative at the Russo-Japanese war is still at Tokio? So, do Ministers expect that he will get much military information there?

Mr. WATSON.—Colonel Hoad was some time at Tokio, and the Government were considering the advisability of asking through the proper channels, that he might be allowed to proceed to the front. As the alternative, we intended to direct him to return home. Since then, however, a more than a week ago, he obtained permission to proceed to the front, and he is there now, for anything we know to the contrary.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CULPIN.—It is stated in to-day's Age that I entered the House yesterday after the first ballot was taken. That is incorrect, because I was in the Chamber when the ballot-papers were distributed previous to the ballot being taken; but had paired with the honorable member Mr. Barrier, I did not vote. I think it is only fair to myself that I should refute the statement I have referred to.

NEW HEBRIDES.

Motion (by Mr. HUME COOK) agreed to:—

That a return be laid upon the table of the House showing—

1. The number of British subjects resident in the New Hebrides.
2. The description and value of their surplus products for export.
3. The total amount of a full rebate of duties for one year on the products entering Australia.
4. The estimated amount of such rebates on a ten years' concession after providing for a reasonable increase in the volume of trade.
5. The total area of land held in 1903 and 1904 by British subjects, and the conditions upon which such land was held.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT BILL.

Report adopted.

Motion (by Mr. BATCHELOR) agreed to—

That the Standing Orders be suspended to enable the Bill to pass through its remaining stages without delay.

Bill read a third time.

CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION BILL.

Mr. WATSON (Bland—Treasurer).—I move—

That the Bill be now recommitted to a Committee of the whole House for the reconsideration of clauses 4, 37, 38, 39, 46, 48, 52, 67, 68, 90, schedule B; and the consideration of proposed new clauses 52A and 95A.

I do not propose to offer at this stage any observations on the amendments which the Government intend to move if the recommitment be granted, since the proposed amendments have been circulated, and honorable members, therefore, have had an opportunity to make themselves acquainted with our intentions. I shall, however, give detailed reasons for the proposed amendments when we get into Committee.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat).—Although the Government have given notice of the amendments to which they propose to ask the Committee to agree, I would remind the Prime Minister that other amendments were suggested which appear not to have commended themselves to the Cabinet.

Mr. WATSON.—We shall not oppose the recommitment of such other clauses as we agreed to reconsider.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If we were informed why the Government did not think it necessary to make certain amendments, the recommitment of those clauses might not be necessary. For instance, the first point that occurs to me, without reference to my copy of the Bill, is that to which I directed the attention of the Attorney-General, namely, the appointment of a Judge of the High Court. I do not notice that it has been thought necessary to make an amendment there.

Mr. WATSON. — The Attorney-General considered the point, and he thought we had power, under all the circumstances. Of course, that is only his opinion.

Mr. DEAKIN. — And the Government could not have a higher opinion. My point was not merely, in one sense, whether the Government had the power. I raised the question whether the provision of the Constitution, as to the office of Justice of the High Court, would permit of the appointment being made in that way, at all events, without the consent of the Justices. If the Prime Minister says that the Attorney-General has considered the matter, and is satisfied, I have nothing further to say. When the Prime Minister moves recommitment for the purposes of these amendments, do I understand that in each case he moves the recommitment of the whole clause?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes.

Mr. DEAKIN. — Because that will enable me to ask for the justification for retaining the words "subject to the Constitution," to which attention was called in clauses which provide that no awards of the Court shall be capable of being reconsidered by any other tribunal—questioned in any Court whatever. I think attention was drawn to the fact that the words were unnecessary. They were introduced originally, not for any legal effect, but to satisfy the minds of laymen who might suppose the clause to over-ride the Constitution. The words are unnecessary for that purpose, but I do not notice that the Government propose to omit them. I understand, however, that the Prime Minister will afford us an opportunity to consider all these matters.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I notice that amongst the ten or eleven clauses which it is proposed to recommit there is clause 48; and I also observe an amendment in respect of that clause. The proposal is to omit the proviso inserted at my instance some weeks ago, and to insert in its place another proviso which has been circulated, and to the terms of which I shall refer in a minute or two. We all know that certain declarations have been made by the Government in connexion with this amendment. The Government seem to consider this amendment of more importance than most of the other matters referred to in the motion for recommitment; and it seems to me—as I agree with them in regarding it as a matter of very great importance—that nothing would be lost, while much would be gained, by getting the determination of the House at the earliest possible moment. There will be, as I understand, as full freedom to discuss the clause and the alternative amendment in the House as there would be in Committee.

Mr. WATSON.—Not now. The honorable member has apparently closed my mouth; I cannot speak again.

Mr. McCAY.—The Prime Minister can speak on the amendment.

Mr. REID.—The Prime Minister may speak with the unanimous concurrence of honorable members.

Mr. McCAY.—The Prime Minister may in any case speak on the amendment.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Why not go into Committee in the proper way?

Mr. WATSON.—We might as well have the question tested now as at any time.

Mr. REID.—I suppose the Prime Minister has been expecting this for a long time?

Mr. WATSON.—It would show a little more courage to do it in a direct fashion.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not understand this unusual heat.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not understand this change of tactics.

Mr. McCAY.—So far as I am concerned there has been no change of tactics. From first to last, I have expressed very definitely and emphatically my opinion about the amendment that was carried, and I should think the Prime Minister might easily realize that the substitute he proposes does not meet, at any rate, with my approval.

Mr. SPENCE.—The matter was not debated.

Mr. WATSON.—There is another stage at which what the honorable and learned member proposes is usually done.

Mr. McCAY.—The matter was debated for three or four days; and my amendment was fully within the cognizance of all honorable members who were noticing the course of the debate. To return to what I was saying when the interruption occurred, there will be, as I understand, a full opportunity to debate in the House as there would be in Committee, the alternative amendments, with the limitation, of course, that the forms of the House do not permit honorable members to re-address themselves to the subject. So far as I am concerned, I shall not feel those forms of the House any hindrance. I wish to speak only once, and I do not suppose that other honorable members desire to speak often. I do think, however, that it is not only reasonable but proper to bring this matter under the notice of the House at the earliest possible moment, in order that we may determine how this very important question of limiting the giving of preference to organizations is to be decided. I propose, therefore, before I resume my seat, to move that the figures "48" be omitted from the notice for recommitment.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—A despicable trick.

Mr. McCAY.—I ask you, sir, whether the honorable member for Hume is in order in using the words "despicable trick"?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I never heard of such a thing before.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I ask the honorable member for Hume to withdraw the expression to which attention has been called.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I withdraw it.

Mr. McCAY.—I cannot understand the heat of the honorable member for Hume.

Mr. McDONALD.—The honorable learned member is working very hard, and I congratulate him.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable and learned member wants to be in the team.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member for Hume evidently wants to be in something.

Mr. McCAY.—All I can say is that it is owing to nothing that I am doing, asking, that the Government have taken their present attitude in the matter.

Mr. WATSON.—All the same, it is usually considered most discourteous to refuse reconsideration.

Mr. McCAY.—I would point out to the Prime Minister that no reconsideration is being refused, because the whole matter can be fully debated on the amendment I am about to move.

Mr. WATSON.—No, it cannot.

Mr. McCAY.—If the amendment cannot be debated, I should not submit it.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable learned member knows that no amendment can be moved, at this stage, on his proposal, or upon that of the Government.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not know how many amendments the Prime Minister wants to move.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not want to move any amendment.

Mr. McCAY.—I know there was an amendment in the clause carried by a majority of the Committee, and I know that the Government propose to insert another amendment which they have circulated in, I presume, the exact words which they wish to have inserted. We have two alternative proposals before us, and nothing more; and, having those proposals before us, we can as easily decide the matter now as later on in Committee.

Mr. HUGHES.—That applies to every one of the clauses it is proposed to recommit.

Mr. WATSON.—Hear, hear!

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—We will not do it.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member for Hume says, "We will not do it"; but that is a matter for the House to determine.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The sense of fair play of the House will not permit anything of the kind.

Mr. McCAY.—I can see no unfair play.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I can.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member for Hume may be a good judge of what is fair or what is unfair play; but, so far as I am concerned, I can see nothing unfair in my proposal. It seems to me that the House is as fully competent as the Committee would be to decide this question. It is not as though there were a variety of different proposals submitted.

Mr. McDONALD.—Then why go into Committee at all?

Mr. SPENCE.—Why propose a departure in regard to this clause, and not in regard to the others?

Mr. McCAY.—Because on this particular clause the Government have taken up the position that they will not accept my amendment.

Mr. SPENCE.—How does that apply?

Mr. McCAY.—The Government are determined to have their own amendment; and I venture to take up the position that I shall adhere to my amendment, and will not support that of the Government. I am prepared to back my opinion by moving accordingly; that is all.

Mr. GROOM.—Why not move in Committee?

Mr. McCAY.—Why should I not move in the House? What injury can the Government suffer by having this matter debated in the House instead of in Committee? It is not a question of settling verbiage, or of drafting, but of choosing between two very important alternatives, one of which seeks to achieve a particular end, whilst the other has an object which I must confess is not quite clear.

Mr. HUGHES.—How does the present proposal differ from any other for the recommitment of a Bill? Why should not the honorable and learned member oppose all recommitments?

Mr. McCAY.—I have known recommitments to be objected to. I can remember cases in which Governments have objected to recommitments. Take the case of the tea duty. I have also known a Government to receive a warning that the recommitment of a tea duty would not be permitted. Even in connexion with the present Bill, I heard the Prime Minister say that he would not agree to a recommitment for the purpose of considering the principles contained in one or two clauses.

Mr. FISHER.—The Government did not propose to recommit the tea duty.

Mr. McCAY.—It was announced beforehand that the Labour Party would oppose it. The Prime Minister announced, when he was asked if he would agree to an unconditional recommitment, that he would not consent in regard to one or two clauses in which certain principles were involved; that he would agree to a recommitment with the object of dealing with the verbiage, but for no other purpose. If the Government are entitled to refuse to recommit a clause because they hold certain views, I fail to see why any honorable member, however humble may be his position, should not be entitled to adopt the same attitude, especially when, as is the case here, the whole question can be as definitely decided in the House as in Committee—with the exception, as I said before, that honorable members will not be able to speak so frequently in the House. That is not an unmixed evil, although it possibly may be an evil of some kind. The amendment which was carried after fair consideration—I wish the honorable member for Hume would not interrupt.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am not interrupting the honorable and learned member.

Mr. McCAY.—I object to any honorable member indulging in a constant stream of interjections that I can hear, but which Mr. Speaker cannot hear.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable and learned member ought to behave himself.

Mr. McCAY.—If the honorable member wants to interject, he might at least do me the courtesy of not sitting immediately behind me, because it is difficult to speak when one is subjected to a stream of interjections from behind. I do not wish to introduce any heat into this discussion, or to strike sparks from the anvil of the honorable member's feelings.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable and learned member wants to strike below the belt.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not know why the honorable member is so worried about this matter.

Mr. McDONALD.—Why is the honorable and learned member worried about it?

Mr. McCAY.—I am not in the least worried. I have fought and lost, and I have fought and won, in connexion with this Bill. I have borne my beatings as cheerfully as I have taken my successes, and I have not quarrelled with other honorable members because I have been beaten.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable and learned member is very much afraid of the Committee.

Mr. McCAY.—I am not afraid of the Committee. I cannot understand the extraordinary zeal on the part of some honorable members to get to the Committee.

Mr. McDONALD.—The honorable and learned member changes his views very quickly.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not think the honorable member can point to any instance in which I have changed my views.

Mr. McDONALD.—What about the contribution towards the maintenance of the Australian Auxiliary Squadron?

Mr. McCAY.—I never changed my opinion upon that subject—not so far as my memory serves me.

Mr. McDONALD.—Does not the honorable and learned member remember the conversation we had?

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member is referring to a casual conversation over the billiard-table?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask honorable members not to interject so as to interrupt an honorable member who is addressing the House. I would especially ask them to refrain from introducing matters that are absolutely irrelevant, and to which the speaker who is in possession of the Chair cannot in the course of his speech reply. If honorable members will quietly listen to the honorable and learned member they will have an opportunity of replying to him later on.

Mr. McCAY.—To return to the subject and to leave the digression into which was drawn by the somewhat surprising statement of the honorable member Kennedy, I would point out that the proviso in clause 48 reads as follows:—

And provided further that no such preference shall be directed to be given unless the application for such preference is, in the opinion of the Court, approved by a majority of those affected by the award who have interests in common with the applicants.

The key-note of the proposal is that, the opinion of the Court, the majority of the workmen who are asking for preference shall be favorable to it. The Government proposal is that the following proviso should be substituted:—

The Court, before directing that preference shall be given to the members of an organization shall be satisfied that the organization substantially represents the industry affected in point of the numbers and competence of its members.

The operative words are "substantially presents," and I shall have a few words to say in regard to their meaning. I must say that when I first saw the amendment circulated as an alternative to mine—

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Was not the honorable and learned member's amendment adopted by the Committee?

Mr. McCAY.—Yes.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Then it has become the work of the Committee.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes, it was adopted by a majority of seven votes.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Without proper discussion.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not agree with the honorable member. We had four days of discussion.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Not upon that point.

Mr. McCAY.—I gave notice of my intention to withdraw my original amendment, and substitute another, certainly in the form in which the proviso was finally adopted, but one embodying the same principle. Every honorable member had ample opportunity to consider it before it was adopted and certainly has had ample opportunity to consider it since, and I do not suppose that any honorable member will contend that he has not so sidered it. When I first saw the Government proposal, and noticed that it once more made a concession, at any rate to the views of myself and others, I wondered what kind of reception the Government amendment would have had if it had been proposed by me in the first place. If I had suggested that a preference should be allowed to an organization substantially representing an industry in point of numbers and competence, I question whether I should not have been told to trust the Court. I remember that when an earlier amendment of mine regarding the political character of unions was under consideration, it was pointed out at one moment to those who were inclined to agree with me that after all the Government proposal was very much the same as mine, and that they might as well support it, and the next moment it was pointed out that they could not support my proposal because it was so different. I dare say we shall hear something of the same kind on the present occasion. The Government propose that the Court shall be at liberty to give preference to an organization, when satisfied that it substantially represents an industry. I do not quite understand what "substantially represents" means. I take it that the whole question would be left to the discretion of the Court. The expression means very little more than that. It means, once more, "trust the Court." If it means that, until a majority of the workmen support or approve, preference shall not be given by the Court, then the Government proposal says, in less definite words and in vaguer language, the same thing as my amendment. I do not suppose that the Government would for a moment accept that view, nor do I suppose that the Government mean that. Their amendment must mean something substantially less than my amendment as it appears in the Bill. It means, apparently, that the Court will be called upon to decide what constitutes "substantial representation in numbers and competence." That is to say, the numbers of the organization must substantially represent the industry affected, and the competence of its members must also substantially represent it.

Mr. SPENCE.—What more does the honorable and learned member want?

Mr. McCAY.—If the Government proposal means as much as does my amendment, I desire no more. But it does not mean as much, otherwise the Ministry would not propose it.

Mr. WATSON.—We say that the amendment of the honorable and learned member is unworkable.

Mr. McCAY.—In other words, the Government affirm that unionists can never secure the approval of a majority of those interested in any industry. If that be so, I hold that they should not be granted a preference. Rightly or wrongly, I am very definitely of opinion that it should be essential to the granting of a preference to unionists, that at least the Court should believe that a majority of those concerned in the industry affected desire such a preference.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—How would the honorable and learned member secure the opinion of the majority?

Mr. McCAY.—I shall deal with that matter at a later stage. At present, I am discussing the proposal of the Government. I would remind the House that in New Zealand, the Court has always proceeded upon the principle that it was necessary that a majority of the employes interested in any industry should ask for a preference to be extended to them before any such preference was granted. If in New Zealand the Court finds it possible to determine when the employes who desire that a preference shall be extended to them constitute a majority of those engaged in an industry, I must confess that I am unable to understand why the same result cannot be achieved in Australia. I shall point out the reasons for my belief in a minute or two. What does "substantial" representation mean? I do not for a moment suppose that it means as little as is conveyed in some comments by the right honorable member for East Sydney, which appear in the Argus of to-day, and in which he points out that it has been held by a Court that a house was in "substantial" repair, notwithstanding that its walls were in very poor condition. But let us take a specific instance. Does the Prime Minister think that Mr. McGarry substantially represents the electorate of the Murrumbidgee in the Parliament of New South Wales?

Mr. WATSON.—I think so.

Mr. McCAY.—The Prime Minister asserts that Mr. McGarry substantially represents the electors of the Murrumbidgee?

Mr. WATSON.—I do.

Mr. McCAY.—Mr. McGarry polled 1,538 votes out of 8,111 electors upon the roll, and out of a total of 5,171 votes recorded.

In other words, he received 30 per cent. of the votes that were polled and 19 per cent. of the votes of the electors whose names appear upon the roll. In his case the number of voters upon the roll would correspond with the number of persons employed in an industry. Consequently, the Prime Minister argues that 19 per cent. of those engaged in an industry would substantially represent that industry. I say that it does not.

Mr. WATSON.—It is not a question of what the Prime Minister thinks, but of what the President of the Arbitration Court would say.

Mr. McCAY.—I was waiting for that admission. In other words, under the proposal of the Government we have got back to the position that we are required to trust the Court without imposing any limitation upon its action. If the Court were to declare that 19 per cent. of those engaged in an industry substantially represented that industry, I should not agree with it. The words "substantial" and "substantially" are vague words, which we never employ in an Act of Parliament if we can avoid them. The effect of their insertion in this clause would be to vest the Court practically with a discretion to say that "substantial representation" exists in any industry, unless that representation was obviously trivial or frivolous. Under the Government proposal, almost anything might be upheld as "substantial representation." But I would point out that, should an appeal be made from the decision of the Arbitration Court to the High Court on the ground that the former has held that certain representation was "substantial," whilst those immediately concerned, against whom such an award had been made, did not think so, the question involved would be one of fact, and not of law. I repeat that under the amendment foreshadowed by the Government it would be left absolutely to the Arbitration Court to declare what was "substantial representation," and what was not. It is easy to conceive that a course of decisions might be given producing a result which would cause the Court to regard as substantial sets of circumstances which none of us would ever dream of describing by that term. I claim that a limitation which leaves the Court practically unfettered is no limitation at all. Honorable members are aware that the form of the Government proposal was decided upon some weeks before it was circulated. I did not receive a copy of it, although some honorable members did. I do not wish to speak at a greater length. No doubt a number of honorable members will address themselves to the question, and the alternative proposal before the House will meet with full discussion. Each side will be sure to point out the errors of the other side, and my amendment will, doubtless, be subjected to severe criticism. I trust, however, that it will be subjected to destructive criticism, because I venture to think that, after all, it expresses as reasonably, fairly, and definitely as is possible in matters of this kind, the views held by the Committee at the time it was made, and the opinions which its supporters still entertain. I start by postulating that from the stand-point it is essential to the exercise of the commonest fair-play that a majority should be in favour of the extension of preference to them before any such preference is granted. I protest in the strongest terms at my command, and I protest by my action as well as by my voice, against any system which will allow minorities to control the destinies of majorities, especially the industrial destinies of majorities, because that is more important than is the mere determination that majorities shall rule in political affairs. As a rule, political matters touch us only indirectly. They may affect us very vitally but almost invariably they do so in an indirect manner. But we shall strike at the root of the livelihood of a very large number of the people of Australia if this preference is granted without a limitation to the effect that a majority of those concerned in the industry affected shall first declare themselves in favour of such a preference. At the very least, I claim that if we are to establish a rule of this kind, we should say to the Court, "It shall be a majority rule, and not under any circumstances a minority rule." I am satisfied that the great bulk of the people of the Commonwealth believe that such a limitation is essential, and that it is only from a limited section that protests against it are forthcoming. We have been told that the amendment constitutes a menace to unionism—that it strikes a blow at its fundamental principles. I entirely dissent from that view. I quite agree with the right unions to do their work in the way they think best, and to obtain, by proper constitutional means, everything that they want. If they can induce a majority of the ors of Australia, in the expression of their wishes at the ballot-box, to agree with their own views, and if, as a result, I am left in a minority, I shall not quarrel with majority rule. I am perfectly prepared to apply to myself the same rule that I wish to apply to others. But I will not agree to what is practically the establishment of minority rule under any circumstances whatever. It has been said that my amendment is not workable. The following are its exact words—and I must apologize to the House for repeating them, but apparently the Prime Minister suggests that the question involved is one of wording—

Mr. WATSON.—I said that the amendment of the honorable and learned member is unworkable.

Mr. McCAY.—Then it is not the wording of my amendment with which the Prime Minister quarrels, but its working possibilities. I suppose that he means that it would never be possible to secure such a state of affairs as would induce the Court to think that a majority of those affected by the award were in favour of a preference being given to the organization.

Mr. KELLY.—He will not trust the Court in that case.

Mr. McCAY.—No; he can trust the Court only in matters in which its operation can move in the direction of his own desires, and not against them.

Mr. POYNTON.—Will the honorable and learned member show how his proposal could be carried out?

Mr. McCAY.—I shall give one or two cases in which it could not fail to work. I shall take such authorities as the honorable member for Darling, and the Minister of External Affairs.

Mr. POYNTON.—They represent only two instances.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member asks me to show how my proposal could be carried out, and when I begin to quote cases in relation to which it would certainly operate he remarks—"Those are only two instances." He anticipates my being able to answer his questions, and that being so I have done something towards proving that which it was prognosticated I should not be able to prove. The honorable member for Darling tells us that the vast majority of those connected with sheep shearing are members of the Australian Workers' Union. That being so, when that union goes to the Court and asks for a preference to members of the organization it will not have the least difficulty in satisfying the Court that it represents a majority of those concerned, and that the preference may safely be given.

Mr. SPENCE.—How would it prove that?

Mr. McCAY.—I have not said that it has to be proved by such evidence as is required in an ordinary Court of law. The Bill provides that the Court may inform itself in practically any manner whatever. If the union produced the statistics which the honorable member says it is able to produce—if it showed that it had five-sixths of the shearers of Australia within its ranks, it would have no difficulty whatever in satisfying that impartial Judge whom the honorable member is so willing to trust in all other matters, that there was a majority of those concerned in favour of the application.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—It would have to prove how many did not belong to the union.

Mr. McCAY.—The evidence I have mentioned would satisfy any Court. Those who desired to dispute the conclusions which the Court was asked to draw from the statements submitted by the union, would have to bring forward remarkably strong evidence, and prove up to the hilt that the statement was not true, before the Court would disregard it.

Mr. HUGHES.—On whom would the onus be thrown?

Mr. McCAY.—Upon those who applied for the preference. The honorable and learned gentleman, as a lawyer, knows well enough that the burden of proof may be shifted from time to time during the hearing of a case, and that the prima facie evidence to which I have referred would forthwith shift the burden of proof on to those who objected. The Court will not be bound by the ordinary rules of evidence.

Mr. POYNTON.—I venture to say that even if the honorable and learned member had nothing else to do for twelve months he could not tell us how many shearers there are in Australia.

Mr. McCAY.—Perhaps I should not be able to state the exact number, but I should be able to give it within, at all events, a few hundreds.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We will give the honorable and learned member a margin of 500.

Mr. McCAY.—A margin of 500 or of even 1,000 would not be sufficient to affect the question.

Mr. WATSON.—It might affect a majority.

Mr. McCAY.—In the case under notice the number of the members of the organization is so overwhelming that such a margin would not in any way cause injury to the majority. The honorable member for Grey speaks of the necessity there would be to prove the number of shearers in Australia. Does he think that there would have to be a muster of the shearers, as well as of the sheep, in order that a count might be made to satisfy the Court?

Mr. GLYNN.—One could prove a majority although he had no knowledge of the total.

Mr. McCAY.—Exactly. Let me refer now to the Federated Seamen's Union. The Minister of External Affairs told us that, with the exception of the waterside workers at a few small ports, practically every one concerned in Australia was a member of that union. If that be so, there would be no difficulty in proving that the application for a preference was supported in that case by a majority of those concerned. Let us take another case in which the members of a union do not represent a majority of the workers in the industry to which it applies. Let us take a case in which it is doubtful whether the organization, although a large one, represents a majority of those affected. To begin with, I would point out that it is more difficult to ascertain the exact number of persons concerned in the pastoral industry, and that relating to transportation by land and sea, than it is to discover the number engaged in any other calling, because both occupations are more nomadic than is any other. But in those cases the difficulty has already been obviated by the praiseworthy efforts of those who have been concerned in forming unions relating to them. Let us deal with other industries in which the occupation is more localized. I take it that there would be no difficulty in ascertaining, for example, the majority of railway employés or of those engaged in the coal-mining industry. The coal mines of Australia are situated in a limited number of localities, and it would be the easiest thing in the world to ascertain the majority in the case of those employed in them. I come now to the position of gold miners. We have a certain unascertained percentage of men engaged in that industry who are working on their own account. When I say that the percentage is unascertained, I mean that it is not quite accurately ascertained. Speaking from experience gained by a life-time spent on the gold-fields, I venture to say that it would be possible to ascertain with comparative ease the majority—

Mr. POYNTON.—It would not; and know as much about the gold-fields as do the honorable and learned member.

Mr. McCAY.—I dare say; but I am merely speaking of what has been my own experience. I cannot say what are the results of the honorable member's experience in this direction; but my experience is, first of all, that the number of men working on their own account is small, compared with the number employed on wages. There would be practically no substantial difficulty in ascertaining the number of gold miners employed by others and those who were working for themselves would not be concerned by an award because they would be neither employers nor employés. We should find that in every industry there would be no substantial difficulty in carrying out my amendment. The clause does not say that a majority of those concerned in the industry in Australia must approve before an award may be given. It simply says that the application shall be "approved by a majority of those affected by the award." Some ingenious individuals may possibly say that a man in Western Australia might be affected by an award applying to Victoria and New South Wales, and that therefore he would have to be included in the total before a majority could be ascertained. I venture, with very little hesitation, to differ from that view of the position. On matters relating to the construction and the interpretation of the English language no one can speak with absolute certainty, because it lends itself, to a very great extent, to the ingenuity of those who love puzzles.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—What about the common rule; it affects the honorable and learned member's argument?

Mr. McCAY.—I shall come to that presently; but, to parody Sir Boyle Roche's statement that a man cannot be in two places at once unless he is a bird, I would point out that I cannot deal at once with two aspects of the case. I assert, without practically any hesitation, that a man in Western Australia would not be affected by an award which applied, say, to Victoria and New South Wales. He might be subsequently affected by the award. The clause does not require that there shall be a majority of those who "may" be affected, but a majority of those who "are" affected by the award. The widest inpretation which the Court could give to my amendment would be one saying in effect, "We want a majority of those within the area over which the award is to extend." If the award extends over Australia—assuming that the Constitution will allow it to so extend; and that, of course, is another matter—we need the consent of a majority of those employed in the industry affected throughout Australia. If the award extends over only two States, we want the approval of a majority of those concerned in the two States. If it can be limited to only one State, as is conceivable, though I do not think it will be, we want a majority of those concerned in that State; and if it be limited to specified localities, we want a majority of those concerned in the localities specified.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable and learned member is asking for more than is asked under the Electoral Act in connexion with the election of members of Parliament. Hardly one member of the House was returned by an actual majority of his constituents.

Mr. McCAY.—I think that there are one or two exceptions; but it must be remembered that the Bill asks for a great deal more in other respects than is asked for by the Electoral Act. The Electoral Act does not directly affect any man's living, nor do most of the laws passed by this Parliament affect the public in the way in which this Bill will affect them.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Why ask impossibilities?

Mr. McCAY.—I am not asking impossibilities. I have pointed to a number of cases in which I think it is obviously possible, and some in which the result has been actually achieved. All that is necessary is to place before the Court the facts already ascertained. My own view of my amendment is that where a common rule is not asked for, the proviso will apply only to employes and employers who are parties to the claim. It will practically apply only to the workshops or industries in which are engaged the actual parties to the dispute, and those concerned in it. It is possible to take the other and wider view which I have mentioned, but the locality to which the award extends is the maximum area to which the amendment will apply, and the area within which the consent of the majority will be required. My own view is that where a common rule is not asked for, it will apply practically only to the shops, factories, and so on, that are concerned, and the persons connected with them as employers or employes. If my view be wrong, the wider view still leaves the provision practically feasible, and by no means difficult of achievement. We do not desire to make preferences obtainable in a particularly free, easy, and accessible manner—to quote a phrase well known in Victoria a few years ago. We desire to have proper safeguards, though there are some safeguards now. If a common rule be applied for and granted, it will extend over a given area, and undoubtedly the preference granted in that award and over that area should not be allowed unless the majority of those concerned are, in the opinion of the Court, in favour of it. That provision will prevent the giving of a preference to an organization which is in a minority, and has opposed to it an outside majority. That is a case in which a preference should not be given. I have no fear but that the amendment will be found to operate with comparative ease, with reasonable efficacy, and certainly with no more difficulty than the importance of the subject makes inevitable. We have had before occurrences similar to the present state of affairs in connexion with this Bill. I would remind the House that when the common rule was under consideration, I proposed to limit its application to the cases in which I thought the real reason for a common rule exists, the cases in which there is competition. The Government would not accept my amendment, and passed a modification of it. Then there was a further amendment with reference to the political character of unions and organizations. The Government would not accept that, but proposed a modification of it. They had to accept the modification in exactly the words of my proposal, except that they altered the point at which the operation of the sub-section began, and they did that only so that they might carry the Bill in something like its present form. I would also remind the House of the circumstances under which this recommittal is asked for, and of the circumstances which have arisen since the amendment was carried to limit preferences to cases in which a majority of those affected approve. When my amendment was proposed, the Government simply announced that they could not accept it, and said no more; but it was carried by a majority of five votes. Two honorable members were absent, who, so far as I can judge, would, had they been present, have supported the amendment. The Government then reported progress, and said that they would consider their position. Two or three days later—I think on the following Tuesday—the Prime Minister informed the House that he would ask leave to recommit the clause, in order to permit honorable members to reconsider their determination. Not a word was then said about an alternative proposal. Later came the amendment relating to the political character of unions, which the Government carried in the form they desired by a majority of one vote, with the kind assistance of the “bridge-builders” in this corner of the Chamber. The Prime Minister warned the Committee that that amendment was vital, not only to the Bill, but to the Government; that the Government would resign if it were carried. In answer to the honorable and learned member for Corio, he stated in so many words that if the amendment were carried in the form proposed by me, and not in the form proposed by himself, the Government would resign. That threat had its effect. There was an undoubted cracking of the whip. In my limited parliamentary experience I have never heard the whip cracked more loudly under similar circumstances than it was cracked on that occasion. But the cracking was effective.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable and learned member think that this has anything to do with the question?

Mr. McCAY.—Perhaps I may refer to the matter to fix the date of the occurrence. The Prime Minister then, and not until then, announced that this proposal also was vital to the Government. That was announced, I think, on a Saturday, but I do not know the day of the week. At any rate, it was after the division on the clause relating to the political character of unions that the Prime Minister announced this issue to be vital to the existence of the Government.

Mr. WILKS.—The Prime Minister made an announcement at the table in answer to my remarks, when the amendment of the honorable member for Darling Downs was inserted.

Mr. McCAY.—That is so, but it was afterwards that, for the first time, we heard that this particular issue was vital to the existence of the Government. What does that mean under the circumstances? It means that the amendment, which was carried on its merits, apart from all other considerations, is now to be levered through by means of other issues. It may be that these are issues of importance; I do not know. It is always a matter of considerable importance as to who shall control the administration of a great country like Australia; but that is not a matter of importance, as compared with the much greater interests which I think are involved in such a question as that now before us, in relation to the people of Australia.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The whole thing is only being used for Opposition purposes.

Mr. McCAY.—I beg, with the utmost respect, to absolutely contradict the Minister of Home Affairs.

Mr. WATSON.—The opposition to the Bill right through has been on that ground.

Mr. McCAY.—It was the Government who threw out the challenge, and I never from first to last, throughout the whole of the debates, have said a single word or done a single thing, except in relation to the Bill itself.

Mr. WATSON.—They have been very careful on the other side.

Mr. McCAY.—I have never discussed these matters, except in relation to their merits and their effect on the Bill and on the community. It was the Government on the date I have mentioned, who forced this issue upon us, so that we had to take it up. Must I, because the Government chose to take up that attitude, be debarred from exercising my judgment as to what I think ought to be done with this measure? The Government have thrown down the glove.

Mr. HUGHES.—Poor little lamb!

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable and learned member for Corinella is coming out in his true colours.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not know what the honorable member for Darling means by saying that I am “coming out in my true colours.” If the honorable member means that I shall support the clause regardless of what the Government propose to do, he is correct. I do not care what attitude the Government take on the matter. I am going to vote for the clause as it stands, as against the amendment of the Government. I believe the clause to be right, and the amendment now proposed to be wrong.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable and learned member is going to vote against allowing us to go into Committee to consider the Bill.

Mr. McCAY.—I am not going to do anything of the kind. The honorable member for Hume has made that assertion about six imes, but it does not gather force by repetition.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think it does.

Mr. McCAY.—There, again, I differ from the honorable member; I have had to differ from him before, and may have to do so again. I trust, however, that in all our differences of opinion, I, at any rate, shall never be any crosser than he is, or appears to be, on the present occasion.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable and learned member is always "on the cross."

Mr. McCAY.—I do not in the least degree understand what the honorable member for Hume means. I suppose the honorable member is endeavouring to cast some reflection on me, but what it is I do not understand. However, from some people reflections are more like compliments than injuries.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I always feel like that when reflections are made on me by the honorable and learned member.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not recollect that I have ever passed reflections on the honorable member since I have been in this House.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Only on three or four occasions.

Mr. McCAY.—All I have done is to protest against his interjections. I do not believe that before to-day I have said one word about him personally in this House, and, Mr. Speaker, if I can manage to exercise good sense, I purpose never to say a word about him again. My single sin will, I hope, to some extent be atoned for by my previous comparatively good conduct, and by my subsequent absolutely good conduct. If I have said anything to hurt the feelings of the honorable member for Hume, I am very sorry. The Government, after deliberation, actuated by I do not know what motives—though I have no doubt they were very proper motives—announced through the Prime Minister, outside the House, that they proposed to make this issue vital. The only object I could see for such an announcement was that of influencing the votes of some honorable members who had supported me on a previous occasion. The only object I could see was that of inducing those honorable members to vote against me on the present occasion; there could be no other object to be gained. I have seen it stated in the press that that object has been achieved; that the Government are now assured of a majority against my amendment, of anything from two upwards. As to that I know nothing; I do not profess to be a master of figures in that particular aspect, or indeed in any aspect. But I do say that the Government, having reported progress and taken four days to consider their attitude, and having deliberately told the House that they would give the Committee an opportunity to reconsider the proposal, without any announcement as to making this matter vital, they have no right now to turn round and take their present stand. We, on this side of the House, whether we belong to the Free-trade or the Protectionist Party, are taunted with using this clause as an engine for attacking the Government. But that taunt comes with the worst of grace from those people who, on second thought, and not on first consideration, make this a vital matter, and who now say, "We will try to force this proposal through by the power and prestige of the Government." What could we do except what we have done? We believed in the clause, as amended, and we do so still. The Government never suggested, in the first place, that they were going to make the carrying of the amendment vital; but now that, on second thoughts, they have done so, what can we do but adhere to the opinion we formed in the first place, and have held all along, namely, that this clause should remain as it is, and not be altered in the direction asked by the Government. If the Government choose to make the issue vital it will be an unfortunate incident.

Mr. GROOM.—The Prime Minister did announce, according to the report in Hansard, that they regarded the issue as vital.

Mr. McCAY.—The Prime Minister never said that he regarded the issue as vital to the existence of the Government.

Mr. GROOM.—The Prime Minister said, according to Hansard, that the amendment cut right to the heart of the provision.

Mr. McCAY.—The Government said that the amendment would mean a great change in the Bill, but it was never said that it affected the existence of the Government. That is the point I have endeavoured to make clear all along.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Why not allow the Bill to be recommitted?

Mr. McCAY.—What difference would that make? Is not the honorable member, with myself, able to speak with as much freedom now as we should on recommitment? What object can there be in a recommitment?

Mr. WEBSTER.—What is the object of the honorable and learned member?

Mr. McCAY.—My object is to settle the matter as promptly as possible.

Mr. WATSON.—That is "too thin."

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable and learned member for Corinella is going fishing, and he thinks that a big fish will snap at this bait, whereas it could not be caught by any other.

Mr. McCAY.—The familiarity of the Minister of External Affairs with seafaring matters enables him to indulge in metaphors which we land-lubbers cannot understand. According to Hansard, the Prime Minister, before the amendment was put, said—

The Government consider that on agreeing to the amendment suggested by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, we have gone quite as far as those who favour this clause can be expected to go, and I, therefore, earnestly ask honorable members to reject this amendment.

That is the whole of the Prime Minister's statement, prior to the division.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable and learned member for Corinella asked the Prime Minister not to make a speech on that occasion.

Mr. McCAY.—I did; and that was because I made no speech myself.

Mr. WATSON.—Yet the honorable and learned member claims that this issue has been well discussed.

Mr. McCAY.—So it has been.

Mr. WATSON.—Not this amendment.

Mr. HUGHES.—It has never been discussed at all.

Mr. McCAY.—The principle involved has been discussed.

Mr. WATSON.—The principle of preference only.

Mr. McCAY.—No; the principle of the majority rule.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable and learned member is now burking discussion.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not seem to be burking either discussion or interjections.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable and learned member moved his amendment without speaking himself.

Mr. McCAY.—I know I did, because my amendment was submitted immediately after a division had been taken. I gave notice of two amendments. The Government accepted one, and we discussed the other, but as soon as one was agreed to by the Government—

Mr. SPENCE.—Because the honorable member slipped it through, he is now frightened to have it discussed again.

Mr. McCAY.—I am not in the least degree frightened. Nothing can be slipped through in the House, any more than in Committee. Undoubtedly there will be a full attendance of honorable members in the House to vote one way or the other. We can decide now, just as we as at any other time, whether majority rule is to be provided for in the Bill. I do not understand the desire that is being evinced by the Government for delay. I always understood that Governments were anxious to get on with the business and not to delay it. What I have previously mentioned was all that the Prime Minister said before the division took place. After the division, he moved that progress be reported, and said—

The Government regard the amendment that has just been carried as of very serious import indeed. I feel that it cuts right into the heart of the provision, and, therefore, it is only proper that the Government should have an opportunity to consider how far it affects the general purposes of the measure.

He did not say how far it cut into the principles of the measure—and how far they may ask honorable members to reconsider the decision just given.

Mr. SPENCE.—Now they are asking honorable members to reconsider their decision.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes; and, I say, reconsider the decision, by all means, as we are doing at the present moment. Then on the following Tuesday the Prime Minister said—

When the Committee, on the occasion of its last sitting, decided in favour of the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, I asked that you, sir, should report progress, and thus give the Government an opportunity of considering the effect of the alteration that had just been made in the clause. I stated then that in my opinion—hurriedly arrived at—the proposal cut into the heart of the clause, and affected materially the general purpose of the measure. The Government still hold that view.

They had considered it. He continued—

We think that the clause in its present shape absolutely fails to meet the desires of those who are anxious to see this Bill passed into law in an effective shape. We propose to ask the Committee to reconsider that position so soon as we arrive at the recommittal stage.

Well, we have now arrived at the recommittal stage. The Prime Minister then went on to say that he did not think that the question of majority rule had been argued

Although preference to unionists had been discussed. He concluded—

We shall certainly give honorable members an opportunity when the recommittal stage is reached, of reconsidering the position at which they arrived on Friday last.

There was not one word about the matter being vital to the Government. That is my complaint. Upon further consideration, weeks after the amendment was carried, and after they had made something else vital, and had won in consequence, the Government announce, not to the House, but to the country, that they are going to make this a vital question. Then they turn round and accuse honorable members of using as an engine to defeat the Government, the very thing which they admit must be an engine of destruction if they are defeated upon it. I cannot understand such an attitude on their part.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable and learned member does not want to understand it.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member is welcome to his opinion. He is endeavouring with some considerable lack of success to act the part of the thought reader.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The amendment of the honorable member was never discussed by honorable members.

Mr. McCAY.—It is being discussed now.

Mr. POYNTON.—It will be discussed by the public outside.

Mr. McCAY.—I trust that it will be, and the more it is discussed outside, the better I shall be pleased. The more the public realize the meaning of this clause without my amendment, the more I shall be satisfied as to the result. The suggestion, "You look out for what is going to happen when you get outside"—

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member will be in a minority then.

Mr. McCAY.—Perhaps the honorable member may find himself in a minority. We sometimes think that the views of our constituents are the same as our own, when they are not. It is very unfortunate for the member concerned in such a case, but no one should be induced to change his carefully formed opinions because he thinks that the majority of his constituents may not approve of his conduct, in a matter regarding which he has given no pledge to his electors, or to his caucus, if there is one, but with respect to which he has been left to use his own judgment. I have expressed over and over again my adhesion to the principles of conciliation and arbitration, and I have acted up to that profession. I have, however, left myself quite free to deal with these important matters of detail to the best of my own judgment. If my constituents do not agree with me, I must bow to the will of the majority; but I am now objecting to bow to the will of the minority.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member has with him all those who are opposed to the Bill.

Mr. McCAY.—I cannot help that.

Mr. WATSON.—It has been so on almost every occasion.

Mr. McCAY.—I have voted for the Government on some occasions. I have voted against them on other occasions, because, according to my view, they have sought to go too far. It may be unfortunate that I cannot always see eye to eye with them; but just as I do not quarrel with them for adhering to their views, they should not quarrel with me for standing to my own. Surely, if they are justified in supporting with all their power the proposals which they have put forward, I am as fully justified in opposing with all the force in my power those with which I cannot agree. If the Government are justified in making this a vital matter, surely I, as a private member, am at least justified in continuing to oppose their proposal, notwithstanding the condition which they add to it. I regard this matter as of far more importance than the consideration whether the Government shall remain in or go out of office. I am not under any tie of allegiance to the Government. I crossed to this side of the House when the Deakin Government were beaten upon a matter in which I voted with them, and in which I think they were right. I crossed to this side because I thought that the members of the Labour Party, who now sit on the Government side, were wrong.

Mr. POYNTON.—And the honorable and learned member has voted against them ever since.

Mr. McCAY.—I have voted against them whenever I thought they were wrong, and I shall continue to do so. In the same way I shall vote with them whenever I think they are right, in regard to any measure they choose to bring forward.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable and learned member voted against many of the provisions introduced in the Bill by the Deakin Government.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes, no doubt ; but I have not voted against anything which I had previously supported. I was more concerned about this Bill than about the fate of the Government. It happened that I agreed with the Deakin Government on the question of including railway servants within the scope of the Bill. Just as others voted against them because they did not agree with them, so I voted with them because, for reasons I then gave, I thought they were right. I am much more concerned as to the effect upon Australia of this Bill than as to the effect upon the House of Representatives of the adoption of any particular amendment. The Government think that certain proposals are vital to the Bill, and those who oppose these provisions are charged with being opponents of the measure. This is one of those occasions when the Government are proposing something which should be opposed on principle by honorable members who do not agree with it. Perhaps they hope that the Court will whittle it away to nothing. Some of the friends of the Government are only supporting the proposal as a substitute for my amendment, because they think that it will present a way out of the difficulty in which they find themselves. This is apparently another bridge. I do not know upon what foundations it is built. I am not aware whether political bridges require engineers to build them, just as do bridges of the work-a-day world, nor do I know—if they do require them—whether such engineers are in existence.

Mr. SPENCE.—Is not the honorable and learned member building a bridge himself?

Mr. WEBSTER.—Yes. He is building a bridge to get into office.

Mr. McCAY.—Even from his limited experience of politics, the honorable member must know that even if he thought such a thing, it is not usual to say it. I may add, however, that his assumption is not correct. The honorable member for Hume laughs. I am certainly not as anxious to get into office as some honorable members were reluctant to leave it. My Ministerial experience was not such a happy one that I desire to rush into office. Certainly it would not induce me to accept office at the sacrifice of any principle. To taunt me that way, especially as the Government have thrown out the challenge, is very extraordinary. Am I expected to support proposal of the Government merely because they choose to make it vital to their existence? Even if they withdrew the statement that they regard it as vital, I should still vote against it.

Mr. SPENCE.—Why all this trouble?

Mr. McCAY.—Because I cannot proceed whilst honorable members persistently interject, and invite me to express opinion upon subjects which are more or less relevant to the question before the House—chiefly less.

Mr. POYNTON.—Who put the honorable and learned member up to this procedure?

Mr. McCAY.—I thought of it all myself. I actually possess sufficient intelligence to induce me to conclude that present is as good a time to decide the question as is any other.

Mr. POYNTON.—Did not the honorable and learned member consult anybody else?

Mr. McCAY.—No ; but I told some honorable members that I intended to adopt the course which I am now following. I did not even consult the honorable member who has interjected. I think I have said all that I desire to say upon this question. Summarizing my views, I regard this matter as one of very grave importance. I look upon the substitute offered to us by the Government for the proviso contained in the clause as it now stands as a ridiculously inefficient one.

Mr. WEBSTER.—It is a very practical substitute nevertheless.

Mr. McCAY.—It is practical provided that it means nothing. If the Government proposal means anything substantial, it would be just as difficult for an industrial union to comply with it as it would be to comply with my amendment. But, inasmuch as it has no definite meaning, it may as well be eliminated. It is no limitation at all.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It is as definite as the phrase "equity and good conscience."

Mr. McCAY.—Exactly. The proposal offered to us represents a mere husk or shell, whereas my amendment is definite and workable, and should, therefore, be adhered to. I venture to hold that opinion notwithstanding the cracking of any number of whips, and notwithstanding any subsequent announcement which may be made.

the Government concerning their attitude towards the amendment I am about to put before the House. I move—

That clause 48 be omitted from the clauses proposed to be recommended.

Mr. WATSON (Bland—Treasurer).—It seems to me that the honorable and learned member has adopted a rather unusual course in this instance. During the whole of my parliamentary experience I do not recollect a single case in which a proposal on the part of any Government to have a clause of any measure reconsidered in Committee has been resisted. I do not remember one instance in which an attempt has been made to burke the discussion which must ensue in Committee, and to prevent any possibility of a settlement being arrived at. The honorable and learned member has declared that there are two distinct alternatives before the House, and that, therefore, no injury can result from taking a vote upon the Government proposal to recommit the Bill. But he is perfectly aware that those who stand apart from the interests of the Government, and from the interests of honorable members occupying the front Opposition benches, are actuated by a still higher consideration, if they believe in this Bill, namely, a desire to get it out of hand at the earliest possible moment, in a shape which will give effect to its purposes. I know that a number of honorable members opposite do not sympathize with those objects. On every occasion upon which the honorable and learned member for Corinella has submitted amendments he has had behind him the declared and emphatic opponents of the measure. Of course he has received a whole-souled support from those gentlemen, and in some instances to the detriment of the Bill he has succeeded in obtaining a majority in favour of his proposals.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—What is to prevent the matter from being discussed upon the amendment now before the House?

Mr. WATSON.—With his usual innocence, the honorable and learned member asks, "What is to prevent the question from being discussed?" Of course it can be discussed. But the honorable and learned member knows that there is no possibility of putting forward any further amendment unless we get into Committee. I say, not in the interests of the Government, but of the measure itself, that more anxiety might have been exhibited to afford every honorable member an opportunity of stating his views, and of giving effect to them in a practical way. I repeat that the procedure adopted by the honorable and learned member is a most unusual one. It is true that occasionally Governments, from what they conceive to be the interests of public business, have refused to vote for recommissions. But I reiterate that I do not remember an instance—certainly there has not been one in this Parliament, and I have no recollection of any in the New South Wales Legislature—in which an attempt on the part of the Government to obtain the reconsideration of a proposal in Committee has been resisted in the House. The honorable and learned member spoke of the cracking of the whip. He seemed very much exercised in mind because the Ministry have dared to state that they would regard the carrying of a certain amendment as vital to their existence. I admit that the honorable member was probably disappointed with the attitude of another Ministry which he supported, and which did not regard certain matters as vital to them. One of the criticisms most frequently levelled against the Ministry which he recently supported was that they regarded no proposal as vital until the last moment. Personally, I do not believe in making every question which arises vital to the existence of the Government. But, nevertheless, it must rest with those who are charged with the responsibility of carrying a measure through Parliament to say whether or not they will continue in office if it be altered to such an extent that it does not give effect to the purposes which the electors had in view. If Ministers did not exercise that right they would be unworthy of retaining the positions which they at present hold. The honorable and learned member for Corinella has declared that it was only upon second thoughts that the Government affirmed that his amendment was vital to their existence. In this connexion, I think that the language which I used upon the occasion when that amendment was carried was fairly emphatic. It is true that I did not use the exact phraseology which I afterwards employed. I did not say in so many words that the amendment was a vital one; but I said quite sufficient to indicate how seriously the Government regarded it. I said—

The Government regard the amendment that has just been carried as of very serious import indeed. I feel that it cuts right into the heart of this provision, and therefore it is only proper that the Government should have an opportunity of considering how far it affects the general purposes of the measure, and how far they may ask honorable members to reconsider the decision just given.

Surely those words were serious enough. So far as the cracking of the whip generally is concerned, I desire to say that it has not been cracked by the Government with a view to influencing the votes of honorable members, so much as with a desire to give a distinct intimation that, if we are to take the responsibility of this Bill, it must be passed in something like the shape that we desire. I now say distinctly, that I am not prepared to remain in office and take the responsibility for a measure which, according to my conception, will not be effective, especially if this provision, which, I contend, would be absolutely unworkable, be agreed to. The honorable and learned member for Corinella claimed that a discussion took place on his amendment; but my reply is that the Committee did not discuss it. In a debate extending over three or four days we discussed the general principle of granting preference to unionists, but in hurriedly glancing over the pages of Hansard I have failed to find one reference in that debate to the detailed proposition which the honorable and learned member subsequently moved. Considerable argument took place on the question whether we should be justified in giving the Court power to grant preference to unionists; but there was absolutely no discussion on the point whether, if we gave the Court that power, we should insist on compliance with the terms set forth in the amendment.

Mr. GROOM.—Was the amendment in print when the division took place?

Mr. WATSON. — It was not; and so far as I have been able to ascertain it was not discussed.

Mr. WILSON.—Whose fault was that?

Mr. WATSON.—The fault of honorable members themselves.

Mr. WILSON.—The fault of the Government who were in charge of the business of the Committee.

Mr. WATSON.—We were no more to blame than were other honorable members. The debate had occupied several days, the amendment was submitted at a late hour on the last day of sitting for the week, and there was a general desire to come to a decision. Had I thought that there was the slightest probability of the amendment being carried I should have asked that the matter be further considered, but I gave honorable members credit for possessing clearer insight into the probable work of such a provision. I do not know whether the honorable member for Corinella was referring to the printing of amendment, but the fact that it was printed was not due to any neglect on part of the Government. The printing of proposed amendments is a matter to which the Clerk attends on behalf of honorable members generally.

Mr. WILSON.—No; that is not the point which I had in mind.

Mr. WATSON.—I contend that the honorable and learned member for Corinella's amendment would be absolutely unworkable. I do not say that it would be unworkable in the sense which the honorable and learned member assumed—that it would be impossible to find a unionist in its ranks a majority of the men engaged in the industry to which it related. In the great majority of cases a majority of the men employed in a trade or calling are within the ranks of unions relating to it; but on ground on which I urge that this proposition would be unworkable, is that, in many instances, it would be impossible to give with mathematical precision that which the amendment demands. It would be impossible to prove, in many instances, that a majority of the men engaged in a particular industry were members of a union. Take the case of the Australian Wool Union, to which the honorable and learned member has referred. So far as we have been able to ascertain, in a rough and ready way, a very large majority of the men usually engaged in shearing belong to that union, but who would be able to tell how many were engaged in shearing might be employed in the industry on any given occasion?

Mr. SPENCE.—That is the difficulty.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member for Maranoa has followed, among other callings, that of shearing, and might at any time to resume that occupation. The honorable member for Moira has been a shearer, and he, too, might at any time to take a trip into the back country, to follow once more his old calling. I do not wish to say that, in ascertaining the number of persons engaged in an industry for the purposes of this kind, every man who may have been engaged in shearing at any time, and who, if the fancy seizes him, may at any time become a squatter for an opportunity to earn a sounds at his old calling, shall be included in the count? The practical difficulty in the way of carrying out this provision would be such as to render it absolutely unworkable. Take the case of the wharf labourers. A fluctuation often occurs in the number of men working as wharf labourers, which is dependent not only on the number of ships that come into port and the quantity of cargo which they carry, but on the state of other trades and industries in and around the various ports. For instance, when I spent more time in Sydney than I do now, men used to flock to the water-side for employment when business was slack in the trade which they usually followed. When there was no work obtainable at their ordinary avocations, quarrymen and other manual labourers used to accept employment on the wharfs, and thus supplement their scanty earnings. How would it be possible under the honorable and learned member's provision to compute whether or not the Wharf Labourers' Union actually represented a majority, not of those engaged in the industry, but of those who would be affected by the proposed award? It would be almost impracticable. Another instance may be cited. In many callings children as well as adults would be affected by an award. Boys and girls—apprentices, in some instances, and in others improvers, or boys and girls casually employed in factories—would be affected, and under the honorable member's amendment the Court would have to be satisfied that the majority of those affected approved of the application. It would be possible for an award to affect children by limiting the number of apprentices to be employed in a particular industry. A limitation of the number of apprentices is one of the usual conditions embodied in the awards of the States Courts. It is therefore quite possible that the interests of all children employed in an industry might be affected by an award, and the Court would have to be satisfied, under the honorable and learned member's amendment, that the application for a preference was approved by a majority of the children as well as of the adults concerned. I take it that "satisfied" means that the Court shall be satisfied in the clearest and most unmistakable way that the majority of those affected have approved of the demand for preference.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The honorable member does not object to the provision for a majority?

Mr. WATSON.—No; the practice in nearly every case, in all the Arbitration Courts, has been to grant a preference only when the majority, reasonably ascertained, is in favour of such a preference. I am not so foolish as to anticipate that the practice laid down by the Arbitration Courts of New Zealand and New South Wales will be departed from by the Judge appointed to the Federal tribunal. Any one who imagines that the Judge in the Federal Court would lay down a new line of procedure—that he would grant preferences to unions which manifestly represented only a minority of those employed in the industry or in the district in respect of which the preference was asked—cannot have paid any attention to the general procedure under legislation of this kind. I contend that the objection to the honorable and learned member for Corinella's amendment, as a detail of preference—not as affecting preference as a principle—is that it would be absolutely impossible in a great number of cases to prove that the majority of the industry concerned approved of the application. It does not mean only that a union asks for a preference. It will have to be proved that, allowing for any minority that there may be in the union, a majority of those affected by the award are asking for the preference.

Mr. GROOM.—A majority of both employers and employes.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, a majority of the persons affected by the award.

Mr. McCAY.—The words used are the same as those used elsewhere in the Bill to signify a side.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member's proposal goes further than those engaged in the industry, because there may be others having interests in common.

Mr. McCAY.—That is a phrase of limitation, not of extension.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not know that it is bound to be so interpreted.

Mr. McCAY.—It cannot be interpreted otherwise.

Mr. WATSON.—The intention of the honorable and learned member may be strictly honorable, but we have to consider the phraseology apart from his intention.

Mr. McCAY.—The same phrase occurs elsewhere in the Bill to describe one of two sides.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes; but in quite a different relation. I think that that increases the possibility of the provision proving unworkable. Even assuming that the interpretation of the honorable and learned member is correct, and that the Judges, who occasionally differ, will take the view that he does, we cannot expect the measure to work if, in every case where a preference is applied for, a census of those engaged in the industry must be taken before it can be granted. We might as well take the preference provision out of the Bill altogether, and make that a condition. The Government do not desire that preferences shall be granted to minorities. We have put forward an amendment as an alternative to the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, in which we ask that, before preference is granted, the Court shall be satisfied that the organization substantially represents the industry affected, in point of the numbers and competence of its members.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—What is the meaning of "substantially"?

Mr. WATSON.—We have been told by the leader of one of the Oppositions, whose opinion is backed up by the statement of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, that the word "substantially" is vague, and conveys nothing to the legal mind. The right honorable member for East Sydney, in an interview which is published this morning, speaks of the word "substantially" as if it were an innovation, and had not been heard of before in legal circles. My honorable colleague, the Attorney-General, however, has been good enough to put into my hands two or three instances in which the word "substantially" is used in reference to matters concerning, not merely property, but life and death. Section 470 of the New South Wales Crimes Act of 1900 provides that questions of law may, at the instance of the counsel of an accused person, be reserved for the consideration of the Court of Appeal—

Provided that no conviction or judgment thereon shall be reversed, arrested, or avoided on any case so stated, unless for some substantial wrong or other miscarriage of justice.

There the matter is left to the Court, in the belief that the Judges will exercise reasonable common sense in interpreting the Statutes of the country. The interest at stake may be enormous, because where the Judge does not consider that the wrong done to the accused is substantial, the latter may have to suffer death. Apparently no other course was open to the Legislature than to leave it to the personal discretion of the Court to decide whether a mere technical error had been committed, whether a substantial wrong had been done to the accused. There is a similar provision in section 471 of the same Act. Before writ of error can be ruled out, it is provided that—

No judgment shall be reversed or avoided any error unless some substantial wrong appears to have been done, or some other miscarriage of justice occasioned, by reason of such error.

In the rules of the Supreme Court of England there is another use of the word "substantial." Those rules are drafted and promulgated by the Judges, but the legal members of the House know, by the force of law. Regarding motions for a new trial, the Annual Practice for 1901 says—

A new trial shall not be granted on the ground of misdirection, or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, or because the verdict of the jury was not taken upon a question which the Judge at the trial was not asked to leave them, unless in the opinion of the Court to which the application is made some substantial wrong or miscarriage has been thereby occasioned in the trial.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Is there not a wide distinction between substantial wrong and substantial number?

Mr. MCCAY.—The Courts interpret the word "substantial" very liberally. That does not require a great deal.

Mr. WATSON.—We propose that the Court must be satisfied that the persons applying substantially represent those engaged in the industry. One member of a union cannot be taken to substantially represent the whole body, nor could a dozen men be regarded as substantially representing those employed in a large industry. But if anything approaching a majority apply for a preference, the Judge may reasonably hold that they substantially represent all engaged in the industry.

Mr. GROOM.—The amendment contains the words "substantially in numbers."

Mr. WATSON.—In numbers and competence—not numbers or competence. But requirements are insisted on. The Court, if it followed the precedents which have been created in New South Wales and New Zealand, would be bound to interpret the words as implying a majority. In New Zealand it has been insisted that a majority so far as that can be reasonably ascertained shall be shown to be in favour of the granting of a preference before it can be given. The difference between our proposal and that of the honorable and learned member for Corinella is that, in the one case, the Court might waive the mathematical demonstration of the existence of a majority, while, in the other, it would be bound to insist on it. Under the proposal of the honorable and learned member, the Court could not dispense with rigid proof of the existence of a majority in favour of the granting of a preference, while, under our proposal, if they were reasonably assured of the fact, it would not have to be mathematically demonstrated to them. That is the only difference between the two proposals; but it is of great importance, so far as the practical working of the measure is concerned. The New Zealand Court, early in its existence, was asked, in the case of the Christchurch engineers, to grant a preference to a small union. In delivering judgment the President asked how far the union really represented the great body of men in the trade affected, and, as it was found that the members of the union constituted a minority of those employed in the trade, the preference was refused. I am reminded that the word "really" is practically the same as the word "substantially." The President, in making known the decision of the Court, laid down what, in my opinion, is a very proper rule. He said that each case must stand upon its own merits, and that a claim must, in every case, be carefully scrutinized. He went on further to refer to other conditions which were necessary to safeguard a preference. He said that the union which sought such an advantage must be practically open to every person employed in the trade who desired to join it. That safeguard we have provided for at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, and of the honorable and learned members for Ballarat and Indi. We have amplified the safeguards which exist under the New Zealand and New South Wales legislation. The principle proceeded upon in New South Wales in regard to the granting of preferences has been exactly similar to that adopted in New Zealand. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the New South Wales Court has never granted preference to a union which did not appear to have a majority within the district to which it was to apply.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I will quote instances to the contrary.

Mr. WATSON.—The case of the saddlers has been quoted, but that was afterwards extended by means of the common rule. In the first instance the preference was granted, so far as my memory serves me, for a smaller district. It must be remembered, too, that in New South Wales and New Zealand there is no limitation on the power of the Court to grant preferences. Preference to unionists was, on appeal, held by the Supreme Court of New Zealand not to require any specific wording in the Act, but to be the natural corollary of the main purpose of the measure as originally drafted by Mr. Reeves. It was said by Sir Robert Stout that—

In construing this Act, the aim of the Statute cannot be ignored. It does not, as I have said, propose to provide a means of settling disputes between employers and non-associated workmen. It has created a board in every district, and a Court, to settle disputes between associated workmen on the one side, and associated or single employers on the other.

He went on to say—

I am of opinion that the Court, having power to determine the "status of workmen," and the "class of persons" to be employed, has power to declare that trade unionists shall have a preference over workmen not belonging to a trade union.

It seems to me that Sir Robert Stout there recognised the true principle upon which measures of the kind are based. That is, they seek to insure collective bargaining. That was the beginning of the possibility of effective compulsory arbitration—collective bargaining, and some responsible entity in the shape of a union to assist in the enforcement of the award. Preference has existed for years without arbitration laws amongst those trades, or in those callings where the unions were strong enough to enforce it. In my own trade—wherever I have worked, anyhow—the employés have insisted upon preference to unionists, and have always succeeded in obtaining it. I do not say that that state of affairs has existed in the disorganized country districts, but amongst the men employed in the large centres preference has always been insisted upon. In New South Wales at the present time about fifteen agreements giving preference have been arrived at between employers and employés, without the intervention of the Arbitration Court, except so far as their approval is concerned. Some of these agreements have not yet been approved, because they have not reached that stage, but under these agreements between employer and employé preference has been voluntarily arrived at between the two parties.

Mr. MAUGER.—There was a very important case in England recently.

Mr. WATSON.—Exactly. In all the voluntary Conciliation Courts set up in England preference to unionists is a sine qua non. Without that, it is impossible to even approach collective bargaining.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—That has been achieved without an Arbitration Court.

Mr. WATSON.—Of course, it has. It is no new principle. All we ask is that the Court shall be permitted to grant preference; not that it shall be compelled to allow unionists to debar others from obtaining employment, but that it shall have power, if the circumstances warrant, to grant preference. Now, in New South Wales there is an agreement between the Pastoralists' Union and Machine Shearers' Union.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Is preference granted in that case?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, and that is a case in which the amendment proposed by the Government would have a very beneficial application.

Mr. SPENCE.—That agreement not only gives the preference, but is compulsory.

Mr. WATSON.—The other agreements, under which preference is given, are those entered into between the Master Hairdressers and their employés, the Master Coopers and their journeymen, the Coastal Steam-ship Owners' Association and the Seamen's Union, the Laundrymen and their employés, the Pastrycooks and their employés, the Inter-State Steam-ship Owners' Association and the seamen, the Monumental Masons and their employés, Mort's Dock and Engineering Company and their workmen, the Fresh Food and Ice Company and their employés, some cigar makers and their employés, the Steam Collier Owners' Association and their seamen, the Tug-boat Owners and their employés, and some of the grocers and their assistants. In each of these cases the agreement, granting preference to unionists, has been voluntarily arrived at. I do not wish, at this stage, to say a great deal further upon this matter. As I have said all along, I regard the power of the Court to grant preference to unionists as essential to the successful working of the Bill. I contend that compulsory arbitration will be impossible unless unions are recognised, and they cannot be recognised effectively unless preference is allowable, and is, in most cases, granted. I contend that, without encouraging the unions to register and render themselves amenable to the Act, there is no possibility of bringing the measure to a successful issue. We might as well pass a measure with a view to running a rail to the moon, or something of that description, as expect to successfully work Arbitration Bill without preference to unionists. Unless the unions have encouragement they certainly will not give up their right to strike. This measure proposes to deny them the right to use weapons they now possess, and it offers them nothing in exchange.

Mr. KELLY.—Does it not offer them something, even better than the power to strike—the power to compel preference?

Mr. WATSON.—The power to compel preference is not in itself better than the power to strike; but I say that with preference it is impossible to expect unions to take any interest in compelling the observance of the awards. The honorable member must not run away with the idea, as no doubt his impracticalness leads him to do, that this Bill will always mean help for the employés. It will not. In many cases in New South Wales preference to arbitration has resulted in a deduction of wages.

Mr. KELLY.—And a certain percent of strikes in connexion with such reductions.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not catch the honorable member's allusion. In some cases in New South Wales arbitration has worked to the immediate advantage of unionists, so far as the awards are concerned. I admit that even from the workmen's stand-point, it may be better to work although under conditions involving some injustice, than to go on strike and lose a great deal more. I admit that from the point of view, and especially from the stand-point of the general community, it is better to have an Arbitration Act in force than to run the risk of repeated disturbances of trade. Those honorable members who refuse to intrust the Court with the power with which we are seeking to invest it are straining at a gnat and swallowing the proverbial camel. They would allow the Judge of the Arbitration Court to possibly injure the industries of Australia to such an extent that they would be abolutely crippled. The Court, if it like nder the power the Bill confers, could impose conditions of employment that would cause every employer to shut up his remises and result in every man now employed walking the streets. The Court could do all that, but it is not likely to do it. We do not hear honorable members trying to arouse the country by general references to the excesses which the Judge might commit, by giving decisions which it would be impossible to carry out, but when they think that they can arouse class feeling, when they want to enter upon a class fight, some honorable members are seized with horror and fear at the idea of the enormities that might be perpetrated by a Judge placed in this position. I say, again, that the Judge will have the power, if he is foolish enough to exercise it, to cripple or suspend all the industries of Australia, and yet honorable members strain at giving him the power to grant a preference to unionists where they substantially represent the trade or calling in regard to which a dispute has arisen. That kind of reasoning does not appeal to me, and, as one who has some practical knowledge of the conditions that govern industry, at any rate, in New South Wales, I unhesitatingly say that if the clause is maintained in its present shape, the Bill will prove to be unworkable, and might as well be thrown into the waste-paper basket.

Mr. ROBINSON (Wannon).—I had expected, from the attitude which the Prime Minister first took up in regard to the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, that when honorable members were asked to reconsider their decision, they would be urged to strike out all limitations upon the power of the Court to grant preference. Judging from the statement the Prime Minister made on 24th June, I certainly anticipated that the principle of preference would be regarded as so vital, that any limitation upon it would be resisted.

Mr. WATSON.—I did not say that.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I know that the Prime Minister did not say that; but I think that it might have been fairly inferred, from what he did say, that any limitation, except with regard to the notice to be given to those affected, would be opposed. If the Government had come forward with a straight-out declaration that the principle of preference was essential to the Bill, and that they must have it in an undiluted form, those who are opposed to the Bill would have been moved to admiration. We are not, however, met with any proposal of that kind, but with another of those wishy-washy back-down amendments which are designed to get the Government out of a difficulty. I am not willing to water down the amendment which honorable members adopted after the fullest and freest discussion upon the whole principle of preference. According to Hansard a debate upon that point was commenced on the 21st June, and was continued on the 22nd, 23rd, and 24th of that month.

Mr. WATSON.—Never a word was uttered with regard to the amendment ultimately adopted during the whole of that time.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Honorable members who took the trouble to attend the sittings of the Committee and to listen to the debate, must know full well that an amendment of this nature was foreshadowed, and that it was circulated two days before it was moved.

Mr. WATSON.—Not the amendment that was adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I say that the amendment was circulated before it was submitted to the Committee.

Mr. WATSON.—That is absolutely incorrect so far as the amendment ultimately adopted was concerned.

Mr. ROBINSON.—If the Government had declared that they would not have any limitation placed upon the power of the Court to grant preference, and that they would insist upon having the tribunal left as free as in the case of the Courts of New Zealand and New South Wales, their attitude would have been a courageous one; but I think that the present proposal shows a great want of backbone. The suggestion made by the Government is one which will largely increase the difficulties of the Arbitration Court. What is the meaning of "substantially represent?" The Prime Minister has been good enough to quote a number of text-books in order to show us the difference between his amendment and that adopted at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. He states that under the proviso, as it now stands, it will be necessary to demonstrate to the Court with mathematical accuracy the number of employes affected before preference can be obtained, and he states further that that difficulty will be overcome if the Government suggestion is adopted. I do not consider that the proviso in the Bill demands mathematical demonstration on the part of applicants for preference. It allows the Judge a considerable amount of latitude in arriving at a decision as to whether the applicants represent the majority of those affected. The proviso reads as follows:—

No preference shall be directed to be given unless the application for such preference is in the opinion of the Court approved by a majority of those affected by the award.

That means—if it means anything—that a mathematical demonstration is not required. The Court has merely to be satisfied that the union applying for a preference practically represents a majority of the employés engaged in the industry affected. We have been told that an Arbitration Act will not work satisfactorily in the absence of a provision relating to the granting of a preference. How is it that in the first State in the Commonwealth which adopted legislation of this character—I refer to Western Australia—an Arbitration Act has been operating successfully for a number of years, although it does not contain any such provision?

Mr. CARPENTER.—They are continually agitating for the granting of a preference there.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That may be so. The fact remains that in Western Australia the Act has been operating for five years longer than has kindred legislation in any other State of the Union, without any friction having been engendered.

Mr. CARPENTER.—No.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am aware that a considerable amount of friction arises when after an award has been given against a union, its members commence to abuse the Court.

Mr. KELLY.—That is what occurred in the case of the Australian Workers' Union.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The Prime Minister asserted that it was the practice of the New South Wales Court before granting a preference to unionists to insist that the union asking for preference comprises a majority of those engaged in the industry affected. I think that I shall be able to prove that his statement is inaccurate. Let me point to the case of the Broken Hill miners as an example. I used the same argument upon a previous occasion, but in view of the declaration of the Prime Minister, I think I am justified in repeating it. In the case to which I refer, a record of which appears in volume 2 of the Reports of the New South Wales Arbitration Court, page 456, I find that the following statement was made by Mr. Cruickshank, and in another part of the same volume Mr. Justice Cohen reiterates it—

There are about 6,000 men employed in or at the Broken Hill mines; 4,000 are non-union and 2,000 are members of the union.

Mr. WATSON.—But they were not miners?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Two thousand miners asked for a preference, which was granted to them by the Court.

Mr. WATSON.—That is not an instance in which a minority were granted a preference. There are not 6,000 miners at Broken Hill.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The Prime Minister has the report before him, and he can verify my statements for himself.

Mr. WATSON.—The Amalgamated Miners' Association asked for a preference on behalf of the miners, and not on behalf of all the employés.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The statement made by Mr. Cruickshank, and repeated by Mr. Justice Cohen, that out of a total of 6,000 employés at the Broken Hill mines, 2,000 asked for a preference, and obtained it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does that preference cover the whole of the 6,000 employés? That is the point.

Mr. WATSON.—No.

Mr. ROBINSON.—If the Prime Minister will peruse the report in question, it will come to the same conclusion that I have. The next instance to which I will refer is the honorable gentleman is that of the Saddlers' Union. In that case, the New South Wales Saddlers' and Harness Makers' Society were the claimants, and the Wholesale Saddlers' and Harness Manufacturing Association the respondents. The case came on for hearing upon 3rd March 1903. The Saddlers' Union claimed that a certain award should be made a common rule throughout the whole of New South Wales. The number of employés engaged in that industry has been variously estimated. The secretary of the Saddlers' Union thought that there were about 1,200 saddlers and harness employés in New South Wales, but added that he would not be surprised if they numbered 1,800. On the other hand, the secretary of the Employers' Association affirmed that the employés numbered about 2,000. For the sake of argument, we may fairly adopt the mean between the two estimates, and set down the number of those engaged in the industry at 1,600. This particular union, I repeat, asked that a preference should be extended to its members. The secretary of the Employés Union was questioned as to how many men constituted it. Under cross-examination by Mr. Garand, he said—

He could not say how many members had paid their weekly subscriptions. There were very few. He had the information in his books. There were 113 altogether, including collar-makers. About 170 had not paid their dues.

In other words, 213 employés asked that a preference should be extended to them in a trade employing 1,600 workers, and of that 213, only about 40 were genuine financial members of the union. This particular union contained only five members outside the metropolitan area, and under the terms of the award, these men received a preference over other workers in that trade in New South Wales. That is an instance of an insignificant minority—a minority comprising only 15 or 16 per cent. of those engaged in the trade—obtaining a preference over the bulk of the workers affected. The amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella is designed to correct that state of affairs. Doubtless, the members of the organization to which I have referred were competent, reliable, and trustworthy in every way. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that a minority obtained a distinct preference over a majority. In the case of the Bread Carters' Union, it was never claimed that its members constituted a majority of those employed in the trade. It was urged that they represented about half of the total number of employés. I have now given three instances—collected at a moment's notice—which serve to show that it is not a fact that a preference has been granted by the New South Wales Arbitration Court only in cases where the industrial organization concerned contained a majority, or about a majority, of those engaged in the particular trade affected. In actual practice, a similar provision has operated in the direction of a preference being granted to organizations demanding it. The reason for that was made very clear by the Prime Minister himself. The New South Wales Arbitration Act was designed to accomplish a number of objects. One of these was to facilitate and encourage the organization of representative bodies of employers and employés. If the provision in that Act, which relates to the granting of a preference to unionists, is not limited in some specific way it must be read in conjunction with section 2. In that State the Court has decided that the provision means that a preference must be granted to organizations demanding it, unless there is some urgent reason why it should not be granted. In the cases to which I have referred, the employés, who represented only a small minority of the trades affected, obtained the preference which they desired. The Prime Minister's statement that the New South Wales Arbitration Court has not extended a preference to unionists, except in trades in which their members constituted a majority, or very nearly a majority, of the employés, is, therefore, not in accord with the reports of the cases heard before that tribunal.

Mr. HUGHES.—Does the honorable and learned member say that that is so in the majority of cases?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I do not. I wish to guard against injustice being done to a minority as well as to a majority. The Minister of External Affairs is familiar with the old saying that "hard cases make bad law." I do not wish hard cases to exist. For these reasons I think that the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella should not be departed from, and that there shall be no preference, unless the union which desires that it shall be granted to its members can show that they constitute a majority of those who will be affected by any award of the Court.

Mr. HUGHES.—A majority of the persons affected by the award? What does affected mean?

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable and learned member for Corinella merely supports the principle of majority rule, which honorable members opposite are supposed to favour. He wishes to insure that, when a preference is granted to a particular union, the members of that organization shall constitute a majority of those engaged in the trade affected. He desires to prevent a minority having the power to demand a preference over a majority in any industrial calling. We were told in one breath that if the Bill does not contain a provision conferring preference upon unionists it will be practically useless. In the next breath we were assured that awards are frequently made in which a preference is not granted. To my mind, those two statements are entirely contradictory. If the Bill is valueless in the absence of a preference clause, how is it that a similar Act has operated successfully in Western Australia? It has also been argued that under this Bill the employes will surrender the only effective weapon which they have hitherto retained, namely, the power to strike. I do not think that statement is altogether accurate. So far as I am able to judge from the cases decided by the New South Wales Arbitration Court, this legislation will merely involve the surrender, on the part of members of industrial organizations, of the power to cease work without giving their employers notice. Upon giving due notice they will be at perfect liberty to discontinue work. The Teralba case proved that up to the hilt. All that is taken from the workers under this Bill is the power to leave their employment without giving their employers due notice. They will still have the power to refuse to work. Under no enactment can we compel men to work against their will.

Mr. SPENCE.—Notice is not required in connexion with a number of industries.

Mr. ROBINSON.—All that the Bill provides is that unionists cannot discontinue their work without giving notice of their intention to do so.

Mr. SPENCE.—They cannot leave at all collectively.

Mr. ROBINSON.—But they can leave individually, and they can all leave upon the same day.

Mr. SPENCE.—No.

Mr. ROBINSON.—In the Teralba case did not the New South Wales Arbitration Court decide that it was powerless to interfere with the strikers, because under the award which had been given no provision had been made that notice should be given by the men before they were at liberty to quit their employment?

Mr. WEBSTER.—That was an omission upon the part of the employers.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It might have been. That decision shows conclusively that the power of the employes to discontinue work is not in the slightest degree infringed by the provisions of this Bill. Consequently unionists have not had struck out of their hands an effective weapon for hampering their employers. They can still refuse to work.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable and learned member knows that they cannot do anything of the sort, because under the Bill the funds of their unions would be liable.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Does the Minister contend that the individual members of a union cannot cease work after giving their employers due notice?

Mr. HUGHES.—I mean to say that when a preference has been granted they must continue to supply the requisite labour.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am not dealing with that point, but with the question whether the power to strike has been taken away from the workers. The Government say that if we pass this Bill without making provision for a preference to unionists, the privilege to strike will be taken away from the workers, without their being given quid pro quo. That which will be taken away from unionists will be practically the power to leave their employment with notice. This Bill does not pretend—no Parliament could pretend—to force a man to work if he did not desire to do so.

Mr. HUGHES.—A union may not take any action calculated to deprive an employer of his labour.

Mr. ROBINSON.—No; but exactly the same result might be secured without the passing of any formal resolution by the union. The honorable and learned member knows that in the case of a lock-out by an employer the position would be totally different. If he closed his factory, or if he shut down his mine, or if he shut down his mill, he would be guilty of an offence.

Mr. WATKINS.—Would he not be able to give notice?

Mr. ROBINSON.—He would; but in shutting down his factory he would at once wreck his industry. An employer can carry his mine or his factory from place to place, just as a worker is able to remove his labour from one district to another. It is not true to say that unionists will be robbed of something which they now possess unless they are given the right to apply for a preference which has therefore no force. The Government have shown that it has not, because they have proved that in some cases a preference is not granted, and admit that it should be granted unless the union claiming it substantially represents the trade affected. Whilst we also see that it has no foundation in fact. I trust that the House will be satisfied by the decision of the Committee, which was arrived at after one of the most vigorous debates to which I have ever listened. Every phase of the preference question has then threshed out. If the Government have decided to make this question a permanent one, it is to be regretted that they do not stand up for their principles in a straightforward and courageous way, instead of attempting another wishy-washy amendment, to er-edge over which weak-kneed members slide from this side of the House to the other.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—Although I listened to the Prime Minister's explanation with that attention which I always give to his utterances, I fail to understand what is meant by the term "substantially represents." The Prime Minister of a democratic country should surely be prepared to regard a majority as the one substantial representation in such a community. If "substantially represents" means practically the same as that which the honorable and learned member for Corinella desires, why should not that honorable and learned member have the credit—if any credit be due—if having put before the House such an acceptable amendment as was carried by a very fair majority about a month ago? If on the other hand, "substantially represents" does not mean representation by majority, it is about time that the Prime Minister of Democratic Australia told Parliament and the country that he desires, in delegating the powers of the Legislature—because we are proposing to delegate our legislative power in regard to industrial matters to an outside tribunal—to take care that the industrial affairs of Australia shall be controlled by a minority of those engaged in each industry. The Government are either seeking to avoid the very awkward fix in which they find themselves, as the result of the statement which they made that they would resign office rather than accept what is already in the Bill—they did not think the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella would be carried, and therefore considered that they would be safe in making a bold declaration of that kind—or else they are endeavouring to secure the government of the industrial affairs of Australia by minorities. I do not think that the people of Australia are quite prepared for anything of the kind. I trust that the House will bear with me while I briefly deal with the reasons underlying the principle of one adult one vote. It is held that the liberty of every person in the community is equally precious to him; and for the reason that a minority might otherwise interfere with the individual liberty of the people, it is considered that every adult should have a vote, or, in other words, a voice in the selection of men to make the laws which are to govern him. In industrial matters we are delegating our authority to the Conciliation and Arbitration Court. We are proposing to place the industrial forces of Australia under the control of a new tribunal; we are proposing to place powers which this House has not attempted, and could not attempt, to exercise, in the hands of an omniscient Court. We are engaged at the same time in framing certain regulations for the guidance of that Court; and in dealing with them we should, as democrats, be very careful to safeguard the individual liberty of persons engaged in all the industrial enterprises of Australia. What is the exact position? We find that the Court will have power to interfere with the liberty of a man employed in a trade by compelling him to join a union of which he has no inclination to become a member. The Court will be able to compel that man, at the peril of his livelihood, under the preference clause, to contribute to the benefit funds of that union, to the upkeep of its secretary and other officers, and to the maintenance of all its machinery. In so far as the Court will have power to interfere with the individual liberty of every worker in Australia, we should for that reason be very careful to see that it shall not be able to impose such a condition, except where those applying for a preference are prepared to show that they represent an absolute majority of the persons who will be affected by the award. That is the position. Either, then, the Government, seeking to avoid an awkward position are asking the House on this slight pretext of an immaterially altered phraseology to, so to speak, "let them off," or they are seeking to impose minority rule in the regulation of all the industrial affairs of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SPENCE.—How can the honorable member say that? In what way will minority rule come in?

Mr. KELLY.—I think that it is fairly clear. The proviso to the clause, as it now stands, reads—

And provided further that no such preference shall be directed to be given unless the application for such preference is in the opinion of the Court approved by a majority of those affected by the award who have interests in common with the applicants.

In other words, in framing rules for the guidance of the Court, we have provided that it shall take care, before acceding an application by an organization for a preference, to ascertain that it represents a majority of those who will be "affected by the award." Let me cite as an illustration the union of domestic servants, which is yet in prospect, and in which the honorable member for Darling will most likely be interested. The honorable member has told us of the power which he holds over that section of society. He has told us that if a union of domestic servants were formed he would be able to work up such an alarming domestic squabble in Melbourne that it would soon become a most serious matter for all Australia, and even develop into an Inter-State dispute. If the honorable member had his choice, that union would be very soon in process of formation. It would commence, I presume, with a membership consisting of the honorable member, and perhaps four or five others.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Is the honorable member a domestic servant?

Mr. KELLY.—No; but his philanthropic spirit would naturally lead him to see that they secured the great benefits of this measure. I hope that I am not hurting the honorable member's feelings.

Mr. SPENCE.—I have none.

Mr. KELLY.—I had often suspected that the honorable member had none, but was not certain about the matter until I received his assurance. The union of domestic servants, consisting, perhaps, of ten or twelve persons, might apply to the Court for a preference.

Mr. SPENCE.—It could not be registered unless it had at least 100 members.

Mr. KELLY.—Then, say that it had a membership of 100. I am sure that the honorable member's personal charms would quickly induce 100 domestic servants to join the union.

Mr. POYNTER.—The honorable member does not say much for the intelligence of the Court, when he suggests that an application for a preference by a union of domestics, consisting of only 100 members, would be granted.

Mr. KELLY.—I am arguing the question simply ad absurdum. The honorable member will have an opportunity later on to deal with it, and will perhaps argue in the same way.

Mr. SPENCE.—I wish to know on what ground the honorable member urges that the Government are attempting to secure minority control.

Mr. KELLY.—I am endeavouring to put before the honorable member my reasons for that belief. I am pointing out that if he were at the head of a union of domestic servants, consisting of 100 members, he would probably go to the Court, and urge that it substantially represented those engaged in the industry, because there was no one else to represent it. Who better could represent the industry than the honorable member himself? I could say that the union did not substantially represent it, when there was one else to speak on its behalf, but with whom the honorable member was associated? He would be able to apply on behalf of the union for a preference.

Mr. SPENCE.—But the Judge would be bound to grant the application, because of what the applicant said.

Mr. KELLY.—I should be very sorry to hear of a Judge doing so; but I am merely putting a supposititious case before the Committee. If under this Bill a union were to go before the Court, and urge that it substantially represented the industry affected, because it was the only representative of it, that would be a very dangerous step towards minority rule.

Mr. SPENCE.—But a Judge would be compelled to grant the application.

Mr. KELLY.—When we come to compare unions, having greater power than the domestic servants' union, with which the honorable member is going to form a union, we find that we are treading on very dangerous ground. A union consisting of 4,000 out of 10,000 persons employed in a particular industry, might apply to the Court, and say, through its representatives, "We are the only union in this industry, and desire a preference." In that case, the Court might grant the request, with the result that 6,000 persons—a majority of the persons employed in the industry—who had no wish to become members of that union, or they would have since have done so, would be compelled to join its ranks, to subscribe to its fund to keep its benevolent account out of the Bankruptcy Court, and to keep the machinery well greased, and in good working order.

Mr. SPENCE.—In what way would they be compelled to join the union?

Mr. KELLY.—I think that I have put my view clearly before the Committee. Although I have no desire to be discourteous, I do not wish to answer the honorable member again and again.

Mr. SPENCE.—There would be no power to compel them to join the union.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member says that we should trust the Court. If he desires to trust the Court, let him do so. But let him first enact that the Court, with finds that there is a majority of those connected with an industry in favour of the granting of a preference, shall then, but not until then, grant preference. Honorable members opposite seem to think that it could be almost impossible to carry into effect that proposal.

Mr. POYNTON.—There is no doubt that I would. I have had over twenty years' experience in organizing, so I ought to know something about the matter.

Mr. KELLY.—In my opinion, the proposal is not unworkable. All that the honorable and learned member for Corinella requires is that no preference shall be directed to be given unless its application is approved by a majority of those "affected by the award." It is not a majority of those engaged in the industry that is required. That, I concede, would be a very different matter.

Mr. SPENCE.—Is not the whole community affected by any award?

Mr. KELLY.—Surely the honorable member can "trust the Court" to exercise a certain degree of common sense in a matter of this kind?

Mr. POYNTON.—Cannot the honorable member for Wentworth trust the Court?

Mr. KELLY.—I believe in trusting the Court throughout, after we have framed rules for its guidance, but my honorable friends opposite will not back me up. I come now to the main objection to the granting of an indiscriminate preference to unionists. In my opinion, trades unions will best achieve the noble objects which they have in view as purely voluntary associations. A trades union which is formed to maintain and increase the standard of efficiency in the trade to which its members belong, to give sick pay and other benefits to its members, and to secure the best exercise of its powers for good, must be purely voluntary. At the present time they are voluntary. No one joins them unless he wishes to do so; and they have grown in strength and usefulness on the voluntary basis. But the moment that that basis is taken from them, they will cease to have as much power for good as they have now, because a union can maintain its standard of efficiency only so long as its members are desirous of assisting in the maintenance of that standard, and can carry out its beneficial projects to advantage only so long as its members desire to make use of them. If men are compelled to join unions, however, they will not have at heart their standards of efficiency, nor will they care about their beneficial projects. In short, if unionism—I speak of trades unionism as opposed to militant unionism—is to remain efficient, and of benefit to the community, as it has been in the past, it should not seek to use the Legislature as a recruiting agency. It seems to me that when it does that, it strikes at the root of its usefulness. It may gain temporary strength thereby, but in the end it must suffer. Quite apart from the question of minority legislation in industrial matters, I hold that compulsory preference to trades unions will strike at the very root of their usefulness.

Mr. WATKINS.—The honorable member has asserted that unions are voluntary concerns; but the decision in the Taff Vale case brought them under the law.

Mr. KELLY.—If the honorable member asks me to express an opinion on that case, I would remind him that I cannot do so without breaking the Standing Order requiring relevance in debate. I hope that some honorable member will follow me who will inform us what "substantially represents" really means. We have yet had no clue to the purpose of the Government in asking us to recommit this particular clause. We have been told that what the Government propose to substitute for it is practically of the same effect.

Mr. WILKS.—If so, I am opposed to it.

Mr. KELLY.—On the other hand, we are told that what the Government propose is something quite different, and that the effect of it would be to initiate minority rule in industrial legislation. I should like to know which contention is right.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member and others will not allow the matter to be discussed.

Mr. KELLY.—We are discussing it now. Honorable members opposite would have allowed the recommitment of the clause to go by default.

Mr. HIGGINS.—In supporting the amendment, honorable members are trying to prevent any change being made in the phraseology of the provision.

Mr. KELLY.—We are trying to compel the Government to show cause for the recommitment of the clause. I do not think that they should be allowed to recommit it, if they propose to substitute for it vague expressions which might mean anything. What does the phrase "substantially represents" mean?

Mr. WILKS.—The Government say that their proposal is “substantially” the same as that of the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. KELLY.—Yes. Therefore, we wish to know why they are so desirous of recommitting the clause. I hold that it is our duty to prevent them from wasting time by a recommittal, unless they can show good reason for asking us to reconsider the clause. There must be some motive underlying their proposal to recommit beyond the desire to substitute for the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corinella one that is substantially the same. Indeed, I cannot conceive that all they wish to do is to filch from him the credit of it. Until the Government tell us conclusively what they intend to propose, and put before us phraseology which is clear and distinct, we should prevent them from wasting time by the reconsideration of this clause in Committee.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—I do not know whether the action of the honorable and learned member for Corinella and others is approved of by the two leaders of the Opposition; but, in reference to the complaint that the recommittal of the clause would lead to a waste of time, I would say that the real waste of time is being committed in discussing twice over a question which need be discussed only once. It must be admitted that every honorable member can, in Committee, address himself to the question which is now being debated, and, if the amendment is rejected, as I think it should be, the present discussion will have to be repeated in Committee. It must not be forgotten that the proposed Court will be very different from the ordinary Courts, and that its methods must be more elastic. The President of the Court will be practically the arbitrator in all industrial disputes which can constitutionally be brought before the tribunal over which he presides. What we have therefore to do is to equip him with ample power, and then to trust him to exercise it properly. The constant changes and evolution in all industrial enterprises are such as no Parliament could effectively deal with. Parliament has not the necessary machinery to overtake these changes, nor the material evidence necessary to provide for them. What is now being proposed is to lay down a hard and fast rule limiting the power of the Judge in regard to a particular set of details. Those who would impose this limitation do not contend that the President of the Court will be destitute of common sense, but, on the other hand, profess to believe that he will do justice, as far as possible.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—But all Acts of Parliament limit the powers of the Judge.

Mr. SPENCE.—Arguments based on the experience gained in ordinary Courts are of little avail in this connexion, because the limitation of the power of the Judge presiding over the Arbitration Court would be contrary to the principle upon which legislation of this kind must be based. The fullest power must be given to settle all disputes, and to deal with all matters of detail. The Judge may very well be left to decide as to whether preference should be granted to those who are applying for it. The Government have practically adopted the Bill brought down by their predecessor. That was generally admitted to be a well-drafted measure, but it contained no provision as that introduced at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. The Government now make a proposal which is intended to clear up a matter dealt with in the amendment referred to. The principle of their proposal is similar to that of the present proviso. I am surprised that honorable members do not recognise the utter impracticability of the proviso as it stands. The honorable and learned member for Corinella has had experience of the working of trades organizations, and he may not be able to forecast the effects of his proposal. That is one of the difficulties with which we have had to deal throughout this measure. Honorable members who have had no experience of the working of trades organizations have proposed amendments which many of us have at once recognised as utterly impracticable. There is no dispute as to the principle embodied in the proviso; the Government proposal is intended solely to render it workable, and I see no reason why the motion to recommit the clause should be rejected to. I am altogether opposed to the proviso as it stands, and I also regard the proposal which the Government propose to submit to the Committee as unnecessary. I take it that the amendment is being brought forward in reference to the opinion expressed by the Committee, and by way of compromise. I hold, however, that such a provision is unnecessary. This is proved by the experience gained in every Arbitration Court which we have had experience. No limitation as that suggested has been proposed.

pon the States' Courts, which have to deal with a very much larger number of organizations than will come within the purview of the Federal tribunal. The federated organizations may be larger than those whose affairs come within the jurisdiction of the States' Courts, but they will be fewer. No limitation, so far as preference is concerned, is placed upon the power of the judges in the States' Courts. Honorable members have frequently urged that we should be guided by experience in all these matters, and I confidently refer them to the records of the States' Arbitration Courts for proof that no evil has arisen from vesting those tribunals with full power to give preference to unionists. I defy honorable members to quote a case in which harm has resulted from vesting the Court with unramelled authority.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The amendment proposed by the Government would limit the power of the Judge very materially.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Government have recognised, as all Governments must, the feeling of the Committee, and they are attempting to put into working form a provision which the Committee passed hastily and without fully understanding it. The proposal was not discussed by the mover or any one else. I should not have allowed such a proposal to pass without debate if I had for one moment supposed that it would be adopted. I thought that it would have been rejected. If it had been discussed, its weakness would have been recognised. Now, the Government desire that we should recommit the Bill, in order that we may insert a workable provision in lieu of the impracticable proviso contained in the Bill. It would be impossible to satisfy the Court that the request for preference was approved by the majority of those who would be affected by the award. The honorable and learned member for Corinella, and other honorable members, have had a great deal to say with regard to the difficulty of interpreting the words "substantially represent," but they have been silent as to the difficulty of deciding as to the number of persons who would be affected by an award. I contend that the words "affected by" are capable of a very wide interpretation. The meaning of the word "substantial" is clear, whereas it will be difficult to interpret the phrase used in the clause as it now stands. Many of the objections raised by honorable members have been based upon the assumption that the awards of the Court will have a very far-reaching effect—that they will affect not only those who are immediately engaged in a dispute, but the community generally. It is possible, therefore, that the Judge may place a very wide interpretation upon the words "affected by." It will be necessary for the unionists who are applying for preference to show the Judge that the majority of those affected are in favour of their claim being granted. If, however, I were asked to present a case for the union, of which I happen to be President, I should not be able to prove that we had the approval of the majority of those affected.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We might believe that we had the approval of a majority, but we were unable to prove it.

Mr. SPENCE.—We might be able to satisfy the Judge that we represented the majority of those engaged in the industry; but how could we prove that we represented the majority of those affected? Shearing work is intermittent in character. The majority of the men work only for about three months of every season; for the rest of the year they are engaged in other occupations. They do not go out shearing every season, and no complete list of those who follow that calling is available. It would be necessary to take a census and to ask every man whether or not he could be classed as a shearer.

Mr. HIGGINS.—How long does a shearer remain a shearer?

Mr. SPENCE.—No one can say. As has been pointed out, the honorable member for Maranoa is a shearer, although probably he has not followed that occupation for many years. I describe myself as a miner, but I have not followed that calling for many years past. The honorable member for Grey is a shearer.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I am a member of the Shearers' Union, and I suppose that I should be classified as a shearer.

Mr. SPENCE.—It would be utterly impracticable to prove that the applicants for preference represented the majority of those affected by the award, because the majority could only be arrived at after the total of those affected had been ascertained. No one could say how many wharf labourers, or how many shearers, there were, and the same thing would apply to many other callings.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It would be necessary to have a roll, and to hold a revision court.

Mr. SPENCE.—Exactly. We should require to compile a list somewhat similar to an electoral roll, and we can understand what trouble would be involved in such a case. It is extraordinary that the honorable and learned member for Corinella should have failed to recognise that his proviso is utterly impracticable. It may be that he knows what the effect would be, namely, that it would be impossible to comply with the condition he has imposed, and that the Court would thus be prevented from giving preference to unionists. The sooner honorable members realize this, and vote straight out against any preference being given to unionists, the better. I should have no hesitation in telling the Judge that the organization to which I belong represented the majority of those who work at shearing, but I could not say that it represented the majority of those who would be affected by his award. When men go out shearing, they pay their union fees for the season during which they are engaged at that class of work, but when they do not go out they become unfinancial, and no further record of them is kept. Similarly, miners pay their union fees when they are working, but not when they are unemployed. If a miner goes away, and engages in some other occupation, he ceases to be a financial member of his union. If the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and those who support him, wish the Court to be prohibited from giving preference, let them say so. I dislike underhand methods of achieving an object. Let honorable members say straight out what they mean. As I still had a certain degree of faith in the honorable and learned member for Corinella, I fully expected that he would have accepted the proposal of the Government, and I am surprised that he should persist in retaining a proviso which would render the Bill entirely inoperative. I think that I can claim to speak with some knowledge of trades unions. I can assure honorable members that a perfect storm of indignation has been aroused by some of the amendments which have already been made in the Bill, and particularly by that which was inserted at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. Although the union with which I am associated has not yet dealt with the matter officially, I know that the feeling which is generally expressed by prominent officers of that and other organizations is opposed to registering under this Bill, and on the ground that in its present form it is utterly useless. Honorable members who have supported these amendments must accept the responsibility of their handiwork. Those who honestly desire to obtain a workable measure must attach some weight to the opinions of experts, who can speak from personal knowledge, and who do not treat the Bill in flippant manner adopted by the honorable member for Wentworth and those who occupy a different station in life. That is a very serious matter to the working man.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—It will be a serious matter to the working man who will find himself unable to obtain employment, because unionists have been awarded preference.

Mr. SPENCE.—Some honorable members who have had no experience of trades unions claim to represent the working man. How can they sustain their claim? They may represent individuals, but they cannot speak for collective bodies of workers. In a matter of this kind, I hold that the opinions of those connected with unions should carry some weight. I know the question of granting a preference to unionists means a very great deal to millions of thousands of employes who are connected with one industry alone.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Does not the proviso apply to which the honorable member belongs, which presents thousands of workers who are members of trades unions?

Mr. SPENCE.—Most certainly it does, simply because the non-members of unions tacitly consent to the proposals of their fellows who can speak collectively. Those who carelessly hold aloof from trades unions are in reality consenting parties to their own class organizations. In connexion I need scarcely remind honorable members that a very large number of those who do not belong to trades organizations are not necessarily non-unionists. There is one point which I desire to impress upon honorable members. The granting of a preference to unionists is not only necessary because it is essential to the work of this measure—a most important consideration in itself—but also because it is desirable to give the workers something like an equal opportunity in the matter of earning their livelihood. So far I have not heard any honorable member object to trades unions as such. It is most extraordinary that the opponents of the preference proposal should attempt to justify their attitude upon the ground that the adoption of that provision would operate unfairly in the case of those who do not choose to join trades unions. We ask that a preference shall be extended to unionists in order that they may be given an equal opportunity to obtain work. In the absence of such a preference they have not an equal opportunity with the non-members of unions of securing employment.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—If the honorable member holds that view, how can he support the proposal of the Government?

Mr. SPENCE.—I can only discuss one question at a time. The proposal of the Government is not before us. The opportunity to discuss it has been denied to us by honorable members opposite. I would point out that a considerable percentage of employers prefer to engage unionists to any other workmen. A large percentage merely seek to obtain the services of men who are able to perform the work for which they are engaged. They do not concern themselves with the question of whether their employes are unionists or otherwise. There is, however, a still larger percentage of employers who will not engage a unionist if they can secure the services of a non-unionist, and who are prepared to offer the latter improved conditions to prevent him from joining a trades organization. Upon the whole, therefore, I maintain that the non-member of a union has an advantage over the unionist in the matter of obtaining employment. The honorable member for Parramatta knows that what I am saying is correct. It is the practice of a number of employers to boycott unionists. To defeat that practice we must offer a preference to them. I need scarcely point out that the non-member of a union makes no sacrifice for the maintenance of fair conditions under which he may earn his livelihood. He leaves the entire burden to be borne by the unionists. The latter not only have to risk their employment, to contribute to the maintenance of trades organizations, which secure for them improved conditions, but, as a matter of fact, they have less chance of obtaining work than have non-members of unions. Consequently, I say that if collective bargaining is to be the basis of this Bill it is necessary that we should extend a preference to unionists. I take it that this legislation has been introduced to provide a remedy for industrial disputes, and to maintain fair conditions between employers and employes. Nothing can be done in the absence of collective bargaining. It is only through industrial organizations that we can promote industrial peace. To my mind the honorable and learned member for Wannon made a most extraordinary statement this afternoon. Seeing that it emanated from a legal luminary, it fairly staggered me. He declared that this Bill contains no provision which will prevent men from leaving their employment, despite the fact that we have all along been assured that under it employes cannot collectively discontinue work. I think that if, under its operation, the honorable and learned member advised a body of men to quit their employment without giving due notice to their employers he would find that he had made a mistake.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Any person can break a law, but the point is that he is liable to punishment for so doing.

Mr. SPENCE.—There is no doubt in my mind that this Bill will prevent strikes by depriving the workmen of power to leave their employment collectively.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Nothing of the kind.

Mr. SPENCE.—Every authority upon the subject entertains a different view from that expressed by the honorable member. As a matter of fact, several of the clauses in this measure declare that when an industrial dispute occurs, the work in the particular industry affected must continue. The men cannot discontinue their employment as a body, because that is a punishable offence. If a dispute arises, they are compelled under the provisions of this Bill to carry on the industry affected until that dispute has been settled.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—When it has been settled, cannot a man leave his employment after having given due notice?

Mr. SPENCE.—I am dealing with the statement of the honorable and learned member for Wannon, who declared that the employes could leave their work in a body. That statement is pure nonsense. In support of his contention he quoted the Teralba case, which has been previously mentioned. I hold that it is necessary to extend a preference to unionists, for the reasons which I have advanced. The amendment which was carried at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, provides that before any such preference shall be granted the consent of a majority of the employes affected by the award of the Court shall be obtained. What does that mean? The furniture trade in Melbourne is practically monopolized by the Chinese. Under the amendment of the honorable and learned member, before a preference could be granted to unionists, it would be necessary to obtain the consent of a large number of the Chinese engaged in that industry, because the European employés constitute a minority. I do not know whether the honorable and learned member for Corinella desires to place the furniture trade exclusively in the hands of Chinese, but that would be the effect of his amendment.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The Chinese engaged in that trade out-number the Europeans by six to one.

Mr. SPENCE.—I believe it is a fact that they immensely out-number the European furniture makers.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—How could a dispute affecting Melbourne alone, be brought under the operation of this Bill?

Mr. SPENCE.—I am surprised that the honorable member for Parramatta should favour such a proposal. He is an old trades unionist, who received his training amongst the staunchest unionists in the world—I refer to the coal miners. He understands something about this matter, and I did not include him in the category of those who voted upon the amendment in ignorance of what its effect would be. Unions relating to the furniture trade are, like most other bodies of a similar kind, rapidly federating, and as soon as that work has been completed Inter-State disputes may readily arise. In that event, if an organization applied to the Court to grant a preference to unionists, it would have to show that it represented a majority of all persons likely to be affected by the award, including the Chinese cabinet-makers of Melbourne and other cities. Then, again, let us consider for a moment what would be the position in regard to seamen. It is admitted that the rejection of certain clauses may render it impossible for certain seamen to come under this Bill; but, upon the passing of the Navigation Bill, vessels on which lascars are employed will be brought under the control of the Court. Consequently, under the clause as it stands, it would be necessary for the Federated Seamen's Union, in applying for a preference, to show that it represented a majority of those to be affected by the award, including lascar seamen. Every one knows that one European sailor can do as much work as can two even three, lascars, yet the latter would have equal voting power. Although they receive only 15s. per month, as against £6 and a month paid to European sailors, they would have equal voting powers under the honorable and learned member's amendment.

Mr. BAMFORD.—As a matter of fact physical weakness of the lascar would lead to an increase in his voting strength, because three lascars are employed to do the work of one ordinary European seaman.

Mr. SPENCE.—Exactly. How would it be possible to obtain their consent to an application? There is no machinery provided in the Bill, nor is any proposal enable effect to be given to the honorable and learned member's amendment. We expect much from the lawyers; but not a legal member of the House has framed a proposal that would enable the opinion of lascar seamen to be ascertained, although such machinery would be necessary to make the provision workable. It would be necessary to prepare a list of the seamen, to put before the Court something which might reasonably be regarded as evidence that the union had the approval of the men. What evidence would the Court require in regard to the position taken up by Chinese cabinet-workers on an application by the furniture trades unions for a preference? The Chinese are most astute, and evade the law to a greater extent than any other section of the community. So with the lascars. The Court would be justified in accepting a mere statement on the part of an officer or an organization, that the lascars had consented to an application for a preference to unionist seamen. It would have to present a statement, compiled from ships' books, showing that a certain number of these men were employed, and that a vote had been taken to ascertain their opinions on the subject. The amendment, which was carried on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, was an attempt to introduce something entirely foreign to the main principle of the Bill, and would be absolutely unworkable. If honorable members desire to wreck the Bill, they will do well to vote for the retention of the clause as it stands; but if, on the other hand, they are honest in their pretensions, that they favour the principle of conciliation and arbitration, they will support the Government proposal. If we provide that an organization, applying for preference, shall show that it substantially represents the majority of persons likely to be affected by the award, the Judge will have a discretionary power. There is a limit to the length to which we, as a party, may go, and I contend that it would be positively wicked for us to accept an amendment which is calculated to seriously impair the working of a clause of the greatest importance to unionists. It is obvious that the Government are endeavouring to meet the wishes of those who say that some limitation to the power to grant a preference is necessary. They have prepared an amendment providing that an organization when applying for a preference shall show that it substantially represents a majority of those to be affected by the award, because they recognise that it would be exceedingly difficult to obtain proof that an application was supported by an absolute majority. They have gone as far as they can be reasonably expected to go, and it is remarkable that honorable members are not prepared at once to accept their proposal. The Government proposition would really carry out the object which the honorable and learned member for Corinella and those who support his amendment have in view. It would go a step further than the arbitration laws of Australia and New Zealand. How much further are we to go? I think that I shall be justified in referring at this stage to incidents associated with an industry in which I am interested, even if it be only to show the need for a measure of this kind. An organization which was characterized by the right honorable member for East Sydney as one that is run in the interests of the employers—I refer to the Machine Shearers' Union—has lately been rather conspicuous. A man whom I know was recently engaged in Melbourne, and was given a list of places in which he would be able to secure employment as a shearer. He was told, however, that before that employment would be forthcoming it would be necessary for him to pay a subscription of 7s. 6d. to the Machine Shearers' Union, and also to lodge a deposit of £1. He complied with these conditions, but after being kept waiting for some time, was told that he could not be given work. At first his demand for a refund of his money was refused, and it was only when he threatened to take legal proceedings that he secured the return of his deposit. The subscription fee of 7s. 6d. has not yet been refunded. This shows that men are compelled to join a certain union, in the interests of employers, in order to obtain employment, and that they are requested to pay a membership fee even before work is obtained for them. The Workers' Union does not lay down any such stipulation. A man is invited to join the Union, but is not asked to at once pay his contribution to it. He is allowed practically to work his shed out before being called on to pay his subscriptions, the desire of the Union being that he shall first have an opportunity to send some money to his family. In the case of the Machine Shearers' Union, however, a man is required to pay his subscription even before work is found for him. The incident to which I have referred shows the necessity for some such Bill as this. By resorting to such a system, the employers may create intolerable conditions. Under the Bill, as it stands, men will be prohibited from organizing a strike; they will be placed in an almost helpless position, and compelled, it may be, to live practically under conditions of slavery. The situation is a very serious one, and no consideration should intervene to prevent us from passing a law which is so urgently required. The Bill is not as perfect as I should like it to be; but, so far as the question of preference is concerned, I am prepared to strain a point, and to accept the Government amendment, because I think it will be workable. It is in keeping with what has been the general practice. On a previous occasion I mentioned that, in granting preferences to unionists, the New Zealand Conciliation and Arbitration Court was guided by the membership of the applicant unions, and that in most cases the unions fairly represented a majority of those engaged in the industry. The honorable and learned member for Wannon was able to cite only three cases dealt with by the New South Wales Arbitration Court in which that was not the position. Much has been said about the case of the Broken Hill miners. One may be easily misled by the figures, however, because the Broken Hill mines employ a number of men who are not actually working underground. I have not before me the details of the application for an award, but I know that the underground miners always play a prominent part in such matters, and when we separate the number actually concerned in the award from those who were not, we find that the union represented a very large proportion of those employed in the mines. I hope that the proposal to limit the discussion of this measure to the House will be rejected. We have reached the final stages, and should have regard to the fact that many thousands of men having families dependent upon them are hoping to secure by the passing of this Bill a certain degree of social justice. That fact should over-ride all other considerations. Whatever may be our view as to who is best fitted to carry on the Government of the Commonwealth, I hold that we should not sacrifice this measure merely because of any party feeling.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Why make a party question of this amendment?

Mr. SPENCE. — Because we have reached a certain stage at which it is necessary to do so. It appears to me that the honorable and learned member for Corinella has made out no case against the Government proposal; he has certainly failed to show that we should refrain from recommitting the clause. It can be better discussed in Committee.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Why?

Mr. SPENCE.—Because in Committee we can make such alterations as may be necessary. When we are in Committee an honorable member is at liberty to bring forward any proposal that specially commends itself to him, and to move that it be carried into effect; but in the House he can make only one speech.

Mr. McWILLIAMS. — That is quite enough.

Mr. SPENCE.—It may be too much for some honorable members, but the practice of dealing with a Bill in Committee is a time-honoured one, which we have copied from the mother of Parliaments. We are able to thresh out all the details of a Bill much more readily in Committee than in the House. The objection has been taken to the provision which the Government wish to substitute for that of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, that its language is not clear; but that defect might be remedied in Committee. I am losing my faith in the honorable and learned member. At the start, I thought he was a friend of the Bill, and I hope that he is not even now entirely an enemy to the measure; but if the clause as amended by him is passed into law, it will ruin the Bill.

Mr. McCAY.—That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. WATSON.—Honorable members opposite know that it will do so, and I hope that the country will know it, too.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Government have been charged with desiring to retain it, but if that charge were true, would I declare this to be a vital issue, suppose that they did not firmly believe that provision would make the measure operative? Can a Labour Ministry ask to place upon the statute-book a measure which they know would be unworkable from the fact that the unions would decline to register under it? The Government are really going further, in suggesting the compromise which has been put forward, than I should feel inclined to go if I were in power. They are trying to meet the objection of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, that evidence should be placed before the Court which would guide it as to the real facts of the case. I know that over and over again unions have come to terms with employers, under which it has been arranged that preference shall be given to their members. I was once secretary to a union which had an arrangement with the employers in a district that no one who was not a member of the union, and had not paid his dues, should be allowed to work in it; and similar arrangements are quite common in American agreements. No one can show that this has caused any harm. The Government are going a long way to meet honorable members opposite in agreeing that a majority of those concerned must be given a preference before it can be granted by the Court; but whereas they are of opinion that the Judge should be satisfied that those applying for the preference substantially represent the majority—and evidence could be given to sustain that position—honorable members opposite wish the existence of the majority to be absolutely proved. I could show that the Austral Workers' Union substantially represents those connected with the shearing and pastoral industry of New South Wales, but could not mathematically prove that it presents a majority of the persons connected with that industry. I appeal to those who wish to see this Bill passed to accept the offer of the Government, and to vote against the amendment to the motion to go into Committee. We cannot hide from ourselves the fact that the Government came into power because of a stand made on one of the clauses of this Bill. A majority supported the position which the members of the Labour Party then took up. Since then, we have navigated the Bill through its Committee stages. Will honorable members ers, therefore, be honest in voting against the proposed recommitment? If they do so, will they not be actuated by the desire to place some other party in power?

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Who threw out the challenge?

Mr. SPENCE.—No challenge has been thrown out; but the Government would be recreant to their duty, and unworthy of support, if they agreed to the passing of a measure which they knew would be worthless. It may be a new feature in the administration of the affairs of the Commonwealth to have a Government which has the courage to take this stand. The Government are prepared to go further than their supporters would like to go, and further than those outside who take an active interest in these matters wish to go. Under the circumstances, it looks as if honorable members opposite were trying to put the Government out of office because they think they will gain popularity for opposing the giving of preference to unionists. Those who honestly desire to make the clause perfect will not vote against the motion for a recommitment. The honorable and learned member for Corinella and others know that the clause could be discussed more freely in Committee than in the House. Does he take up the position that its drafting is absolutely perfect, so that not a letter or word in it should be altered? Either the honorable and learned member and those who support him are afraid of the result of going into Committee, or there is something behind his amendment. It has already been insinuated that the object in view is not that which is ostensible. If so, let it be stated. The Government are open and above-board, and the party which supports them say what they want. Will honorable members opposite sacrifice the interests of the masses outside merely to obtain possession of the Treasury benches? Those who are taking advantage of this opportunity to displace the Government are the enemies of the unions.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—The party to which the honorable member belongs did not hesitate to oust the Deakin Government under similar circumstances.

Mr. SPENCE.—I do not know how many leaders of the Opposition there may be now; but it is a somewhat suspicious circumstance that neither of the two principal leaders have yet spoken on the amendment. Do honorable gentlemen oppose the motion to go into Committee because they think that they can obtain an extra vote if the division is taken with Mr. Speaker in the chair? That has been suggested. It will be a discredit to the Parliament if a measure of this kind, which means so much to thousands of persons outside, is defeated merely to secure the downfall of the Government. I am certain that the present Administration are not afraid to take the chances of defeat, but surely the Bill should not be used as a weapon against them. If we are to have a party fight, let it be an open one. Does the right honorable member for East Sydney think that he can obtain possession of the Treasury benches without moving a motion of censure?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is not now in order.

Mr. SPENCE.—Perhaps I am not, but I think it best to speak plainly, and I cannot help saying that the position is very peculiar. I beseech honorable members to allow this Bill to be got out of the way before the decks are cleared for action. The amendment carried by the honorable and learned member for Corinella was moved immediately after a division had been taken, and very few honorable members really understood it. I believe that copies of it had not been distributed.

Mr. MCCAY.—Yes; it was printed and distributed.

Mr. SPENCE.—I, for one, would certainly have opposed it, for the reason which I have urged against it this afternoon, that it would make the Bill ineffective, had I had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. MCCAY.—The honorable member said that he would accept it.

Mr. SPENCE.—I am willing to go a long way to arrive at a compromise in this matter; but the honorable and learned member appears not to recognise that the Government are trying to make an unworkable and impossible provision capable of application. If he were sincere in his desire to improve the Bill, he would accept the compromise they offer, instead of stirring up a fight under very suspicious circumstances. I challenge the leaders of the Opposition and their lieutenants to say what is meant by their action. The Government have been outspoken. Let us first of all get rid of this Bill, which will give relief to thousands who are in difficulties which are daily becoming worse. Do not let us have a fight over what is merely a paltry lawyers' quibble about words. The clause, as it stands, is unworkable, and the unions would decline to register under it, and thus the securing of industrial peace would be impossible. Let us first pass this measure, and then, if we are to have a fight, let it be on a plain issue.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS (Franklin).—The honorable member for Darling has made a rather unfair charge against the honorable and learned member for Corinella—one which, I think, any honorable member should be very slow to make. He has also stated that those who are voting against the proposal to go into Committee have some ulterior object.

Mr. POYNTON.—Is there any doubt about that?

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Let us consider the exact position.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The object is either to wreck the Bill or to wreck the Government.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is to do both.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member for Bourke voted for one of the amendments of the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I shall vote to keep out of office the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—It is only necessary for us to cast our minds back to another stage in the history of this Bill, when the Deakin Government took a stand upon a principle which they regarded as vital, and told the House that if they were defeated they would resign. Did honorable members opposite then sav to the Deakin Government, "You should not make this a vital question."

Mr. SPENCE.—Yes, certainly we did.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Which did they put first, the fate of the Government, or their own principles?

Mr. SPENCE.—There is no principle involved in the present case.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—There is a great principle.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—The principle of killing the Arbitration Bill is all the honorable member sees in it.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—There is the principle that we, the true representatives of majority rule—

Mr. TUDOR.—Who are the true representatives of majority rule? The honorable member was returned by a smaller vote than any representative in this House.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—The honorable member only got in by accident.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—I am quite prepared to face the electors at any time, and

I think my chances would be quite as good as those of honorable members who are not making such a great fuss, and who are not more afraid than I am to face their constituents.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member will see.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—The late Government took their stand upon one of the principles of the Bill, and regarded it as vital, and the members of the Labour Party voted for their principles and left the Government to take their chance. That is exactly the position which I take up on the present occasion.

Mr. SPENCE.—There is no principle involved as between the Government proposal and the proviso now in the Bill.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Yes, there is. I say that there should be no preference given to unionists unless they represent the majority of those interested in the particular calling affected.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—So do we.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—It has been stated that the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella was printed and distributed. That is not correct, because it was printed and was in the hands of honorable members two days before the vote was taken. I have a copy of the amendment, which is dated 23rd June.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The matter was discussed.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—The whole matter was discussed for nearly a week.

Mr. WATSON.—Not the amendment that was adopted.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—What is the result of our quibbling over this small point? The debate ranged over the question as to whether preference should be given absolutely, or only when the applicant represented a majority of those engaged in the industry affected. We are now called upon to consider first the proper method of procedure to be adopted, and, second, the conditions under which preference should be given to unionists. It has been urged that we should go into Committee to reconsider clause 48, but I think that the arguments which have been adduced point to the desirability of our fighting the matter out in the House. The proviso inserted in the Bill was discussed for nearly a week—not perhaps exactly in its present form.

Mr. WATSON.—Not even the principle of it.

Mr. McWILLIAMS. — The principle discussed was whether preference should be given to unionists, unless they represented the majority of those affected by the award.

Mr. WATSON.—Not a word was said with regard to that during the debate. The honorable member is utterly mistaken.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The question we discussed was whether preference should be given to unionists.

Mr. WATSON.—The debate took place upon the question whether or not any preference should be given.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The Prime Minister was present, and agreed to the procedure adopted when the proviso was inserted. The House was thoroughly tired out by the discussion that had taken place, and honorable members deliberately agreed to go to a division upon the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. Now a straight issue is before the House.

Mr. WATSON.—To take the business out of the hands of the Government—that is the only issue there is.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Who made this a vital issue? Honorable members on this side of the chamber did not do so.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Then why should they seek to take the business out of the hands of the Government?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—As I have already pointed out, an exactly similar set of circumstances was presented to us when the Deakin Ministry stated that they would resign if a certain amendment were carried against them. That amendment was moved by an honorable member who is now a member of the Ministry. Now the Prime Minister takes up a precisely similar attitude, and has made a vital question of the matter once before us. Is that any reason why those who supported the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella should now change their attitude?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We can discuss that in Committee.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—But why should we go into Committee?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Why not?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Ministers know as well as any one else that when a Government make a matter one of vital importance it is infinitely better that the issue should be fought out in the House, rather than in Committee. What is the object of going into Committee? The honorable member or Darling has stated that some of us do not desire to hear other honorable members speak. I am always glad to hear the honorable member for Darling speak on the subject of trades unionism, because that is a subject with which he is thoroughly acquainted. On questions of principle we may differ from the honorable member, but upon matters which can be thoroughly understood only by those who have had practical experience, we must attach great weight to his views.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member takes good care not to follow him.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I shall certainly not follow him on this occasion. If the honorable member votes as he speaks he cannot support the amendment suggested by the Government. There is no necessity to go into Committee, because it will be perfectly in order for honorable members, to discuss, upon the motion now before us, the merits of the alternative proposals of the Government and of the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. TUDOR.—But we cannot vary either proposal. We cannot even debate the amendment of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I may inform honorable members that the question now before the House is whether clause 48 should be recommitted, in order that the proviso which it now contains may be replaced by another which is to be proposed by the Government. Therefore, the two matters may be debated.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—No fairer issue could be placed before honorable members, and there is no reason why a full discussion should not take place at this stage. If the majority of honorable members are in favour of the Government proposal, they can show their preference by voting for the motion for the recommitment of the Bill.

Mr. THOMAS.—It would be better to go to the country and have it out at once.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I agree with the honorable member. The threat of a dissolution frightens me no more than it does my honorable friend. A full discussion at this stage, instead of in Committee, will probably result in a saving of time. We have been here for upwards of five months, and during nearly the whole of that time we have been occupied with this Bill. Therefore, it cannot be said that the measure has not received sufficient consideration, or that any attempt has been made to restrict discussion. If we went into Committee the debate would become very much more irregular than would be possible if it were conducted in the House. Surely there is no honorable member who desires to speak three times upon the subject, or who wishes to listen to others speaking three times upon it! It is idle to affirm that we should deal with the proposal of the Government in Committee on the ground that we may wish to amend it. The issue before us is, whether we shall deliberately reverse the vote which was previously arrived at in Committee by substituting the Government proposal for the amendment which was then carried at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. No clearer cut issue could be placed before the House. Ministers have declared that there is another object behind our action—that we wish to defeat the Government.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member does not believe that, does he?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—If a straight-out division had been taken upon this matter I think that the majority of honorable members know how my vote would have been cast. If Ministers had not made it a test question I should still have voted precisely as I intend to do. I am sure that it is not for the Minister of Trade and Customs to say that we should alter our decision because the Government have chosen to make the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella vital to their existence, seeing that it was upon his initiative that the Deakin Government were defeated, under precisely similar conditions. Upon the question of procedure, therefore, no stable complaint can be made that we are taking up a position which is either unfair or untenable. If this is to be regarded as a vital question by the Ministry—if they stake their existence upon the proposal which they have framed—

Mr. WATSON.—I should think that we ought to stake our existence upon a matter which involves taking the business of the House out of our hands.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—In reality the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella is responsible for the fate of the Government being in the balance. When that amendment was carried it was generally understood that Ministers could not accept it in its present form. Nobody can blame them for that determination. I think that they have adopted a very proper and straightforward course. Nevertheless, they have no right to ask any honorable member who supported that amendment to reverse his vote for no other reason than that they have chosen to stake their Minister's existence upon it.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member has overlooked the fact that on the previous occasion there was no time to discuss the matter.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I remarked just now, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Customs, that, with the consent of the Government, a division was taken upon the amendment because every honorable member was heartily sick of the subject which we had been so long debating. The real question which is involved is whether a preference should be granted to unionists unless it can be shown that they represent a majority of those interested in the particular trade affected by any award of the Court. In this matter I claim that honorable members upon this side of the House represent a majority rule to a greater extent than do those who support the watered amendment that has been drafted by the Government. Even if that proposal had been contained in the Bill as it was originally introduced, it should not have been accepted. There are few words in the English language which have a more indefinite meaning than the word "substantial." During the course of this debate we have heard various constructions placed upon it by honorable members. What does it mean in the way in which it is proposed to apply it?

Mr. PAGE.—What does the honorable member think that it means?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I believe that it is a ladder which has been placed against a tree for the purpose of allowing Ministers to gracefully climb down.

Mr. PAGE.—Fancy that.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I am prepared to admit that Ministers believe that a very material difference exists between their proposal and the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. If the two proposals were placed side by side the difference between them would be found to consist in the substitution of the word "majority" for the words "substantially represents." Is the House prepared to grant a preference to unionists where the latter do not constitute a majority of those interested in the particular trade affected by the award of the Court? I gathered from the Prime Minister's speech, and from an interjection which he made, that he does not desire a preference to be extended to unionists if a majority of those engaged in the industry affected are not in favour of such a preference. If that be so, what is his objection to the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella? It has been argued that it will be impossible to prove to the Court that a union represents a majority of those interested in any industry affected by an award of the Court. To my mind, the onus of proof should rest upon those who claim this preference, and not upon those against whom it is to be used. The Prime Minister declared that the word "substantial" is used in more important measures than this. Upon the present occasion there are two issues at stake, which are of far greater importance than that to which the word "substantial" is intended to be applied. Under existing conditions, to the man who has no money, no influence, and very few friends, the question of whether or not every door of industry shall be open to him may be one not only of importance to himself, but may even involve the necessities of life in the case of his wife and his children.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Nobody wishes to close the door of industry against him.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Then, why do the supporters of the Government wish to compel men to join trades unions?

Mr. WEBSTER.—That is what honorable members upon the Opposition side of the House proposed.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I am not in favour of compelling any man to join a trades union, or to relinquish his connexion with one. I claim that the question of whether or not a man should belong to any particular church or political party should be one for himself to determine, and the same consideration should apply to trades unions. I have no sympathy whatever with the new radicalism which seeks to coerce men. The honorable member for Darling assured us this afternoon that the provisions of this Bill would prevent men from leaving their employment after an award had been made by the Court.

Mr. SPENCE.—I said that it would prevent them from collectively leaving their employment.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I think that the honorable member is in error, because I do not believe that a majority of this House or of any British Parliament would sanction a proposal to reduce the workers to a condition of slavery. If we say to a man, "Unless you join a trades union you may or may not be able to obtain work, but if you join one you must comply with the conditions which are laid down by the Arbitration Court, even to the extent of accepting the rate of wages awarded by it, although you may be worth more," I claim that we are reducing him to a condition of absolute slavery.

Mr. McDONALD.—In the district which is represented by the honorable member there are no unions, and the workers there receive the lowest wages paid in any part of Australia. I had a letter upon the subject no later than yesterday.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I can quite understand that the right honorable member may receive a number of letters from any part of Australia. When he declares that the wages paid in the district which I have the honour to represent, are the lowest received in any part of Australia, he is making a statement which is absolutely unwarrantable, and which lacks even the slightest foundation. It is, indeed, extraordinary that certain honorable members are never so emphatic as when they are speaking upon a matter of which they know absolutely nothing. If the honorable member for Kennedy would visit the district which I represent, he would discover that a great number of the residents there—a majority, indeed—own their little homes, which they have purchased out of their savings.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—What wages are paid in the printing trade there?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I do not know.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—What do they pay in the apple trade?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I have not the slightest idea of what they would pay the honorable member, but, really good men can earn really good wages. I repeat that if the new Radicalism means that men before being at liberty to work, shall join unions, and that, having joined them, they shall absolutely accept the rate fixed by an Arbitration Court, and abstain from leaving their employ, it is really nothing but absolute slavery.

Mr. McDONALD.—Then, why does the honorable member support anything of the kind?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I have done my utmost to oppose the Bill, by voting against it on every division.

Mr. FISHER.—Hear, hear; that is an honest position to take up.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Whatever others may have done, I have never hidden my views from the House, and I claim that the attitude which I take up in regard to the question of granting a preference to unionists represents the truest democratic principle that has ever been applied—the principle of majority rule. What is the effect of the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corinella? It says to unionists applying for a preference, "If you can show that the majority approve of your application, your request will be complied with." I clearly put my position before the House, and should like some of those who have been interjecting, and particularly the honorable member for Kennedy, and the honorable member for Hindmarsh, to say whether they desire that a preference shall be granted to unionists, whether they represent a majority of those engaged in an industry or not.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We shall put our views before the House in due time.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—There is a very straight issue before us. Honorable members opposite may hide it as they like; they may flog the dissolution horse as long as they please, and Ministers make stake their existence on the proposition which they put before us, but the real issue before the House is whether a preference shall be granted, independently of whether the trades union concerned is able to show that the majority of those to be affected by the award are in favour of the granting of that preference.

Mr. FISHER.—Does the honorable member contend that the honorable and learned member for Corinella's amendment provides a practical scheme to ascertain whether an application is supported by a majority?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Can any one seriously say that the Government proposal is a practical scheme?

Mr. FISHER.—Yes.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The Government are delegating the power of this Parliament to make certain laws to a Judge of the Conciliation and Arbitration Court. What would be the definition of "substantially represents"? Three Judges of equal intelligence might place a different interpretation upon the term.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The same may be said of provisions in various Acts of Parliament.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—On questions of absolute law we may get Judges to agree; but the word "substantially" is one of the vaguest to be found in the English language. I gather from the Prime Minister's speech that he considers that the term "substantially represents" means that the applicants must show that they represent a majority. The honorable member for Darling on the other hand, said that five-sixths of the cabinet-makers of Australia are Chinese, and that as they would out-vote the remaining one-sixth it would be wrong to insist upon a majority vote. He referred to the position in regard to Chinese cabinet makers and to lascar seamen as showing how unwise it would be to insist upon the consequence of an absolute majority being obtained.

Mr. WEBSTER.—For which class of cabinet-makers is the honorable gentleman fighting?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I am not fighting for either cabinet-makers or Capitalist breakers. I am fighting in the interest of the whole community. The honorable member for Darling instanced the case of the Chinese furniture makers, and said it would be impossible to induce them to vote for the granting of a preference.

Mr. WEBSTER.—He said that we should not be able to ascertain their number.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The honorable member for Darling is now present, and feel satisfied that he will bear out my statement. He also pointed out that lascar seamen would be able to out-vote the white competitors, and that it would be not only unfair, but impossible, to take the vote on the question of preference as against that of their white competitors.

Mr. McDONALD.—Would the honorable member take it?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—No; I should not give them the right to vote. If I had no way not one of them would be in the country. We have had as many definitions of the words "substantially represents" as there have been speakers in support of the Government amendment. The Prime Minister claims that they mean that the vote shall be a majority, and says that he would not allow the provision to apply to a union which had not a majority of those employed in the industry; while other speakers who support the Government amendment have pointed out that it would be unfair to compel an organization to endeavour to secure a majority. I, therefore, think that nothing has been adduced that would warrant the House in deliberately altering the vote at which we arrived some days ago. I think I have fairly shown that it is very much better for us to fight the straight issue before us—one amendment against another—in the House itself. The can be no suggestion of the application of the gag, because it is open to every honorable member to carefully compare the two amendments, and for the House to determine the question, after we have thoroughly discussed the subject. If we go into Committee, I shall take it that honorable members are prepared to accept the Government amendment. If honorable members are prepared to support the amendment carried on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, I take it that they will vote that the Bill be not recommitted. The issue is so clear that honorable members opposite have certainly no right to complain that we propose to vote against the motion merely because we desire to put them out of office.

Mr. FISHER.—We say that honorable members opposite are adopting a course that must prevent the proper discussion of our proposal.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The honorable member will be at liberty to discuss it in the House for two or three hours, and I shall have much pleasure in listening to him. But that is not the point. We have had the Bill under consideration for something like five months, and I think that it has been sufficiently discussed. The Government have now made this question a vital one. They were beaten on a fair-and-square fight.

Mr. McDONALD.—No.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I trust that honorable members opposite will not say that there was anything unfair associated with their defeat.

Mr. FISHER.—Honorable members did not understand the true purport of the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—If the Minister of Customs thought that the Committee did not understand it, I fail to see why he should have consented to a division being taken before the matter had been thoroughly discussed. I think, however, that the House now thoroughly understands that amendment, as well as the Government proposal, and that no good purpose would be served by allowing the Bill to be once more considered in Committee, where the debate would necessarily be more protracted, and where the issue would not be so clearly defined as it would in the House itself.

Mr. HUTCHISON (Hindmarsh).—It is useless to beat about the bush. The honorable and learned member for Corinella is plainly averse to the granting of a preference to unionists, but feels that he dare not openly say so. He would not have moved the amendment which is now under discussion if that were not the case. Being afraid to vote against granting a preference to unionists, what did he do? He said—"I shall move an amendment which will have the effect of rendering it impossible for a preference to be given to unionists." The fact of the matter is, that the honorable member's desire is to give a preference to the right honorable member for East Sydney in regard to the Treasury benches. I do not like the Government amendment, and I feel sure that the shearers of Australia will not regard it favorably.

Mr. WILKS.—If the honorable member were on this side he would vote against it.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—No. While I do not care for the Government proposal, I certainly care very much less for the honorable and learned member for Corinella's amendment. The Government proposal is an endeavour to induce the House to arrive at a decision that will enable a preference to be given in certain circumstances to unionists. It would be open to the Court to grant a preference, even if there were no reference to the matter in the Bill. The Conciliation and Arbitration Court of New Zealand granted a preference to unionists, although that matter at first was not dealt with in the Act on which it is based, and it required nothing but very ordinary data to satisfy it that applicants for a preference represented a substantial majority of those to whom the award would apply. Unless a majority were substantially represented by the organization making the application for a preference, I am sure that the Judge would not grant it, and that the House does not desire that he should have power to do so, in the absence of that condition. The honorable member for Franklin says that if we do not agree to the honorable and learned member for Corinella's amendment — if we do not agree to the clause as it stands — non-unionists will not be able to obtain work. Has a more ridiculous suggestion ever been made? The passing of this Bill will not lead to one individual being employed in excess of the number at present at work. But the honorable member for Franklin and those who think with him are asking the unionists to give up the only power they possess to secure fair wages and fair conditions, in order that non-unionists may in future have a preference.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I have never asked for that.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—But it is that for which the honorable member intends to vote. The shearers, as well as the water-side workers and seamen, would not, I am sure, be favorable to an amendment such as that which was recently carried. It was only another means to destroy the Bill. Let the Bill be destroyed, and we shall know at once that the honorable and learned member for Corinella's amendment was designed to turn out the Government, and to wreck the measure at the same time. The right honorable member for East Sydney says that he would not destroy the Bill. Of course he would not. He wishes to hoodwink the public by making them believe that he is in favour of the principle of arbitration. That is the attitude which has always been taken up by those opposed to industrial legislation, whether in this House or in the States Parliaments. They are always anxious to make the public believe that they are in favour of something with which they really have no sympathy. What care they for the conditions of the workers as long as they can have the Government of the country in their own hands? What earnestness of purpose is shown by honorable members who merely seek to secure seats on the Treasury benches? The right honorable member for East Sydney, who is anxious to become the leader of this House, held office as Premier of New South Wales for five or six years, but I am not aware of even one industrial measure that was passed by him during that period.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That remark shows how fair the honorable member is.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I ask the honorable member to mention one industrial measure that was passed by the New South Wales Parliament while the right honorable member for East Sydney was Premier of that State.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I would not pretend to enlighten the honorable member's absolute ignorance.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I challenge the honorable member, who was a member of the right honorable member for East Sydney's Ministry, to name a single industrial measure which was carried by it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Members of the honorable member's party have enumerated them time after time.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I shall ask honorable members to look at the amendment which was submitted by the honorable and learned member for Corinella. The honorable and learned member for Corinella has pretended that he is in favor of giving preference to unionists, and yet he has carried an amendment which will prevent the giving of effect to that principle. Why did he not tell us how the views of all those engaged in an industry could be obtained? I have been a member and an officer of the Shearers' Union for many years, though I am not a shearer by occupation. I should like to know how I would be classed under the honorable and learned member's provision. Should I be allowed to vote? Will the question have to go before the Court, and be thrashed out there, before it can be ascertained who should and who should not vote? At the present time it takes many months to get a ballot of the members of the union.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member would feel aggrieved if his vote did not count.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Yes; but I would feel more aggrieved if a unionist did not get a preference against a non-unionist who was sacrificing nothing. The Bill was introduced, not because non-unionists have stood up for fair conditions and good wages, and have been the cause of strikes, but because the unionists have demanded what they believe to be just and reasonable. It is the unionists to whom preference should be given, because it is they alone who are making concessions. There has been no greater opponent of strikes than I have been. I had something to do with the prevention of a strike in the shearing industry two years ago. That strike was settled voluntarily, but the result was that next year a dispute was inevitable, through the refusal of the pastoralists to negotiate, and then we won all along the line. I am sure the honorable members think that I would counsel the unionists to give up the only weapon they possess, in the power to strike, if they are to get nothing in return?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Does the honorable member suggest that the non-unionists should starve?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—No one who is not now starving will starve under the Bill. If the Bill is amended, as the Government wish to amend it, some of the who are being badly treated now will receive what a properly constituted Court will decide are fair conditions and fair wages. Every one who opposes the Bill opposes the granting of fair conditions to a large number of workers. The unionists have never asked for advantages in which the non-unionists have not shared. I, myself, have been boycotted for standing up for my just rights. It is the unionists who suffer in every case; but hundreds and thousands of non-unionists have benefited by their action in standing up for their rights. Throughout the world the worst paid labour is that of the unorganized workers. This is not a Bill for them. Who are fighting for the unorganized workers? Is it those who are opposing the Bill? No. What are they doing for them? The unionists however, are working as hard in the interests of the non-unionists as in their own interests. The honorable member for Franklin asked what is the object of going into Committee. It has been said that we can discuss the matter in the House; but what is the use of discussing it if a majority is ready to prevent the clause from being recommitted, and a vote taken on the Government's amendment? The issue is not the improvement of the clause, but the wrecking of the measure. Free-traders and protectionists are combined to defeat the Labour Party.

Mr. McCAY.—And other free-traders and protectionists are combined in the Labour Party.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We are not afraid to face the country under present conditions. It is always recognised that the Government in power have the right to conduct the business of the country, and I have never seen a more shameful attempt to take the business out of the hands of Ministers than that which is being made to-night. If honorable members think that they have a majority against a reasonable amendment—an amendment with which I have very little sympathy—why do not they consent to the recommitment, and vote against it in Committee? The Government are going as far as they can in order that the Bill may have a trial. They are prepared to allow the Court to decide what is a substantial number. Why should it be necessary to have the consent of a majority of all concerned? If the majority of workers in a trade are suffering from bad conditions, why should a minority be debarred from going to the Court, and asking for what is fair and just, both for themselves and for every other member of their industry? That is the question which we could discuss if honorable members would allow the Bill to be re-committed. Those who oppose the motion for recommitment are not considering the workers at all.

Mr. CONROY.—The unionists only represent one out of every seven of the workers.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The honorable and learned member is quite wrong. But even if the unionists did represent only one out of every seven of the workers, the Court would not give a unionist anything which would not benefit the six non-unionists. The honorable member for Franklin either did not know, or was afraid to quote, the wages paid in many trades in Tasmania. He spoke of the clause as an attempt to reduce the workers to slavery; but does he know how some of them live? If he does not, let him read such works as the People of the Abyss, by Jack London, or Charles Booth's work on London, and Rowntree's work on York. The statements therein contained are unchallengeable, and, unfortunately, they are fast becoming applicable to the Commonwealth. Two years ago it was found necessary in Adelaide for the unionists to collect funds for distribution, not only amongst those out of employment, but amongst those in employment, who were being sweated. That sweating still continues.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The question before the Chair is whether particular clauses should be recommitted.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I am trying to give general reasons for the recommitment. There is intense suffering among the workers in every State which does not possess arbitration laws. It has never been shown that preference has done harm. In this connexion I would like to read an opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Cohen, of the New South Wales Arbitration Court, who has had experience on the subject which we have not had, and is, therefore, able to speak with authority in regard to it. No one will question his impartiality. He is reported to have said—

He had no leaning one way or the other, but in the public interest it would be far better, if the preference clause was being unduly used as a means of oppressing or harassing employers, that the Court should be assisted by evidence of that. From the general statements he saw in the press this preference clause was stated to be a means of harassing the employer and placing him in an unfair position of working his business. It would be much better if the Court were enlightened by evidence of these things they read of. General assertions were made with regard to what the Court had done which would not bear any test. They were absolutely without any foundation.

Mr. Justice Cohen has had more experience of legislation of this kind than any one else in the Commonwealth has had.

Mr. KELLY.—If his remarks had been directed against the Bill the honorable gentleman would have called him a political Judge.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I should have said that he was lacking in experience, or was prejudiced. No Judge who had had experience of the working of legislation of this kind would be guilty of such statements.

Mr. CONROY.—No doubt the honorable member thinks that he would cease to be a Judge if he made such statements.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—He would cease to be a Judge, and would have become a partisan. I am sorry to say that one of the Judges in the Commonwealth has shown himself to be a partisan in this matter. The honorable member for Franklin says that we are trying to reduce the workers to a condition of slavery, by compelling them to join unions. I have belonged to more than one union, but no one has been compelled to join those unions. Men join unions only when they choose to do so, and all the Bill says is that a man must join a union if he wishes to take advantage of the provisions of the measure. Honorable members opposite profess to agree to that. The honorable member for North Sydney said that he would compel every worker to join a union for the special purposes of this Bill. That is more than we on this side of the Chamber asked for. The workers cannot be reduced to a worse state of slavery than that in which some of the non-unionists exist. Those who know anything about the clothing trade will support that statement.

Mr. CONROY.—Is it just to compel a man to join a union, whether he wishes to do so or not?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I object to compelling men to join unions whether they wish to do so or not. But it is quite fair for the unionists to say that the man who will not join a union should be above taking the advantages which are gained by the exertions of unionists. The hollowness of the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corinella is shown by the fact that it would be impossible to ascertain under it who are the members of an industry.

Under the conditions he proposes it would be impossible to find out who followed a particular calling, and no one knows better than does the honorable and learned member that his proposal is merely a subterfuge.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Some men would have to belong to a dozen unions in order to obtain work.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—It is not necessary to belong to a union in order to obtain work at present, but if there were unions the workmen of the Commonwealth would be very much dissatisfied with the pay they were receiving. The most intelligent workmen connected with every trade are banded together in unions. Is it to be supposed that these men do not know what operates to their advantage? I should leave my union to-morrow if I did not think it conferred benefit upon those associated with it. The unionists are now called upon to surrender all their present rights of resistance to oppression, and to place in the power of the Judge to determine by their means of livelihood shall be regulated. Therefore, they should get something in return for that which they are giving up. In conclusion, I would point out that not only honorable members on this side of the Chamber, but the electors of the Commonwealth generally, will see what is behind the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and will support the Labour Party when an appeal is made to the country.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—Another crisis stage has been reached in connexion with this Bill. It has produced a series of crises. One Minister resigned his position in the Cabinet because he could not agree with his colleagues upon a matter of principle. The Deakin Ministry was defeated because it would not depart from a certain principle, and now another Ministry is threatened with ejection from office because of its want of principle. I have given the strongest support to many of the most radical features of the Bill. The honorable member for Darling and the honorable member for Hindmarsh have expressed their objections to the Government proposal, and I do not believe that one honorable member sitting on the Government benches could take the Bill embracing the amendment proposed by the Government and present it to his constituents as a perfect measure.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We shall obtain something better after the elections.

Mr. WILKS.—I am prepared to take my stand now, and do not propose to wait until the next elections. The Attorney-General's statement that we shall get something better after a general election is tantamount to an admission that the measure is far from perfect. If the honorable member for Hindmarsh and the honorable member for Darling had been speaking from this side of the House they would probably not only have objected to the Government proposal, but would have resisted it.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We should certainly have tried to obtain something better.

Mr. FRAZER.—The honorable member will soon be in peculiar company.

Mr. WILKS.—That is my concern, and not that of the honorable member. It must be conceded that I fought as hard as any one for the preference to unionists, but I now regard the measure as having been emasculated beyond usefulness. It would have been far better if the Government had either abandoned it, or resigned their positions.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable and learned member for Corinella says that his proviso will not prevent the Court from giving preference to unionists.

Mr. WILKS.—I differ from the honorable and learned member.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member should look at those who are ranged behind him.

Mr. WILKS.—I am not concerned about them. I have to consider whether the measure realizes my ideal, and whether I can take the responsibility of recommending it to my constituents. I find that I cannot go that length. I have gained nothing politically from my ardent support of this measure, because it has not strengthened my claims upon my principal political supporters. I have acted rather in the interests of the party which would oppose and defeat me to-morrow if it could. I do not belong to the Labour Party, and do not intend to be dragged at its heels. I am prepared even now to support the Government if they will attempt to restore the Bill to its original form and do away with the limitations now imposed with regard to preference to unionists. The Government proposal as been referred to by the honorable member for Darling as a compromise.

Mr. HUGHES.—It proposes to adopt the practice which has been inaugurated and carried out in New South Wales. For some months past no union has received a preference unless it has substantially fulfilled these conditions.

Mr. WILKS.—I fought for the clause which distinctly and unreservedly gave preference to unionists, and that is the provision by which Ministers should have stood. I regard the Bill in its present form with disfavour because of the amendments made in clause 48 and in clause 62. The Minister of Home Affairs knows that when the amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs was accepted I felt that I could no longer give the Bill my support. I regarded it as having been so emasculated that it had better be abandoned. I am not proposing to vote against the Government to-night because of any advantage that may accrue to the party to which I belong.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Does the honorable member think that we have gone too far in making concessions to meet the other side?

Mr. WILKS.—Why should the Government have gone as far as they have done? Have we not a right to look to a democratic Ministry to furnish us with measures which shall be perfected in accordance with democratic ideas? I thought that we should do away with the old system when the new Ministry came into power, that instead of deferring time and time again to the wishes of the House, and proving, disregarding of their principles, the Government would carry out their principles or retire from office.

Mr. HUGHES.—That is what we propose to do, and the honorable member is proposing to stand behind those who desire to bring about our defeat. He is playing their game.

Mr. WILKS.—I do not care what game other honorable members are playing.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Does the honorable member expect to obtain a better Bill from the next Government?

Mr. WILKS.—It will be my duty, and that of the honorable member, to attempt to obtain a better Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If we go into Committee it will be open for the honorable member to move to strike out even the proviso that the Government propose.

Mr. WILKS.—It is not necessary to tell me that. I am thoroughly disgusted with the way this Bill has been treated. I am heartily tired of ingenious devices, such as those adopted by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, acting und-the advice of the honorable and learned member for Indi and others. If I am asked to accept compromises of all kinds, I say that I prefer to see the Bill thrown on one side.

Mr. FISHER.—Does not the honorable member admit that it is the duty of the Government to try to pass the Bill?

Mr. WILKS.—No; I think it is their duty to abandon the Bill, because it has been emasculated.

Mr. HUGHES.—By the honorable member's friends.

Mr. WILKS.—The Prime Minister would have been in a much stronger position if he had gone to the country, and advocated the preference to unionists provided for in the original clause. Although the clause originated with the Deakin Government, many members of that Ministry are opposing it now. Even the Prime Minister is opposing the original proposal.

Mr. HUGHES.—But not our own Bill.

Mr. WILKS.—The Prime Minister has admitted that the words "substantially represents" are equivalent to the word "majority," and therefore there is no more difference between the Government proposal and that of the honorable and learned member for Corinella than between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee. Both provisions trifle with the question, and deal with it in a haphazard manner. Under the Government amendment the Judge would have the power of interpretation, whereas under the provision adopted at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, the conditions would be prescribed by statute law. I do not like the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, but at least any one can easily see what it means.

Mr. HUGHES.—Quite so. It means the destruction of the measure.

Mr. WILKS.—The Government proposal would have the same effect, because the Judge would be left to interpret the law.

Mr. WATSON.—That must be so in all arbitration cases.

Mr. WILKS.—It would be impossible to predict what view the Judge would take with regard to the interpretation of the words "substantially represents," and therefore I think that we should not be upon safe ground, so far as unionists are concerned. If the Bill be carried in its present form, the large unions will not register under it. They will not surrender their right to strike in return for shadow. I can understand honorable members opposite supporting the Government, because they are in a tight fix. They can see that an attempt is being made to take the business of the House out of the hands of Ministers. I admit that an attempt of that kind is equivalent to a vote of censure, and if it comes to a question between the honorable member for Bland, and the right honorable member for East Sydney, as Prime Minister, do not know that I shall be called upon to stand by the former. I am under obligation to sink my individual opinion in order to support the Prime Minister, and if my vote upon this occasion rests in placing the right honorable member for East Sydney in his position, I do not think that the country will be any the worse, and, personally, I will not regret. I shall not gain personally by a change of Ministry. I have defended this throughout my own electorate. I had to defend the clause in which it is proposed to grant a preference to unionists as if I had been championing the Government of the country, instead of a principle in a Bill. I tell the Government now that if they will fall back upon their original proposal to confer a preference upon unionists I shall vote with them. But I do not support a proposal which is apparently intended as a sop to four or five honorable members who did not vote with them upon the previous occasion.

Mr. HUGHES.—The proposal of the Government to which the honorable member refers, defines in so many words the attitude which has been taken up by the New South Wales Arbitration Court—an attitude which has the approval of this Ministry and of the unions throughout the mother State.

Mr. WILKS.—That is another interpretation of it by the Minister of External Affairs. This afternoon the Prime Minister informed us that the Government proposal would practically achieve the same result as would the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. Then, I claim that there are other provisions which should have been recommended by the Ministry—notably, clause 62, which they consented to rob the trade unions of all their political power. In the instance they were content to accept the amendment the effect of which was that though the unions could register under the provisions of the Bill they could under certain conditions ask for a reference award. If that is the sort of measure which they desire to give to their friends I can raise no enthusiasm in regard to it. My views of trades unions are the result of a life-long experience of them. I do not belong to any of these organizations, but if I followed a trade should certainly join one of them. I think that the existence of trades unions—withstanding all their abuses—has been of the social advantage of Australia. In this Bill the provision relating to the extension of a preference to unionists represents only so much blank paper. I am astonished that the Prime Minister and the Minister of External Affairs, who have been connected with trades unions for so long, should offer us a clause which they admit to be almost equivalent to the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. HUGHES.—There is nothing wrong with our proposal, so far as the unions of Australia are concerned.

Mr. WILKS.—No sane man can appreciate the difference which exists between the amendment submitted by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, in reference to registration and preference awards, and that which was proposed by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs. It may be news to some honorable members to learn that the unionists of New South Wales are not very much enamoured of the Arbitration Act which is operative in that State. As a matter of fact, some of the most powerful unions were had to be coaxed into registering under its provisions. I hold that all the taxing in the world will not induce a trades union to register under this Bill if its members are to be deprived of preference awards. Three weeks ago when the Government were defeated upon vital portions of this measure, they should either have abandoned it or resigned their positions. We should then have had a democratic Ministry occupying the same position as that of the right honorable member for Adelaide. He stands in the cold just now, but, nevertheless, he appears before Australia as a man who surrendered the emoluments of office in defence of a principle. I believe that honorable members opposite occupy a very uncomfortable position in regard to this matter. If they were not supporters of the Government, I venture to say that they would condemn this Bill more severely than I am doing. Their caustic language would be employed to riddle the arguments of those who are seeking to fasten such a measure upon the country.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We shall do that.

Mr. WILKS.—But honorable members will do it when it is too late. The honorable member for Darling has declared that the adoption of the Government proposal will solve a difficulty. To my mind, it will simply cover up an industrial sore, and sooner or later the people of Australia will demand that a more democratic measure shall be brought into operation. Under that Bill, in its present form, the Shearers' and the Seamen's Unions will be compelled to abandon their political objects and political rules. To say to a body of men that politics shall be tabooed from their association, is tantamount to slavery of the worst description. It is almost impossible to have a union without political objects. To suggest that employes, who incur no risk whatever, should participate in an award of the Court, which has been obtained by personal sacrifice on the part of members of trades unions, is absolutely unjust. If the opponents of the proposal to grant a preference to unionists were engaged in ordinary litigation, and obtained a judgment in their favour, would they not take prompt steps to enforce it? The real reason why we should extend a preference to unionists is to prevent them from being black-listed. They are well aware that if they were to bring their employer before the Arbitration Court, in the absence of some such provision, they would inevitably be black-listed. They might gain their case, but they would lose their employment. I know of one establishment in Sydney which has employed fully 2,500 hands. Its unionist employes have always successfully resisted any attempt to decrease their wages or to alter their conditions, but every endeavour to decrease the wages of that section of its employes which does not belong to these organizations has been successful. I believe it is indispensable that preference should be granted to unionists. It is asserted by those who are opposed to the principle that it is a proposal to prevent non-unionists from obtaining employment. It is nothing of the kind. The object which we have in view in seeking a preference to unionists is that those who have fought, on behalf of unionists and non-unionists alike, the battle for better conditions, and who have exposed the funds of their unions to serious risk in their efforts to improve the lot of the workers, shall not be black-listed. The Prime Minister's own experience teaches him that the school of unionists who believe that a union should be a close corporation is a very small one, and it is provided in the Bill itself that a man who desires to join a union shall not be prevented from doing so. I know that there are some men who honestly object, on conscientious grounds, to join a union, but in the majority of cases a refusal to become a unionist is generally due to a regard for the purse. We are now confronted with a mangled Bill which I cannot accept. If I were to agree to the Bill as it stands, I should clearly show that I was a straight-out supporter of the Government. But I am not, and it is not for me to take a certificate of exemption from opposition. If I decided to support the Government, it would be my duty not to accept such a certificate, but to resign my seat in this House and to go before the electors as a labour candidate.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Is this a motion of censure?

Mr. WILKS.—Honorable members opposite say that it is.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member knows that it is.

Mr. WILKS.—Then I welcome it. I cannot defend the Bill.

Mr. THOMAS.—Is this another "Yes-no" speech.

Mr. WILKS.—It is "Yes" for the Bill and "No" for the Government. It is not like some of the "Yes-no" speeches that I have known the honorable member to make. As a matter of fact, not one honorable member opposite is able to say "Yes" to the Bill from first to last.

Mr. MALONEY.—Another House, and a better one, has yet to deal with it.

Mr. THOMAS.—Did the honorable member say "Yes" to the Land Tax Bill, introduced in the New South Wales Parliament by the right honorable member for East Sydney?

Mr. WILKS.—I did not. The honorable member is referring to matters which took place in the New South Wales Parliament six or seven years ago, and I am sure that he then did many things which he now regrets.

Mr. THOMAS.—I am sorry that I supported the right honorable member for East Sydney's Government for five or six years.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He is as good a man as is the honorable member.

Mr. THOMAS.—I do not say that he is not.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member for Hindmarsh said that if the Minister were displaced, the right honorable member for East Sydney would become Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable member not to discuss that matter.

Mr. WILKS.—I wish to refer to it, only in defence of the right honorable member.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is just as well that the House should thoroughly understand that an irrelevant interjection in wise justifies an irrelevant speech. Honorable members must recognise that if it were to be held that it did, it would be an easy matter to secure the making of irrelevant interjection at any time to justify any number of irrelevant speeches. I must ask the honorable members not to make irrelevant interjections, but even if such interjections were made, I cannot permit irrelevant speeches.

Mr. WILKS.—I shall merely ask the honorable member for Hindmarsh to read the report of a speech made, not by a Minister, but by Mr. McGowan, the leader of the Labour Party in New South Wales. I do not intend to make an elaborate defence of the action of the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must again ask the honorable member not to discuss that matter.

Mr. WILKS.—I bow to your ruling. I do not favour the honorable and learned member for Corinella's amendment, nor do I approve of that which the Prime Minister desires to submit. If clause 48 were to be restored to its original form the position would be different. If, as the result of the amendment of this motion, the Government be displaced, it will be purely a matter of their own concern.

Mr. TUDOR.—But the honorable member should vote for the motion in order that the clause may be recommitted.

Mr. HUGHES.—If the honorable member votes against the motion he will really vote for the honorable and learned member for Corinella's amendment.

Mr. WILKS.—I shall do so, in common sense; but the Government proposal is substantially the same.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Substantially is "very ambiguous."

Mr. WILKS.—And yet the honorable and learned gentleman asks me to support an amendment which contains that word.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am referring to what Artemus Ward says.

Mr. WILKS.—I am asked to vote for an ambiguous amendment which has substantially the same object in view as that which the honorable and learned member for Corinella has sought to achieve. I voted in favour of the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, and I think it is just as well to read to the House an extract from a speech which I delivered on the 6th ult., in which I clearly stated the attitude that I took up. I then said—

The members of one Ministry have already resigned over this Bill, and the present Ministry, if they value the opinions of the workers and of the masses of the community, will adhere firmly to its provisions, and even resign rather than accept undue interference. I am pleased that the Prime Minister has intimated that he will do that. If he resigns, he will have to stand before those to whom alone he can look for support. I care not for the mouthings we have heard about the beauties of trades unionism and its elevating influence. Now is the occasion to test belief in trades unionism. Those who believe in it will vote to give preference to unionists, while those who fear that this new force will put down the class to which they belong, and destroy their political power, will vote against it. I am prepared to take my stand with the unionists, though it would be easier and simpler for me to fight with my party against them, because I expect no advantage from supporting the Labour Party. I have fought that party for years, and will continue to do so, because I am a strong individualist, and they have in their platform planks on which I cannot subscribe.

That was my position then, and it indicates the position which I still take up.

I told one of the members of the Ministry on the day following that on which the amendment, moved by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, was carried that the Bill was so mangled that I could not approve of it. No honorable member opposite could honestly tell its constituents that the principle of preference to unionists is preserved in the Bill as it stands, or that it would be secured if the Government proposal were carried. The honorable member for Hindmarsh said that he objected to the Government proposal.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I did not say that I objected to it; but that I did not like it.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member, though a Government supporter, does not like it; if he were on this side of the House he would hate it. I strongly object to it, and consider that it is really a sham and a delusion.

Mr. TUDOR.—Yet the honorable member proposes to vote for something worse.

Mr. WILKS.—The Government will not accept the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella with the result that the Bill will be destroyed, and they will be displaced. If the Government were on this side of the House, and were fighting for preference to unionists, they would not have a stronger supporter than they would find in me.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If a new Government comes in, and submits a Bill that does not provide for preference to unionists, will the honorable member support them?

Mr. WILKS.—If honorable members opposite, as members of the Opposition, fought for preference for unionists, I should support them in that fight.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member knows that the next Government will not bring in a Bill providing for preference to unionists. He is prepared to vote for the creation of a Government that will not bring in such a Bill. The members of the future Government sit opposite with faces like the rising sun.

Mr. WILKS.—I am concerned only with the Bill itself. It has already been destroyed, and unless the attractions of office have very great charms for them—and I do not believe that they have—the Government should welcome this easy way out of the difficulty. The Government which succeeds them will have to bring in another Bill, and if they do not the members of the Opposition will be in a position to attack them. The failure of the Government to submit a motion for the recommitment of clause 62 is in itself almost worthy of a vote of censure.

Mr. TUDOR.—Why does not the honorable member move to recommit that clause?

Mr. WILKS.—If I did, what support should I receive from the honorable member and other honorable members opposite?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I should support the honorable member.

Mr. WILKS.—Of course the honorable member would. He said at the time that he did not approve of clause 48 as amended, while the honorable member for Grey said that the Bill was "no good."

Mr. POYNTON.—The Government are now seeking to amend it.

Mr. WILKS.—The amendment which they propose is so well watered that it will not obtain my support. I shall be pleased if, as the result of the amendment of this motion, the right honorable member for East Sydney gains a seat on the Treasury benches. I have been a member of his party for many years, and, although I have recently been dissociated from it, so far as the question of preference is concerned I intend to adopt that course which commends itself to my judgment, and to vote against the proposal of the Government.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I have listened very attentively to the remarks of the honorable member for Dalley, who has made what is practically an electioneering speech. It seems to me that the workers to whom he is appealing as the only man who desires to secure a measure that will really give the benefits which we are seeking to confer upon them, may well cry, "Save us from our friends." The honorable member maintains that, because this Bill does not provide for absolute preference to unionists quite irrespective of other considerations, it should be rejected. But, having regard to the foundation upon which this legislation is built, he is asking for something that is really impracticable. He knows that in order that the clause in question may be effective, unionism must be organized. Unless we draw some line between unionists and non-unionists we cannot achieve the end which we have in view in passing a Bill of this character. The honorable member for Dalley says that without the clause as it stood before it was amended on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, the Bill will be a failure, because it will practically offer a stone to those who are crying for bread. He said that if the Government had stood by the original clause he would have been with them, because he believes that without preference no encouragement can be given to men to become unionists. But no one knows better than he does that the Government did stand by that clause, and that the Committee would not allow it to remain as originally drafted. No Government can get its legislation through exactly as it introduces it. The Government in New South Wales which the honorable member supported for many years had to submit to the amendment of its legislation, and he did not fall out with it when a certain Bill was thrown under the table. Now, however, he takes the stand that the attempt of the Government to improve the impracticable provision inserted by the honorable and learned member for Corinella is merely substituting for it a provision which is substantially the same. It would be ridiculous to require preference to be given without regard to the circumstances of every case. The Court will hear evidence of witnesses, and will adjudicate according to the testimony put before it. What the Government propose is that preference shall be given where it is clear that a substantial majority is represented by applicants for it. But can the honorable member for Dalley tell us how the position of the honorable and learned member for Corinella could be worked? He alludes to the clause the following provision—

And provided further that no such preference shall be directed to be given unless the application for such preference is in the opinion of the Court approved by a majority of those who are affected by the award who have interests common with the applicant.

None of those who are opposing the proposal to recommit the clause have shown that absolute majority can be made known. Five hundred men enrolled in a union might apply to the Court for an award, in addition to them there might be 100 others engaged in the same industry scattered all over the two States to which the dispute had extended, or, perhaps, all the Commonwealth. As they would not be organized, their names would not be on the roll, and there would be no source from which any information could be obtained respecting them. Honorable members opposite are trying to impose upon the intelligence of the House when they support an amendment which requires the existence of such a majority to be ascertained before granting of a preference by the Court. The proposal is palpably absurd. But where are those who, when the matter was before the Committee, made such talented addresses on the subject, and so ably championed the cause of the non-unionists? Why are they absent from the Chamber now? The amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella is absolutely impracticable, and the Government wish to substitute for it a reasonable and practical alternative. Without organization the measure cannot be put into operation. Only organization of 100 men or more could bring a case before the Arbitration Court. Those who support the provision which requires that before granting a preference the Court shall ascertain that a majority of the persons employed in the industry concerned are in favour of it are the absolute enemies of compulsory industrial arbitration. There are two v

Killing a Bill—by absolutely voting against it, and by rendering it impracticable and ineffective by subtly-worded amendments. Honorable members opposite are hoping the latter course. But never before in the history of the Commonwealth is the step been taken which is being taken by the Opposition to-night. Honorable members opposite will not fight on the direct issue. They cannot defeat the Government by a general criticism of their actions, so they stand behind the hedge and fire their little gun. Instead of giving a direct vote of censure, they refuse to allow the Government to recommit the Bill to make the clause effective and acceptable to the people. Where are the friends of arbitration now? I know by the beaming face of the honorable member for Macquarie that he thinks that things are looking well for his party. Whenever the lion is away, we find his substitute here.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must confine himself to the question before the Chair.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I repeat what I may have to repeat a hundred times more within the next three months, that those who are trying to bring about the defeat of the Government indirectly by voting against the recommitment of the clause, are stabbing in the back legislation which they have professed to support. Can either of the leaders of the Opposition show that they are acting in good faith on this occasion?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member tried to prevent the leader of the Opposition from making an explanation on this occasion.

Mr. WEBSTER.—With regard to that incident, I can say—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member will not be in order in referring to an irrelevant matter.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The proposal which the Government wish to substitute for the amendment carried by the honorable and learned member for Corinella reads as follows:—

The Court, before directing that preference shall be given to the members of an organization, shall be satisfied that the organization substantially represents the industry affected in point of the numbers and competence of its members.

The amendment would be a perfectly workable one. The condition which it is sought to impose is suggested by the experience gained in New South Wales, and the honorable member for Dalley is practically refusing to extend to the workers, under the Federal

Bill, the advantages which they enjoy and recognise as such under the State law. It is all very well for honorable members to shelter themselves behind the fact that the Bill does not entirely meet with their approval, and, on that ground, to refuse to give to their constituents the relief which they seek. I am perfectly sure that the unionists in the electorate represented by the honorable member for Dalley will not regard his conduct in a favorable light. He is prepared to throw on one side a measure which they would be glad to have even in an imperfect form. It was pointed out when the Bill was previously under discussion, that, if preference were not given to unionists, no incentive would be offered to workmen to join the unions. If the non-unionists are to share in the benefits which have been obtained through the exertions of the unionists in the past, without being called upon to pay anything for them, the unions will gradually dwindle away for want of support. The honorable member for North Sydney proposed that the present unions should be done away with, and that organizations should be formed which would embrace all workers. In other words, the aim of that member and those associated with him is to entirely destroy the present unions, and at the same time to break down the Bill. If they had their way they would give the members of the unions the benefit of the provisions of the Bill only at the sacrifice of their political rights. The attitude assumed by honorable members opposite in connexion with this matter is most cowardly. The tactics adopted do not reflect credit upon those who have engaged in them, and I am sure that in the end they will operate to their disadvantage. I believe that some honorable members opposite have a high appreciation of justice and honour, and that they would prefer to see a straight-out fight rather than an insidious attempt such as is now being made to eject the Ministry from office. Those who are opposing the recommitment of the Bill are practically depriving the Government of the power to defend themselves. I regard the absence of the leaders of the Opposition as very significant. If I were on the opposite side of the House I should scorn to sit behind leaders who had not the courage to come forward and openly attack the Ministry. What is to be thought of those gallant fighters for liberty who are not bold enough to face the situation openly, and declare their real object. They are practically attacking the Government from behind a hedge. They are sheltering themselves behind the proviso inserted at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and are content in this way to bring about results which they are not prepared to secure by more legitimate means. The right honorable member for Swan has always been prepared to engage in a straight-out fight, and surely he cannot approve of the questionable methods now being adopted. He would cover himself with glory if he were to put to shame the leaders of the Opposition, who are taking up so unworthy a position. The honorable member for Dalley and other honorable members, who are opposing the proposal of the Government, will find it very difficult to justify their actions to their constituents. I say, without hesitation, that the workers of Australia, who are particularly interested in this Bill, would be pleased in six months' time to have the Bill even with the condition suggested by the Government. Honorable members seem to think that the Government have no supporters in the Senate. They appear to forget that the Ministry are represented very strongly elsewhere, and that the representatives of the people in the other Chamber have a right to express their opinions, and to put their stamp upon this measure. Are not honorable members opposite rather afraid to afford honorable members of the Senate that opportunity, and is not their present action due to that fear? If so, they are adopting a cowardly attitude, and also an unpatriotic one. Those who are taking the leading part in the present attack upon the Government are pursuing a most unusual course, a course unparalleled in our political history.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—It is sandbagging.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Undoubtedly it is sandbagging. They are attempting to sandbag the Government from behind a hedge. When I look into this matter closely, I cannot repress a feeling bordering upon contempt for the methods which are being adopted by honorable members opposite. This is the most cowardly attack that I have ever witnessed during my political experience.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Take it quietly.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Does not the honorable member know that I am here to represent the people, that they expect me to do my duty towards them, that I am anxious to discharge that duty, and that it is possible for a man who is earnest in work to witness without protest what is being perpetrated by honorable members opposite?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Apparently they hide the numbers. That is why they do "yabber."

Mr. WEBSTER.—Judging by the behaviour of the honorable member for Macquarie, I fancy that the numbers are up or there is a likelihood of them going up.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The numbers will be upon our side before it is all over.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Why do not honorable members opposite allow this Bill to get into Committee? Why do you object to the adoption of the ordinary Parliamentary procedure? Why do you take such a cowardly course upon the present occasion?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I can assure the honorable member that I am taking no such course. The honorable member must address the Chair.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I did not say that you, sir, were adopting a cowardly course of action. I am satisfied that you would not do so. If I had to deal with gentlemen of your status I should have no reason to complain.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is disorderly to address the House in the second person, and again and again the honorable member has said "you!" If he will address the House in the third person, or address the Chair he will be in order.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I shall endeavour to do so. The present, however, is an exceptional occasion, and if I do not comply with the rules of parliamentary procedure it is a fault of the head and not of the heart. I again ask honorable members opposite why they will not allow this Bill to go into Committee? The answer is that they are afraid of doing so lest the work should obtain an Arbitration Act to remedy their wrongs. The members of the Government, who supported this Bill, professed to favour the principle of compulsory arbitration, but only one interpretation can be placed upon their action tonight. They are evidently determined to prevent the workers of Australia from securing a measure of this kind. Where is the right honorable member for Swan, the father of this character of legislation in Western Australia?

REST.—The Western Australian Bill does not contain a clause granting a preference to unionists.

ER.—It would have worked had it contained such a clause. I am satisfied that if the supposition were that the Government occupied the position which they would refuse to occupy without a hedge. They would not deny it not a fact that to-day the labour unions are anxiously desiring the passing of this measure? If some law within the next few months is it not probable that we shall have a repetition of a terrible strike? The honorable member has referred to this Bill as a measure which is sound. I maintain that it is unsound. It is a measure which is not workable as possible, a sacrifice of principle. Honorable members opposite have not the courage to make a direct no-confidence motion in order to attain their end, which are neither honorable nor sound. The honorable member opposite has had a good deal to say in the question of majority. He would point out that the Government have a preference to unionists. He would consider the considerations of majority. He would say that an individual who glibly declares that a unionist has an equal right to a preference to the unionist under the Arbitration Bill is under the Arbitration Bill. The honorable member opposite has announced that the Government because of the following trades unions to be refused political rights. It appears that because he cannot obtain a majority he deems to be perfect—a practically impossible—he is proposing this measure. He has refused to extend a preference to unionists. We have done so. The fact is that the Government opposite seek to prevent us from giving to unionists that preference which is the experience of the New South Wales Bill proved to be desirable. The Government opposite opposing this motion in order to defeat the Bill. Honorable members of the Opposition are seeking, as the Prime Minister said, to tear the very heart out of the Bill. If we accepted what they propose, we should have but a Bill. In the absence of a Bill as the Government desire to insert, this measure would be of no practical value in solving the difficulties which it is designed to remove. If we strike out a vital principle underlying the Bill, it can be of no use to those whom we are anxious to benefit. I am proud to think that the leader of the Labour Party—the Prime Minister of Australia—has sufficient backbone to say that he will not accept that which would be a mere delusion. I am glad to think that he has the courage to stand up boldly for that which he believes to be right, and that those who support him are prepared to throw upon the opponents of this motion the responsibility for the loss of the Bill. I realize that the Prime Minister and those associated with him will be in a position to go before the workers for whose benefit this measure is designed, and to point out that those who voted against this motion voted really to defeat the Bill. We shall be able to appeal to the electors in New South Wales, Western Australia, and Victoria who have just been appealed to by members of the States Parliaments, as well as to those to whom an appeal is now being made in Queensland. The people of Victoria have shown that they have confidence in a party which is prepared to take up a certain stand, and why should we be afraid to face the electors, after the experiences of the last twelve months, as long as we fight for that which must be of advantage to the people, and give security to the industrial workers of the Commonwealth? I emphatically assert that the hostility to this motion is not creditable to those who pose as leading members of the Opposition. They are certainly not taking a courageous course, or one that would have commended itself to any Premier or leader of the Opposition who figures in the history of Australian Parliaments. It is now proposed in the Parliament of Australia to create the precedent of taking advantage of the procedure of the House to achieve an object which can be honorably secured only by the manly course of proposing a direct motion of want of confidence. It seems to be a case of "win, tie, or wrangle" with the Opposition. They are determined to win by unfair means if they cannot succeed by fair methods; but, come what may, we should prefer to leave the Treasury benches rather than resort to such tactics. We shall meet those who have been guilty of these tactics by-and-by, and I have no doubt that when we consult those who sent them here, they will find themselves in a far worse position than that which they occupy to-day.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I had no intention to speak to this motion, but feel constrained to reply to some of the remarks made by the honorable member for Gwydir, who has urged that a fair and manly course should be adopted to secure the defeat of the Ministry. Personally it matters not to me which party occupies the Treasury benches. Even if the Government be defeated, I am not likely to secure office in the new Ministry. In speaking of the honorable way in which the present Government obtained office, the honorable member apparently overlooked the fact that the late Government introduced this Bill, and that they were defeated because of the stand they took up when a certain amendment was proposed. He has apparently forgotten that when the present Government took office they failed to stand by the proposal which was responsible for their gaining the Treasury benches.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is not correct.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It is well known that they did not stand by that amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is not the question which is before the House.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Honorable members opposite are strongly in favour of the Government proposal, but it seems to me that it practically differs but slightly from the amendment which was carried on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. If the Prime Minister were seeking to recommit the Bill, in order to propose that a straight-out preference to unionists should be given, one could admire his courage, but he is not doing anything of the kind. He simply wishes to give his supporters an opportunity to back down, and to be able to say to the worker, "We tried to get the Bill recommitted, and did all we could to secure what you desired." He would give the Court power to say whether an organization applying for a preference substantially represents a majority of those affected by the award.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—If the Government proposal is practically the same as the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, why is not the honorable member prepared to support it?

Mr. LONSDALE.—The Government proposal is simply that the Court shall be satisfied that a majority of those engaged in the industry ask for a preference.

Mr. SPENCE.—That is not the Government proposal.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The proviso inserted on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, is as follows:—

And provided further, that no such preference shall be directed to be given unless the application for such preference is in the opinion of the Court approved by a majority of those affected by the award who have interests in common with the applicants.

The Prime Minister's amendment is very similar. I am opposed to an injustice being done by law, and I am opposed to the recommitment of the Bill, because there is a very little difference between the two proposals.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member is supporting the amendment, because he knows that if the matter be dealt with in the House the Opposition will have more vote.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The honorable member knows what is my attitude on this question. I am opposed to the granting of a preference to unionists. When unions vote their funds—as we have known them to do—to political purposes, men should not be compelled to join them. If the Labour Party had agreed that the provision as to the granting of preference should apply solely to an organization, as we proposed, free from all political influence, very little objection could have been taken to it. But what right have we to compel a man to join a union in order that he may be able to earn a livelihood?

Mr. POYNTON.—No such provision is in the Bill.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The honorable member calls himself a democrat, and yet desires to give special privileges to a section of workers. That is rank Toryism, and honorable members opposite, who pose as democrats, are really the Tories of the day. The Government do not now propose that a preference shall be given in the case of any restrictions. If they did they would take up a manly course; but they simply wish to boast of their action to their supporters, in whose eyes they have been from the first throwing dust. I am for the interests of the workers at heart just as much as have honorable members opposite.

NEW HEBRIDES: REBATE OF DUTIES.

Debate resumed from 28th July (vide page 3654), on motion by Senator STANFORTH SMITH—

That, in the opinion of the Senate, a Bill should be introduced by the Government to provide for a rebate of the duties paid on all natural products of the soil imported into the Commonwealth which have been grown in the islands of the New Hebrides, on land owned and occupied by British subjects.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I think that Senator Smith is to be congratulated on bringing this question forward. It does not savour much of fireworks, and does not attract much attention; but though it may be to some extent outside the ken of the people of Australia generally, it is one which, according to the way in which it is settled, may have important results, affecting the people of the Commonwealth, if not at present, certainly in the time to come. We cannot lose sight of the fact that though we are living in a continent separated from other parts of the world, and are self-contained, there are other nations whose possessions are in close proximity to us, and with whom we shall hereafter have dealings, we hope of a friendly character, but it may be of an unfriendly character. It is the province and duty of this Parliament, so far as within it lies, to see that these questions are not made difficult of solution, by reason of carelessness on our part, or of inability to foresee the situations which may arise in the future. It is on this account that I think Senator Smith is to be congratulated on bringing forward the question at this juncture. The relations of the Empire with other nations at present can be said to be distinctly friendly. No other nation has so far shown a disposition to acquire the New Hebrides by an act of aggression. Senator Smith has, therefore, taken time by the forelock in submitting his motion. In a pacific manner, by means of trade, the honorable senator proposes to prevent other nations having better facilities for acts of aggression in the future, or by reason of trade, putting themselves in a better position to act aggressively towards Australia. It will be noticed that the motion contemplates a rebate of duties only in the case of the natural products of the soil. I take it that the honorable senator does not propose that the rebate should extend to goods manufactured in the New Hebrides. That puts out of the question all possibility of any person establishing manufactures in those islands, and being allowed to land his manufactured goods in Australia at a lower rate than goods of the same kind imported to the Commonwealth from any other part of the world. The articles on which it is proposed to allow a rebate of the duties are also largely articles which are not produced in Australia, or, at all events, not in very great quantities. The object aimed at is, of course, a practical application of the Monroe doctrine to the Pacific. I remind honorable senators that the Monroe doctrine as applied to America by the United States people has two phases. They laid down the principle that no other country should acquire further territory in America. They also laid down the principle that the United States would not themselves acquire further territory in America. They agreed to maintain the status quo so far as America was concerned. It seems to me that this is a very safe doctrine for Australia to apply to the Pacific. I do not think the time has arrived when Australia should seek to acquire territory in the Pacific. I do not think that we should at this time seek to acquire the New Hebrides as a Territory of the Commonwealth. With Senator Smith, I am inclined to think that we are somewhat premature in acquiring New Guinea as a Territory of the Commonwealth. I think, however, that we can well apply the Monroe doctrine to the New Hebrides in that respect. But we should not lose sight of the fact that the second phase of the Monroe doctrine is equally valuable in this connexion. That is to say, that while we do not desire to acquire the New Hebrides as a Territory of the Commonwealth, we should see that no other nation acquires those islands, because we wish to interfere with the plans of foreign nations, but simply because we wish to put it beyond their power to effectually interfere with us. Our policy for Australia is to mind her own business, and, as far as possible to prevent other nations interfering with her business. Senator Smith has pointed out that there is a real danger of the acquisition of the New Hebrides by one of the European nations. That danger, as the honorable senator has said, does not arise from any aggressiveness towards the British Empire on the part of that nation, but from the perfunctory and legitimate attitude adopted by that nation towards the people of this island. While this nation has no claim upon these islands, and they are not its property, it has gone out of its way to make a special provision to cater for the trade of the islands. The object of the action is to encourage French settlement on the islands, and to encourage settlers already there to become Frenchmen by naturalization, in order that eventually such a may be established by reason of the fact that they will drop as to the hands of the French people. It is a very admirable way of action; far better than the old system. I point out, however, to any other nation to adopt a legitimate method of trade. If the method adopted by the French leads to the permanent advantage of the French people, I blame them in the least, but I blame ourselves for not making use of the same opportunities to prevent the islands from being the property of the French people. The motion, as it is stated, is the bringing into competition of Australia with the islands of the South Sea Islands. Therefore, no danger that the White Australia will be prejudiced upon by its acceptance of whom it is proposed we are not coloured, but the object aimed at is to settle permanently in LARGIE.—How shall we have commodities sent here have by white or black labour?

PEARCE.—That can be very easily arranged. We have Captain Rason as the Government Resident, and there is no reason why we should not adopt the same method of Government employ in order to produce on which they give produce grown by French subjects. With each consignment a certificate from the French Lands Commissioner in the New Hebrides that the produce is grown by French or by French subjects.

PEARCE.—They may employ with each consignment of produce accompanied by a certificate of produce of French subjects or French subjects.

LARGIE.—We should need a person to watch these things.

PEARCE.—Not necessarily. Officials go round the islands, and work in the ordinary performance of duty. We have already a British Resident in the islands, carrying out precisely the same duties, with the exception that these trade regulations have not been established. All that is necessary is that arrangements should be made with the British Government requiring Captain Rason to give certificates for the produce of British subjects in the islands.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Who would supply the information to Captain Rason?

Senator PEARCE.—He would get the information himself.

Senator DE LARGIE.—From the people who grow the produce?

Senator PEARCE.—He would be able to get it for himself. He will be living on the spot, and will be practically an inspector.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—If British subjects in the islands are allowed to land their produce free in Australia they may be trusted to take good care that no one who is not entitled to do so shall be allowed to compete with them.

Senator PEARCE.—I propose to read to the Senate some statements which will show how unfairly the present competition is operating so far as British residents on the islands are concerned. In the Sydney Morning Herald of 21st July last there are the following notes from the New Hebrides group:—

On the other hand, the British settlers are being handicapped in every possible way, instead of receiving some amount of encouragement in their pioneering work. The maize and other products grown by the British in the group are heavily taxed; indeed, the same duty is imposed upon British-grown maize in the New Hebrides as upon the products of foreign labour in foreign lands. The British settlers complain that they are being treated by their own people as outsiders, while their French competitors are being assisted in every way possible. The British Resident Commissioner in the New Hebrides group, Captain Rason, R.N., has done his utmost in the interests of the settlers, but the opinion is very emphatically expressed that, unless the Commonwealth Government can see its way to encourage them, French interests will ultimately predominate. The startling report that some of the British settlers in the New Hebrides propose to "change their flag" by becoming naturalized French subjects, in order to secure a market for their products, has been brought to Sydney by the Tambo. Other settlers, it is stated, who object to swearing allegiance to France, contemplate disposing of their selections to their French competitors. The prospects for the British are reported to be very gloomy, and general disappointment is expressed at the apathy and want of sympathy on the part of the Australian people.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Do you think it likely that that report is accurate?

Senator PEARCE.—I have no reason to believe that the report is not an accurate statement of the facts. It cannot be disputed that the French Government are allowing the products of the islands into New Caledonia free of duty, while the Australian Government, along with the French Government, place a duty on all the products of the British settlers. On the one hand, the Frenchman has a free market in New Caledonia, while the British settler finds both the Australian market and the French market closed against him. Any unprejudiced person will admit that this places the British settler in unfair competition.

Senator O'KEEFE.—On general lines, the honorable senator does not take that newspaper as correct.

Senator PEARCE.—If it were a leading article, or an expression of opinion on the part of the newspaper, I should not quote the extract.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The returns show that the number of British subjects in the New Hebrides is decreasing.

Senator PEARCE.—Senator Smith applied to Mr. Wollaston, the Comptroller-General of Customs, for a return showing the exports of products from the New Hebrides to New South Wales for the year 1903. From that report we find that the exports were as follow:—Raw coffee, £287; copra, £9,252; maize, £8,434—there is a duty of 20 per cent. on maize—crude indiarubber, £125; logs of timber, £246; tortoise-shell, £146; and other articles, £170; or total exports, £18,660.

Senator WALKER.—Did the honorable member mention bananas?

Senator PEARCE.—There are no bananas mentioned in the list, and I suppose that none were imported in that year. It will be noticed that one of the main items is copra.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is no duty on copra.

Senator PEARCE.—That is so; and another main item is maize, the duty paid on which amounted to about £1,800. It seems to me, therefore, that the only item which is of importance in the present connexion is that of maize, which is grown to some extent in the Commonwealth. So far as I can judge, maize is a very profitable crop in the States where it is produced; but we have to import a large quantity, the Australian output being not nearly sufficient to meet local demands. This is not a case of bringing a product into an overstocked market; and if the maize from New Hebrides is shut out, the article have to be imported from some other of the world. Under the circumstances we might seriously consider whether could not make a rebate of the duty this one item. As to the other items, copra and indiarubber is not produced here at all, while the timber logs imported are not as come into competition with those grown on the mainland. Tortoise-shell is not produced in any quantity in Australia; so that, as I said before, the principal item we have to take into consideration is that of maize. The motion contemplates only the natural products of the soil: the products of the New Hebrides are those which are suited to tropical climates.

Senator DE LARGIE.—What does Queensland say to that?

Senator PEARCE.—I think it could easily be shown that in the motion there is no danger to Queensland.

Senator MULCAHY.—Is there not a danger to any maize-producing State?

Senator PEARCE.—There are dangers. There is the very limited demand for maize from the New Hebrides coming into competition when the maize grown on the mainland is sufficient to supply the market, and there is the other danger of the New Hebrides becoming a French possession. In looking at one danger we must not shut our eyes to the other. If the means proposed we can do something to encourage British settlement in the Hebrides, and prevent those islands becoming a French possession, we are justified in making some concession on the one to avoid a great danger on the other. It is a part of an empire with a foreign policy, in the shaping of which we have no share. That foreign policy may at some time involve a rupture with France; if in the meantime the New Hebrides become a French possession and naval station, the French Government will not take into consideration the fact that Australia had no hand in bringing about the rupture or the war, but will use that station as a means of aggressive action against Australia. We must not shut our eyes to the possibilities. While I regard the acquisition of the New Hebrides as unnecessary, still, if we can, without inflicting damage on the Commonwealth, prevent the French getting such a hold as to amount to occupation, I think we shall be doing only our duty. The motion is limited think that Great Britain re than she has done in the e circumstances make it all the more important for us, in our geographical position, to strain a point in endeavouring to encourage British settlement in these beautiful islands. Port Sandwich and Havannah Harbor are two of the finest ports in the Pacific; and it is only natural that foreign countries should cast envious eyes upon them. We can well see what a menace the foreign occupation of these ports would be to Australia. We here cannot do very much; but I understand that there is a proposal to increase the postal and commercial facilities at New Hebrides and elsewhere in the Pacific by a slightly increased subsidy.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The best subsidy to steam-ships is freights, and these cannot be got at the present time.

Senator MACFARLANE.—If steamships could be encouraged, by means of a subsidy, to reduce their freight charges, we might thus help both the settlers and ourselves. I understand that the Government are at present in treaty with a company to supply an increased steam-ship service; and this matter is well worthy of consideration. I am not one who supports the spending of more money than is absolutely necessary, but I consider that money would be well spent in endeavouring to increase our influence and advantages in the New Hebrides. If it be true that the advantages offered by the French Government are such as to induce British settlers to change their nationality, our interests would appear to be in great jeopardy; because, if it comes to a question of the number of inhabitants who owe allegiance to Great Britain, we may find ourselves seriously outnumbered. The fact that British interests in the islands have been carefully looked after for the last fifty years, as they were even before that time, ought to have some weight with us at the present time.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I beg to move as an amendment—

That the following words be added :—" Provided that all such products be grown by white labour."

Senator MACFARLANE.—It is a black man's country.

Senator WALKER.—There are only a few white people there.

Senator HIGGS.—I do not fall in with the idea that we should encourage settlement in any country but Australia. We have on the mainland sufficient territory on which to settle thousands of people without seeking for fresh lands outside.

Senator WALKER.—Not much encouragement is offered to people to come to Australia at present.

Senator HIGGS.—What is the object of the motion? We are told that the idea is not to annex the New Hebrides, but to encourage British settlers to make permanent homes there. In the same breath, however, we are told that France is settling people on the land, with a view to the ultimate annexation of the islands; and it is contended that we shall be very wrong if we do not give our settlers the same facilities as are afforded by France. Some speakers contend that for strategic reasons we should encourage settlement, because at some future stage a nation may there establish a naval and military base with a view to attacking Australia. I venture the opinion that if ever Australia is in any trouble, and has settlements thousands of miles away, such as the New Hebrides, those settlements will prove a serious source of danger and inconvenience, rather than an assistance. In practice it seems to me that we should have to do with those islands, what I venture to think Great Britain would do with Australia if ever there was war with some great naval power—namely, let the islands look after themselves. Therefore, I think we may dismiss from our minds the idea of any strategic advantage accruing from the acquisition of the New Hebrides.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—What we want to do is not to acquire the New Hebrides, but to prevent any other nation from acquiring the islands.

Senator HIGGS.—I know that that is the desire of the honorable member, who, with the very best of intentions, is like those individuals who have been described as desiring to acquire the whole earth. There are some people who would not rest satisfied if they possessed half of the whole habitable globe. I cannot understand why it is that members of the Commonwealth Parliament and of the States Legislatures do not see how ridiculous they must appear in the eyes of other nations of the world. Australia is a nation of some 4,000,000 people, with a territory 3,107,000 square miles in extent. Our territory is larger than that of the United Kingdom with 121,000 square miles; of France, with 201,000 square miles; of Germany, with 212,000 square miles; of Russia, with 2,262,000 square miles; and of Austria, with 269,000 square miles. Yet we are to endeavour to annex the islands of the Pacific. Senator Smith says we have no desire to annex the island but the whole object of the motion is to encourage British settlement in order that permanent settlers there may be able to appeal to us and to Great Britain for protection, with a view to annexation later.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—We want to keep an industrial garrison there in order to prevent any other nation from annexing the group.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator will find that if international events develop as they are doing, it will take Australia its time to maintain its own garrisons. It was said prior to the war in Japan? Japanese were looking for new territories and complaining of the selfishness and greed of Australians in wishing to keep the continent for themselves. They look upon it as a piece of consummate ingratitude that 4,000,000 persons should desire to keep this great territory for themselves. I think that we made a great mistake in annexing the territory of British Guinea.

Senator PEARCE.—Does the honorable senator think that Germany should have got the whole of that island?

Senator HIGGS.—If other nations were satisfied with the territory that they occupy and the German nation, which has a territory of only 212,000 square miles, were to settle on it, it is quite entitled to take those islands.

Senator CLEMONS.—Will the honorable senator add to the security of Australia by allowing Germans to settle there?

Senator HIGGS.—The Germans have settled that question for us, because they possess a portion of the island. We are to be thoroughly satisfied with the territory that we have. I also view this question from the protectionist standpoint and apprehend that the object of Senator Smith is to give the free-trade coach a lift it can.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—This is not a fiscal question, but a national question.

Senator HIGGS.—I view the motion as a protectionist who is extremely anxious to see Australia maintain its present position. I believe that the standard of comfort in Australia is higher than in any other part of the world. I am anxious to maintain that position, so that the conditions of existence for the working classes shall be immensely superior to the conditions prevailing in any other part of the globe. We ur establishing a Factories wage laws, and other properes, if we are to allow the black labour in the New Hebrides into the Commonwealth at duty?

STANIFORTH SMITH.—The more products of the soil only.

DE LARGIE.—Does the honorable member ask if the maize? Is he able to tell me if the maize is grown absolutely in the New Hebrides? He told me in March last the New Hebrides one of the recruiting grounds for the coloured labour plantations. I ask the honorable member if he is not introducing the wedge, so as to permit of the coloured labour product in other parts of the New Hebrides? If we give effect to the motion, how can we reasonably exclude the products of the New Hebrides in other parts of the British Empire?

STANIFORTH SMITH.—How did we deal with its islands? Mr. De Largie, protectionist, and, as the head of the Ministry, he carried a proposition to this one.

DE LARGIE.—I intend, whenever a proposition of this kind is made, to ask the honorable member to provide that the products of the New Hebrides go only by white labour.

STANIFORTH SMITH.—Is there any white labour in the New Hebrides?

DE LARGIE.—Negative the motion.

DE LARGIE.—I think it would be reasonable to give effect to the motion, but I propose a verbal amendment, and if it is carried, the motion, as amended, can be put to the vote. It is a national view for the Senate of Australia ought to endeavour to develop settlement in its own territory to the extent in its power; and that can be achieved if it is to spend its money in subsidizing a line of settlement in these islands, and in other parts of the Empire. Senator De Largie, whether there is any white labour in the New Hebrides? The probability is that the only persons there are the overseers, in Johannesburg some years ago, simply inviting capitalists, alarmed, according to some reports, to invest their money in Australia, to invest their money in the New Hebrides, put the land and employ hundreds, perhaps thousands, of kanakas. We are taxing the people of the Commonwealth to pay a bonus to sugar-growers, who will employ only white labour. This is an absurd paradox.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—From time to time, Senator Smith provides very interesting topics for discussion in the Senate, and the latest is quite as interesting as any of those which preceded it. I admire the tactful and skilful way in which he has brought forward this question at the present time. No doubt he has made a very considerable study of the Pacific Islands, and might very well be dubbed the member for Oceania. He has stated that this proposal is brought forward with a view to ultimately securing this territory. I should think that Australia has already quite sufficient territory. I consider that by the time it is populated in an effective way, there will be very little need for us to go to the islands for further territory. This talk of acquiring more territory for the Empire than it has, reminds me of the statement by Mark Twain that the Britishers were about the only modern people who were mentioned in the Scriptures, for to them he took the following passage in the Scriptures to apply directly—Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.

Senator Smith wishes the Britishers to inhabit every imaginable dry place in the earth. Therefore, he uses the argument about acquiring fresh territory as a reason why his motion should be adopted. The real purpose of this motion is not to acquire fresh territory, but to sneak in free-trade. At the last general election the honorable senator, in common with other free-traders, attempted to fight the battle of free-trade, but they went down very badly. Senator Smith issued in Western Australia a paper known as Federal Facts—a wild, hysterical screed that nobody heeded; and, notwithstanding all his journalistic efforts, he went down so badly that not one free-trader was returned for that State.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—That is not correct. What about Senators Croft and Henderson?

Senator DE LARGIE.—They are labour men to the backbone.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—Are they not free-traders?

Senator DE LARGIE.—We put fiscalism outside our policy.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why does the honorable senator talk about it if the party has nothing to do with the fiscal question?

Senator DE LARGIE.—As a party, we have nothing to do with the fiscal question. There are many questions that we debate, and which we do not make part of our policy.

Senator TRENWITH.—Surely, if they are free-traders it is part of their policy.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not know exactly what policy they are advocating at the present time, because we have their leader in another place, trying from time to time to get the protectionists to sink the fiscal question. Has Senator Smith considered that aspect of the subject? Has he considered the awkward position in which he will place his leader? Supposing that the intended coalition should come about, how would this attempt to raise the fiscal question operate? The honorable senator is very ill-advised in submitting his motion, unless he wishes to defeat the intended combination of the fiscal parties. I can only regard the motion as an attempt to bring in free-trade after having been beaten at the late elections. I intend to prevent any sneaking in of a fiscal belief which we fought and defeated in the country.

Senator MILLEN.—I hope that the honorable senator will also be opposed to the Manufactures Encouragement Bill.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I am quite as much opposed to that measure as the honorable senator is.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Not on the same ground.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not know the grounds for the opposition of Senator Millen, but I shall oppose the passage of the Bill in almost any shape or form. In the interests of fiscal peace this motion should be withdrawn. We need fiscal peace, and if the Tariff question is to be raised, I shall insist upon our getting more protection. We are not going to have more free-trade. After the late disastrous results to the free-traders, Senator Smith should be the last in the Senate to raise the fiscal question, after the ignominious way in which his efforts at that time were defeated.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—A majority of free-traders were returned for Western Australia at the last election, as the honorable senator knows.

Senator DE LARGIE.—If the fiscal question is to be discussed, I hope that will not be submitted in a piece-meal way but in a comprehensive way, which will allow the Tariff to be adjusted in accordance with the public wish.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—Senator Higgs has made a palpable mistake in supposing that the idea of fiscalism entered into the mind of Senator Smith. This is purely an attempt to secure a strategic position. Who objects to Great Britain, big as it is, having little Gibraltar? That is a strategic position which we would not give up for any consideration.

Senator MCGREGOR.—We do not object to Great Britain having the New Hebrides.

Senator WALKER.—I am not saying that the honorable senator does. The Panama Canal, when it is opened, will completely alter the state of affairs in regard to the New Hebrides; it will be the main route between Europe and Australia. We must be prepared for eventualities. Whoever heard of a nation which until certain things occurred before prepared to meet them? We must be prepared for emergencies. In my opinion Senator Smith has been actuated by patriotic motives, irrespective of fiscalism. Two honorable senators who have talked about fiscalism are both protectionists. It is they who are raising the fiscal question and not the free-traders. They are trying to draw a red herring across the track to divert attention from the patriotic sentiment which Senator Smith is taking. For the last fifty years British missionaries have been civilizing these islands. Probably some honorable senators are not aware of the many martyrs who have lost their lives in trying to civilize the aborigines. When Senator Higgs proposes that we should only sanction the introduction of articles grown by white labour, we might well negative the motion at once. The white labour in the islands is infinitesimal in proportion to the native labour.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—We cannot prohibit the islanders from working in their own islands.

Senator TRENWITH.—The object of Senator Smith is to establish a white British settlement there, and therefore the proposition is not so illogical as it appears to be.

Senator WALKER.—We hope to do so, but how are they to live there if they are to be that the French producers can get ad-mea which they cannot get? ent this is a counter-move to ial tariff of New Caledonia. farlane has informed us that o magnificent harbors in the s. us some information with regard to the Customs duties there. I suppose that Senator Higgs would object to the free admission of bananas. There is actually a duty of 1s. per cental imposed on bananas coming from the New Hebrides to Australia. It has absolutely ruined that portion of the trade from the islands, if that is any satisfaction to the honorable senator.

Senator HIGGS.—Banana growing is a thriving industry in Queensland at present.

Senator WALKER.—But it is in the hands of Chinamen.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The Chinese will not live for ever.

Senator WALKER.—We can leave the Chinese alone, and they will probably be more numerous than ourselves in the future, if honorable senators opposite go on as they are going.

Senator CLEMONS.—Not here.

Senator WALKER.—In the Cairns district, almost all cultivation is in the hands of Chinese. At the present time, the French own nearly twice as much land in the New Hebrides as do British subjects. In days gone by we were handicapped, and I suppose we are still handicapped in our trade with those islands. Our traders cannot deal in certain commodities in which French and Americans are dealing. We cannot send firearms or spirits to those islands; not that I am in favour of sending spirits, but I point out that in this way we are handicapped pretty severely already.

Senator McGREGOR.—I thought the honorable senator was a free-trader.

Senator WALKER.—Senator McGregor knows what I refer to. We do not allow our merchants to send firearms or spirits to the islands, whilst the French and Germans do. We are handicapped to that extent already, and we are now apparently to be handicapped still further by the refusal of honorable senators to allow the same facilities to our own people in those islands to bring their produce to this country as are afforded to French residents to encourage them to bring their produce to New Caledonia. I hope that Senator Higgs' amendment will be negatived, and that the motion will be agreed to.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—This debate is particularly interesting from the fact that the speeches delivered by Senators Higgs and de Largie have illustrated how thoroughly those honorable senators failed to understand the drift of the agreement made with Burns, Philp, and Co., and submitted by the Government they were supporting in 1902. It is necessary to go back to the date of that agreement to understand the present condition of affairs, because it is clear that several honorable senators do not in the least understand how the present position has arisen. Sir Edmund Barton's Government was inspired by the Monroe doctrine, or, perhaps we should rather say by the Jingo doctrine, as applied to Australia, to lay as many fingers as they could on as many of the islands of the Pacific as possible, by encouraging the settlement of British subjects on those islands. The method they adopted was to propose an agreement with Burns, Philp, and Co., subsidizing them to the extent of £6,000 a year for a mail service with the New Hebrides, the Santa Cruz group, the Gilbert Islands, and the Ellice Islands. These groups of islands are scattered over perhaps a third of the Pacific Ocean, and the Gilbert and Ellice Islands are really so far away from this continent that the mail service provided for them could only be arranged for three times a year. However, the protectionist Government, supported by Senators de Largie and Higgs, arranged to contribute £6,000 from the funds provided by the taxpayers of the Commonwealth, in order to foster the national sentiment, and to prevent the people of other nations settling upon the islands of the Pacific.

Senator HIGGS.—I spoke against the proposal, but the honorable senator's argument does not prove anything, anyway.

Senator MATHESON.—My argument proves that it is perfectly futile for Senators Higgs and de Largie to suggest that this is a fiscal question. Here we have the very Government which those honorable senators supported, pledged from the first to the Maitland policy and protection—

Senator TRENWITH.—Is the subsidizing of mail steamers analogous to the giving of a trade preference?

Senator MATHESON.—I shall show exactly how it works out, if the honorable senator will but wait.

Senator PEARCE.—They did it for the purpose of trade.

Senator TRENWITH.—Of trade both ways.

Senator MATHESON.—They did it to encourage trade between those islands and Sydney, in order to make it perfectly clear that the influence of Australia extended to those islands. That was the object.

It was to extend the influence of Australia in the eyes of Europe. Honorable senator can read that from the Hansard report. I have a vivid recollection of the reason, because I was one of those who questioned the wisdom of the Government action at that occasion. I opposed the proposal strongly, and it was only after a very long and deal of explanation from my honorable and learned friend, Senator Drake, that I was reluctantly compelled to withdraw my opposition.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The two honorable senators to whom the honorable senator referred, did exactly as he did himself. I opposed the proposal.

Senator MATHESON.—They may have opposed it, but they are now opposing the motion submitted by Senator Smith, which simply carries on the line of policy inaugurated by the Government they supported.

Senator HIGGS.—Is this not a free trade motion?

Senator MATHESON.—It is not a free trade motion in any sense. I hope it has made that absolutely clear.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The whole question has a fiscal tendency.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator has a bee in his bonnet. Honorable King Charles' head in everything. The question cannot be dismissed as easily as Senator Smith evidently thinks it can. I am afraid that the weak point in his argument is that it deals with the question of the New Hebrides only, and it is quite possible to limit any measure admitting the products of British settlers in the New Hebrides free to Australia to the settlement of the New Hebrides. I say this for the best of reasons, because we are content to pay this subsidy, and it is only in the justification of the subsidy that it is possible to argue that the products of these settlements should be admitted free to Australia. I am not in favour of Australia interfering with these islands; but if we are to justify the policy logically, if we are to continue the payment of this yearly subsidy, and that money is not to be absolutely wasted, we must adopt some such measure as Senator Smith has proposed, but it must be applicable to the produce of all the settlers on the islands to which the subsidized mail service goes. What Senator Walker has said is perfectly true. I have looked into this question in Sydney, and the result of the duty which we have the soil has made it ab-sible for white settlers on the Pacific to ship anything they Sydney with profit to them-ey used to send produce before the establishment of the because it was then admitted free. Now that duties are impossible for settlers in those produce to Australia and they use to send their produce here.

 have the greatest objection to calling Chi-they are in Melbourne; but I am not at any time to recognise even a

MATHESON.—The honorable senator has not been in Queensland, and I take into the question he will not take into the whole of the banana trade in Queensland is in the hands of Chinese. The fact remains that the majority of Australian citizens of whom we now made are Chinese pure and I do not consider that it is worth the sacrifice of £6,000 a year, and, in my opinion, it would be much better the subsidy should be dropped and we should go on in the way in which we have been going.

MR. GIBBS.—It was only proposed by the Philp party in Queensland.

MATHESON.—Produce imported from Fiji must be taken into account in connexion with the trade. It would be a most illogical thing to shut out the products of Fiji.
 I do not consider the question as appropriate to the importation of produce from Fiji. I should like to ask honorable senators how they propose to treat the natural products of the soil of New Guinea?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—This is not a fiscal question, and the honorable senator is discussing it on fiscal lines.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator desires to limit the scope of the discussion. He desires that we should discuss the question as applied only to the New Hebrides.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The object is to prevent the French obtaining possession of the New Hebrides.

Senator PEARCE.—The difference between New Guinea and the New Hebrides is that one is a British possession and the other is not.

Senator MATHESON.—Am I to understand that Senator Pearce's contention is that those who live outside of a British Colony should have advantages given to them in respect of trade with Australia which are not to be given to British subjects resident in a British possession?

Senator PEARCE.—It is not possible that we can lose New Guinea, whilst there is a prospect that France may secure the
 New Hebrides.

Senator MATHESON.—I do not think that that is an argument that should greatly influence us.

Senator TRENWITH.—The whole matter is a hash.

Senator MATHESON.—It is a hash;
 but we should deal with the question as logical, and business people, and take into our consideration the whole of these islands, which produce the same products with the same kind of labour. As a free-trader I find it absolutely impossible to draw a distinction between the products of the New Hebrides and the products of any of the other islands to which we subsidise a mail service. Now that I realize that it is Senator Smith's intention to limit his motion to the New Hebrides I cannot support it.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The honorable senator does not understand it.

Senator MATHESON.—I know thoroughly well what the honorable senator is driving at; but I fail to see how he can logically defend his motion.

Senator CLEMONS.—What is Senator
 Smith driving at?

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator is bitten with a fear that the French in monopolising the trade of the New Hebrides will eventually become the owners of those islands; but I fail to see how we can apply to British residents in the New Hebrides conditions which we do not apply to British residents in the other groups of islands to which our subsidised mail service extends.

Senator PEARCE.—The New Hebrides are the only islands in the Pacific which are not held by a European power.

Senator MATHESON.—In these circumstances I should like to know why we are subsidising a mail service to other islands. If we are to secure our influence in those islands, and we are endeavouring to do so at an expense of £6,000 per annum; surely we should encourage our own settlers. I cannot see why this motion should be confined to the New Hebrides only. The question is the more important in view of the fact that we are to be asked to increase the present mail subsidy. It is extremely desirable that the whole matter should be ventilated, in order that honorable senators may know what they are doing when the Estimates are before them. There will probably be a couple of lines in those Estimates proposing an increased subsidy, and it will then hardly be possible to debate the question. One point raised by Senator Higgs is that it would be impossible to discriminate between natural products of the soil grown by British settlers and those grown by French settlers. I can assure the honorable senator that it is perfectly easy to exercise such a discrimination. The islands are very small, and everybody knows exactly what is being done there. Burns, Philp, and Co. have agents at every port of call, and they will know what products of the soil have been grown by English and French settlers.

Senator TRENWITH.—Would they not have an interest in deceiving us if the truth would in any way injure their trade?

Senator MATHESON.—The truth would very soon become known, and I do not think it would be to the interest of a firm such as Burns, Philp, and Co. to lend themselves to such a practice, though I must admit that what the honorable senator says is quite possible. I hope that I have made it clear that the motion should cover the whole of the islands to which we have subsidized a mail service, and that until that is done it is incomplete.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—I intend to support the amendment which has been moved by Senator Higgs. It is all very well for some honorable senators to contend that fiscalism should not have been imported into this discussion. It is possible otherwise to discuss the motion. In very words, "rebate of duties" used to suggest fiscalism straight away.

Senator SMITH.—That is merely a means to an end.

Senator O'KEEFE.—To my mind it is impossible to consider the question, in the light of the amendment submitted by Senator Higgs. The taxpayers of Australia are now paying something like £90,000 annually in rebates on sugar for the benefit of sugar-growers in Queensland and in New South Wales, and for the purpose of enabling the sugar-growers in Queensland chiefly, to do without black labour. I do not see how it would be possible under this motion to prevent the introduction of sugar grown in the New Hebrides by black labour. The amendment provides for a rebate of duty on raw products of the soil, and sugar must be so regarded. Senator Smith has shown himself in past discussions in this chamber to be an ardent advocate of the White Australia policy, and what might happen if this motion is carried can hardly be ascribed to the honorable senator. It seems to me to be entirely illogical that we should ask the people of Australia to pay such an immense amount of money—and I think the majority pay it willingly—to the sugar-growers of Queensland and New South Wales to enable them to do without black labour, and at the same time carry out a policy which, if given effect to, would enable the planters in either of these States to utilize black labour in the New Hebrides for the production of sugar there, and then send it free into Australia.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—One of the sugar-cane would be entitled to a rebate under the motion.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That in itself does not do a great deal towards upsetting the White Australia policy. We have been making the counter-argument that we are not inconsistent in advocating the duty on bananas grown in the New Hebrides, seeing that duty only assists a Queensland grower, which is entirely in the hands of the Chinese. It is, of course, a patent fact that in Queensland the Chinese almost entirely have the banana production in their hands, and that is regretted by every one who believes in a White Australia. That, however, is not a matter for the Commonwealth Parliament. So long as the Chinese and have the right to remain are citizens of that State, and the Commonwealth Parliament has no concern. If the State Government like to introduce legislation re- production of bananas or any Chinese labour, that is a matter for the State. We cannot re- nounce who are now in Australia Immigration Restriction Act enforced, the Chinese will, in course of events, die out; and is now carried on by them will hands of white men.

TANFORTH SMITH.—What about the rights of the Chinese?

O'KEEFE.—According to the statistics, there are not likely descendants of Chinese in Australia. I sympathize entirely with the honorable senator who sub- motion, which, however, places difficulty. The White Australia has been fought most bitterly in the Commonwealth Parliament, and has been opposed by the large majority of the people of Australia at both elections. It is a much more important question than that presented by Senator Higgins regards paying a subsidy to the trade between Australia and the New Hebrides, speaking from memory, I am not against the payment of any subsidy. I am quite in agreement with the hon. member that this is money not for the benefit of Australia. I think the amendment will be carried; but the difficulty in Senator Higgins' motion may be met in some way—some means devised by the honorable member himself.

TANFORTH SMITH.—Does the honorable member think that, seeing the British people have taken possession of the New Hebrides, the natives should be allowed to work on the land?

O'KEEFE.—So long as we have the Australia policy, we should not do so in an entirely illogical manner if we allow the products of kanaka labour to enter Australia duty free; and, as the honorable member Smith cannot deny, is what must lead to.

MATHESON.—What about the

O'KEEFE.—I have already agreed with Senator Matheson on this; I should be in favour of doing away with the subsidy to-morrow. In my opinion, Senator Smith would not be doing any violence to his own feelings if he were to agree with the amendment.

Senator TRENWITH (Victoria).—I should regret to see either the amendment or the original motion carried. To carry the amendment would place the Senate, and also Senator Higgs, and those who think with him, in a false position. A very vigorous contest is going on between the majority of the Australian people and the minority. The latter think that any restriction, within or without the Commonwealth, with regard to race or colour, is unwise; but the great majority urge that it is right we should keep Australia, of which we have taken possession, for the people of our own race. That is a defensible position, which commends itself to the judgment of a very large number of persons. The amendment is capable of being used as an argument to show that we want, not only our own country, but also the other fellow's country for our own people. That is an unwise position in which to place ourselves. There is an idea amongst honorable senators that the amendment might be carried as preferable to the motion. At the first hurried glance I held that view—that if we were to have one of two evils, the amendment of Senator Higgs presented the lesser. I am still somewhat inclined to that view, but, considering the false position in which it would place those who advocate a White Australia—considering the plausible argument which it would afford to our opponents to show that the demands of the advocates of the policy are unreasonable—it would be a tactical blunder to adopt the amendment. As to the motion, it has been said that it does not involve the fiscal issue. I am not one who is always going about seeking to discover covert motives on the part of those from whom I differ; and I believe that Senator Smith has no desire to raise the fiscal issue—that he has no desire, as has been suggested, to “sneak in” free-trade under a disguise. But, undoubtedly the motion does raise the fiscal issue, and in a very undesirable manner. We shall be asked in the very near future, I hope, to consider the very important question of preferential trade within the Empire. Assuming that the policy of preferential trade is accepted—which I confess is my view—then will arise the question of what kind of preference shall be given. We shall then have to decide what shall be the degree of preference—whether we shall admit goods from other parts of the Empire free, or whether there shall be discriminating duties; whether British imports shall still be subject to duties, but the imports of other nations to higher duties. Whenever that question comes to be discussed, it is all important that we should be unhampered by any previous act of our own. If we carry a motion of the kind before us, it would have an extremely prejudicial effect in the discussion of the fiscal question. It would be said that, without consideration, we had given the right to persons not belonging to the same Empire, to send in their goods absolutely free of duty; and that would settle the whole question in reference to preferential trade. We could not then make new conditions, or could only do so with great difficulty; and the issue is altogether too important to be determined thus lightly. And even supposing there were no great prospects of injury, such as I have indicated, the result of the motion must be infinitesimal. What practical increased settlement or advantage could be got by removing the trifling duties which are now imposed on the products of the New Hebrides?

Senator PEARCE.—English settlers would be prevented from becoming French subjects.

Senator TRENWITH.—What I say is that the object to be gained is insufficient. I do not think that the motion would have the result of preventing British settlers in the New Hebrides from becoming French subjects. The advantages offered them by the motion are so slight that, in my opinion, no appreciable difference would be made in the settlement.

Senator PEARCE.—Duty to the amount of £3,000 was paid on one item alone.

Senator TRENWITH.—That proves that the New Hebrides settlers are sending their products here now. But, after all, £3,000 is a very trifling sum to expend in securing increased settlement in any part of the world.

Senator PEARCE.—That is what Senator Smith says.

Senator TRENWITH.—What I mean is that the sum is so small that the result would be practically nil; I do not say that if we could secure increased settlement, the money would not be worth spending. Great consideration should be given to the suggestion by Senator Higgs that there is an urgent necessity to increase settlement side the Commonwealth. If we have shilling to spare for the purpose, we ought to try to induce settlement in Australia and not in other directions.

Senator MATHESON.—Then the honorable senator would cease the subsidy?

Senator TRENWITH.—Personally, I should do so; but I make that statement somewhat hurriedly without much consideration, because I have not looked at all possible advantages of a subsidy. A subsidy, however, is very different from preference to imports; a subsidy is a preference to both exports and imports.

Senator MATHESON.—With an object view.

Senator TRENWITH.—I am dealing simply with that point of view. I have not sufficient knowledge to be able to speak with confidence, but it may happen in the future the New Hebrides may develop into an important customer for Australia, and, if that be so, the fact would be a strong justification for a subsidy which, instead of being a preference to imports in our market, would be a preference in the New Hebrides markets to imports from Australia. Senator Smith has conferred some advantage on the Senate by introducing, with extreme lucidity, a somewhat obscure question. The honorable senator has directed the attention of Parliament to the matter, and to that extent has served a useful purpose. But I feel that Parliament would be acting extremely unwisely, in view of all the surroundings of the case, by taking any special action. It cannot be said that the fiscal question is not involved, because that and nothing else lies at the basis of the motion.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—My motion begins and ends with the New Hebrides.

Senator TRENWITH.—Parliament cannot deliberately adopt a new principle and say that it ends anywhere.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—These are the only islands in the Pacific not owned by Europeans.

Senator TRENWITH.—That does not alter the matter. If we give to people on lands which do not belong to us a preference which we do not give to the people of the British Empire, we shall place ourselves in an extremely illogical position.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The French give greater preference to the colonists in these islands than they do other French people.

TRENWITH.—That might be if the view were that we whatever the French do; but an argument which would come I am sure, even to Senator Pearce to call attention to the of taking any step in regard duties—any step which affects issue in its essence—at this in the near future may in extreme difficulty. I shall the amendment, because I see danger to the views which I shall also vote against the on, which I hope will be nega-

PEARCE (Western Australia). Senator Trenwith, I have always advocate for a White Australia vote against the amendment because I have weakened in my White Australia, but because I it does not affect that policy the other.

OBSON.—The views of Senator at point are quite correct.

GIVENS.—That may be so, and y not be correct; but I have as any one else to express them. n a State which is more affected ured labour question than any of the Commonwealth, I ought y fair position to draw a right

It appears to me that some nators hold the view that, while, compel the producers in Aus- employ white labour only, still allow those who produce by our elsewhere to dump their own on our stores as freely as TRENWITH.—No one has said against both the motion and ent.

GIVENS.—I am now alluding de taken up by Senator Pearce, eve, by Senator Smith. The producers in the New Hebrides ish subjects is exceedingly limi- if the whole area of the islands ed solely by settlers of British ed not amount to a very large Senator Smith admitted in his opening remarks. But, although the number of British settlers there may not be very large, they may produce a very great deal.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The area is not big enough.

Senator GIVENS.—I maintain that the area is very considerable. This Parliament in its wisdom has declared that it will only encourage production by white labour in Australia. That principle has been clearly laid down in regard to sugar. If this motion be carried, there will be nothing to prevent a small number of settlers from each taking up a very large area in the islands, and employing coloured labour in the wholesale production of sugar, and dumping down their product here to compete with our white-grown sugar.

Senator PEARCE.—The motion refers to the natural products of the soil, and sugar is a manufactured product.

Senator GIVENS.—The natural products of the soil may take very many forms. Raw sugar, for instance, is not usually styled a manufactured product.

Senator PEARCE.—It has undergone a process.

Senator GIVENS.—If the honorable senator is prepared to draw that fine distinction, then maize, to be a natural product, should be brought over on the stalk, and in the husk.

Senator MCGREGOR.—What about copra?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That comes in free.

Senator GIVENS.—Copra does not, and is not likely to come into competition with any Australian product. According to the fine distinction which Senator Pearce draws nothing is really a natural product.

Senator PEARCE.—That is an economic term which is well understood.

Senator GIVENS.—In its legislation this Parliament has laid down the principle that no encouragement shall be given by means of the Tariff or otherwise to the employment, or to the products, of coloured labour; and now Senator Smith proposes that we shall give to persons living outside our shores privileges which we deny to our own citizens. I maintain that we should not give to any person outside the Commonwealth a privilege, or concession, or favour which the humblest citizen of the Commonwealth may not claim as his own.

Senator PEARCE.—Does the honorable senator think that sugar-cane would be imported?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—This proposal is not made for economic reasons, but to prevent a foreign nation from coming close to our door.

Senator GIVENS.—No matter for what reason the motion is moved, it is bound, if carried, to have an economic effect. At any rate, we should stultify ourselves by going back on the principle which we have laid down for our own citizens. Senator Smith proposes to allow the citizens of another country to do things which we do not allow our own citizens to do.

Senator PEARCE.—In respect of what article?

Senator GIVENS.—In respect of products grown by coloured labour, and giving them a protective advantage.

Senator PEARCE.—What products does the honorable senator refer to?

Senator GIVENS.—The product may be maize.

Senator PEARCE.—Where is it laid down in the laws of the Commonwealth that maize cannot be grown by coloured labour?

Senator GIVENS.—The whole trend of our legislation is against the employment of coloured labour. I can well understand that if a person is very much in love with his own ideas he can easily find excuses for his action. Not only shall I vote for the amendment, but I shall vote against the motion if the amendment is made. Senator Smith has laid it down as a principle, that the Commonwealth, if it be possible, should not allow any foreign nation to have any control over any islands within 2,000 miles of our shores. That is equivalent to saying that, because we happen to be Britishers, we have a right to grab all the country we can lay our hands on, but no other nation is to be allowed to extend its territory.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—We have at least as much right as any other nation.

Senator GIVENS.—Undoubtedly; and we have exercised that right in a greater degree than any other nation. And yet the honorable senator advocates a dog-in-the-manger policy. He says we do not want these islands for ourselves, but we will not allow any other nation to have them. I wish to point out the utter absurdity of one argument he used. He says that we must occupy every island, or at least prevent any other nation from having any control over any island within 2,000 miles of our shores. If, in pursuance of that idea, we ultimately expand our boundaries so as to include the New Hebrides, that very act will compel us to immediately occupy every island within 2,000 miles of our group.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That is very absurd. I said within 2,000 miles of Australia.

Senator GIVENS.—If we were to follow up that idea, we should have to ask Germany to immediately take back New Guinea, and Holland to clear off New Guinea, and Holland to clear off every possession in the Malay Archipelago, because all those islands are within 2,000 miles of the borders of the Commonwealth.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That is more than 2,000 miles from Melbourne and Sydney, though.

Senator GIVENS.—Melbourne and Sydney do not constitute the wealth of the Commonwealth.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That is to say, they contain the principal population in the Commonwealth of Australia.

Senator GIVENS.—I do not take a narrow view of the Commonwealth. It includes only Melbourne and Sydney, but that the interests of people outside those two great cities must be entirely overlooked. We have quite enough to do to look after our own affairs, without meddling with the foreign affairs. We have quite enough to develop this sparsely populated Commonwealth, and to build up quietly and peaceably a nation, without developing a foreign policy. If we begin to meddle with foreign affairs we shall immediately run the risk of foreign aggression.

Senator PEARCE.—Supposing a foreign nation commences to meddle with our affairs?

Senator GIVENS.—It will then be enough for us to meddle with them.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—If we desire peace we ought to prevent other nations from having facilities for attacking us.

Senator GIVENS.—France, as far as we or any one else knows, has never been an aggressive hands on the New Hebrides. If she did she has just as good a right to do so as either Great Britain or Australia, because that group is as close to some of her possessions as to Australia. If we lay down the principle which Senator Smith has enunciated, we shall immediately give a cause of offence to France, or any other nation which may wish to expand its territory in that direction. I do not think it would be wise for the Commonwealth to go out of its way to ce to any nation. GIVENS.—I suspect that that ts for the magnanimity with which all the senators for Western Australia, except one, are so eager to throw the maize-growers over to the tender mercies of the foreign producer who employs black labour.

Senator PEARCE.—There is evidently one Simon Pure in the Senate—one senator whose motives are unimpeachable.

Senator GIVENS.—When my motives are impeachable I hope the honorable senator will impeach them.

Senator PEARCE.—I would never take the task on.

Senator GIVENS.—I would not have questioned the attitude of the honorable senator if he had not gone out of his way to indulge in some banter at the beginning of my speech, and now when I return the compliment he seems to be somewhat offended and cannot take my remarks in the same good spirit in which I am willing to take his.

Senator PEARCE.—I am only expressing my admiration for the honorable senator.

Senator GIVENS.—I am quite independent of the honorable senator's admiration or otherwise. Take the position of the maize-growers during the present year in South Queensland and New South Wales. In many portions of Queensland during the last season they made very great losses indeed. Owing to the prevalence of storms during the earlier part of the year, the crops of maize were thrown to the ground without cobbing, and the produce did not exceed one-fifth, or in some cases one-tenth, of what ought to have been obtained. It was the same in other places. Yet the market value of the crop did not exceed 1s. 6d. per bushel. At the present moment in Brisbane maize can be bought for 1s. 9d. a bushel, and in Melbourne I believe it fetches 2s. a bushel. Yet it is proposed to take away from the maize-growers the small amount of protection they now have, and allow the products of coloured labour in the New Hebrides to come into contact with theirs. The maize crops in the New Hebrides may be very considerable indeed, because a large part of the land is suitable for maize culture, and the people only grow it as a secondary crop while the cocoanut plants are ripening. If they are able to dump their maize down in Australia it will be considerably to the detriment of Australian growers who produce by means of white labour.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The object is to give the agricultural labourer a bit of a lift!

Senator GIVENS.—I suppose it is thought that the agricultural labourer will be able to demand a higher price for his labour if the products of coloured labour are brought into competition with his.

Senator HIGGS.—The wages paid in the New Hebrides are like those paid in New Guinea—a plug of tobacco per month.

Senator GIVENS.—Yes, with an occasional chip hat thrown in for the gin! I intend to vote against the motion altogether. I trust that honorable senators, when the issue is plainly put before them, will vote in accordance with the principle which has already been laid down by the Commonwealth Parliament, with the emphatic approval of the people of Australia, that no encouragement shall be given to the employment of coloured labour, but that we shall do everything that is possible to maintain conditions such as will tend to build up a white Commonwealth. To do that it is absolutely essential to protect to the fullest possible extent the products of our white people from competition with the cheaper products of coloured persons elsewhere.

Senator MULCAHY (Tasmania).—I intend to oppose both the original motion and the amendment, but for somewhat different reasons from those which have been advanced by the last speaker. My principle reason is that the motion itself indicates a very important departure in national policy, which, I think, should have been introduced under the imprimatur of the Government. I fear that the honorable senator who has moved the motion did not sufficiently weigh the consequences and the principles involved in it. It seems to be an unfortunate thing that during the present session, owing to the absence of other business, the Senate has been largely reduced to the position of a debating society. We have been continually debating abstract motions.

Senator HIGGS.—That is rough on Senator Smith!

Senator MULCAHY.—I give the honorable senator full credit for the trouble he has taken in connexion with this subject. He has given us the benefit of information which honorable senators would not have been able to gather except by means of such speeches as he has made. But we should be careful to see the consequences of such proposals as that upon which he asks us to express an opinion. The question is a highly important one, and involves principles which the mover of the motion did not take into account, such as the question of preferential trade, which certainly ought not to be determined in regard to one small group of island although there may be reasons which would induce me to support that policy upon general principles. I do not say that I object to the principle laid down by Senator Smith, but my point is that the question is one of those with regard to which we should not be called upon to express the deliberate opinion of the Senate in the manner proposed.

Senator HIGGS.—Surely the honorable senator would not tie the hands of the Senate in the event of the Government now bringing forward a motion?

Senator MULCAHY.—No; no one has right to object to any question being brought forward by any honorable senator who chooses to invite an expression of opinion with regard to it. My objection is that this is a large question of national policy, for which the Government, not a private senator, ought to be responsible. It ought not to be forced on the Government, but should be carefully thought out by them. It also involves an important fiscal departure. I am surprised that Senator Pearce, who is usually so logical, does not see the effect of the motion upon the White Australia policy that has been affirmed by the people of this country. The motion would have very important results in that direction, and altogether it is sufficiently important to be introduced by a responsible Minister expounding a responsible policy.

Debate (on motion by Senator CROFT) adjourned.

CONVERSION OF GUNS.

Senator MATHESON asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. What is the cost of converting a 12½-pound B.L. gun into a 15-pounder B.L. gun, including cost of packing, shipping, and all shipping and agency charges to the works in England?

2. What would be the cost of a new 15-pounder B.L. gun, of modern construction, in England?

3. What would be the cost of an 18-pounder gun of the pattern recently adopted by the British Government?

4. Do the Government of the Commonwealth still propose to purchase twenty 15-pounder B.L. guns in view of the fact that guns of this type are now being displaced in the British Army by the new 18-pounder guns?

Senator DAWSON.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

1. The cost of conversion of a 12½-pounder B.L. gun, carriage, and limber into a 15-pounder B.L. gun is £500; cost of packing, insurance, freight &c., say £23; total, £523.

Mr GUTHRIE.—That is the cost one presume?

Mr DAWSON.—I presume that is both ways.

Cost of a new 15-pounder B.L. gun, carriage, limber, including estimated charges of transport, insurance, and packing, &c., would be

There is no information available here.

PRESENTATION OF GUNS TO MUNICIPALITIES.

Mr MATHESON asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

As a fact, as stated in the Age of the 6th inst., that the Government of the Commonwealth have offered to return to the Government of Western Australia for presentation to municipalities a number of obsolete muzzle-loading field guns present in that State; and that the Government of Western Australia have declined the offer on the grounds that the cost of sending the guns to the municipalities would be too great?

Do the Government have any objection to the offer direct to the principal municipalities in the gold-fields and at the coast in Western Australia?

Has the Minister any objection to laying on the table for perusal any correspondence on this subject that has taken place between the two Governments?

At what date do the Government intend to distribute the obsolete field guns now being offered to the municipalities among the municipalities of the various States, from the effective list of obsolete field guns belonging to the Commonwealth set out in Appendix K of the General Officer Commanding's report for 1903-4?

Mr DAWSON.—The replies to the senator's questions are as follows:

In reply to a communication from this Government stating that there were some obsolete guns available for distribution to public parks, &c., in Western Australia, the Premier of that State has replied as follows:—

"The military authorities inform me that there are at present only two guns which could be of use in public parks, &c., namely, those stored at Perth; but these would entail a heavy cost of transport and mounting. As the guns referred to are of little interest, I question if any public authority would care to pay the cost of removal, &c. The eight smaller guns which will be available for replacement by ones of more modern pattern would, no doubt, be suitable for the purposes indicated in your letter.

In view of the above facts, I think it wiser to leave the question as it arises, and do not commit the Government as to its future

2. The Government sees no reason for doing so.

3. No objection.

4. None of the eighty-two field guns mentioned in Appendix K of the General Officer Commanding's report for 1903-4 are at present being distributed to municipalities, as the intention of the General Officer Commanding is to utilize the same until they are replaced by modern guns.

I may add, to complete the answer, that wherever the head of a Government in a State where there are obsolete guns does not take sufficient interest in them to make use of them, the Department will have no objection to deal directly with the municipalities.

TRADE MARKS BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 10th August, vide page 4018):

New clause (proposed by Senator PEARCE)—

Part VI.A.—Trade Union Marks.

69A. In this part of this Act—

"Trade union" means any trade union registered as such under the law of any State or any organization or association of workmen or employees registered under any law of the Commonwealth or of a State relating to conciliation or arbitration for the prevention or settlement of industrial disputes; and

"Trade union mark" means a distinctive mark or device adopted by a trade union for the purpose of designating the products of the labour of the members thereof.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland).—There is one objection to Senator Pearce's proposal which I should like to submit to the attention of those who are inclined to support it. It is intended that the trade union mark proposed should be a guarantee as to the conditions of labour under which the article to which it is affixed is produced; but it will be no guarantee whatever of the quality of the article, or of the material of which it is composed. So far as concerns the public knowing the conditions of labour under which an article is produced, I submit that that is provided for in the Bill with which we last dealt, namely, the Fraudulent Trade Marks Bill. It is there provided that an article may bear upon it a particular description indicating the method of its manufacture. So that any person who makes an article may put upon it a description of the method by which it has been made, and that would include a description of the labour that has been employed in making it. The Bill goes on to provide heavy penalties to insure that that trade description shall be true. By means of the conditions imposed by the Fraudulent Trade Marks Bill the public will be enabled to know whether an article has been produced under fair conditions. The object which Senator Pearce has in view is a praiseworthy one. I believe that nearly every person, in purchasing an article, would be prepared to pay a slightly higher price for it if he had some assurance that the result would be to benefit the actual worker. A trade mark, as generally understood, is a mark put upon goods by a certain manufacturer in order that, if he wishes to build up a reputation for that article and to reap the benefit from it, he may do so in security. Nearly every man and woman, in purchasing certain articles, has a fancy for some particular brand. We have learnt, perhaps, that the manufacturer uses good material in the manufacture of the article. He puts a trade mark upon it in order that the reputation which he builds up may be preserved for his own benefit. I believe that it is a maxim amongst business men that money should not be spent in advertising unless an article is a good one.

Senator GIVENS.—What about the money spent in advertising quack patent medicines?

Senator DRAKE.—I have no doubt that they have some good in them, or people would not buy them. People buy a patent medicine because they have used it before, and believe, at all events, that there is some good in it.

Senator GIVENS.—They generally buy it because they have never bought it before.

Senator DRAKE.—It is now proposed that trade unions may have brands of their own, which shall be put upon goods to indicate that those goods have been made under trade union conditions. But there will be no guarantee whatever as to the quality of the goods or the material that enters into their manufacture. I have spoken of an ordinary trade mark used by a manufacturer with a view to build up a reputation for an article, and derive benefit from it. He wishes the articles he sells to be known as his. Therefore, he puts his brand upon them. But we have heard in the course of this debate of boots that contain no leather, and of woollen goods that contain no wool. There may be manufacturers who are producing those goods simply for the purpose of making money.

They do not care how inferior the quality may be, so long as they make large profits. A manufacturer doing that would say, "I will employ union labour so that I may use the union trade mark."

Senator MCGREGOR.—The unions would not give such manufacturers the right to do so. They would not discredit themselves to that extent surely.

Senator PEARCE.—The public would not be deceived because they would know that the label did not apply to the material, but only to the conditions of labour under which the article was manufactured.

Senator DRAKE.—Such a manufacturer would not put any label of his own upon goods. No shoddy manufacturer puts his own label on his goods. He does not wish the public to connect him with them. If the Vice-President of the Executive Council is right, we have something else to contemplate in this proposal, and that is that the trade union holding the brand will not only insist that a certain class of labour shall be employed in the manufacture of goods to which their brand is applied, but will also insist that a certain quality of materials shall be used in the manufacture.

Senator PEARCE.—I do not think there is any justification for such a statement.

Senator DRAKE.—The Vice-President of the Executive Council certainly says that no trade union would think of allowing the union brand to be put upon goods of a shoddy character.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Not unless the maker's name is also on the goods, that might take the responsibility.

Senator DRAKE.—There is nothing in these new clauses to show that that would be necessary. The class of goods to which I am referring are goods to which the owner's name is not attached. What has been said only goes to show how incomplete the present proposal is, because in answer to the objection I have made, I get one explanation from the Vice-President of the Executive Council, and another from Senator O'Keefe.

Senator PEARCE.—The Vice-President of the Executive Council is not responsible for these clauses.

Senator DRAKE.—Quite so. I understand, from what took place yesterday, that Senator Pearce is satisfied that any manufacturer employing union labour, and complying with union conditions, would be entitled to put the union brand on his goods.

so, we have no guarantee as to of the goods. If an unscrupulous manufacturer, complying with all the conditions, chooses to turn out shoddy shoddy may be distributed the Commonwealth, under cover of union mark.

PEARCE.—And the purchasers w that the labour employed on was guaranteed by the mark, and terial used in their manufacture.

DRAKE.—Quite so; we under. another on that point. I ask senators whether that is not much ovided for in the Fraudulent rks Bill which we have already Under that Bill every manufac stamp upon his goods the fact ere made by trade union labour, e who desired to have goods made union labour could refuse to buy ere not so stamped. We should exactly the result which Senator sires. That would be very much a having a union trade mark which out upon goods of a very inferior nd which might be used as the circulating shoddy throughout and particularly amongst the f trade unions and their families, agst those who, without being onists themselves, prefer to pur- icles made by trade unionists. ointed out that Senator Pearce's n be better achieved under the nt Trade Marks Bill than under nt proposal; and for the reasons iven I think that this proposal id to unforeseen and very unde- nsequences.

MULCAHY (Tasmania).—Sena- e has touched the kernel of this one of its aspects. Honorable sena- ware that many articles produced urne and exported from this State uced under conditions arranged by es Boards meet in Victoria to deter- wages to be paid for the manu- f certain articles, and the Victorian Act regulates the hours and condi- labour in their manufacture. In ustries a minimum wage is in force, n.

GUTHRIE.—That is only in some of industry.

MULCAHY.—I intend to speak branches of industry of which I mething, and of a class of goods have been handling for the greater part of my life, and on which I can speak with some little authority. I find that, in spite of the legislation to which I have referred, these goods are produced in Melbourne in much the same way as they were produced previous to the enactment of that legislation, but under improved conditions for the employes, I believe and hope. So far as cheapness of production is concerned, it is much the same as it has ever been in my experience, which extends in the clothing trade over twenty-five or twenty-six years, during which time I have been dealing with Melbourne warehouses and manufacturers. All who are conversant with trade matters are aware that goods of various grades are required; and if we require a cheap article now we can get it as readily as ever. It will be admitted that a cheap article is generally a common article.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Is the honorable senator speaking of prices, or of the cost of production?

Senator MULCAHY.—I am speaking to the question now before the Committee, and the honorable senator will allow me to speak for myself. I hope I shall be able to express myself in such a way as to be understood.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator is posing as an authority on a certain line of goods, and I thought he ought to be able to explain whether he was referring to the price of an article, or the cost of its production.

Senator MULCAHY.—I dare say I shall be able to do so. I am not posing as an authority upon anything but the business in which I have had an experience extending over a quarter of a century. I was referring to the point properly raised by Senator Drake as to the quality of the article on which the union trade mark is put. I agree with the honorable and learned senator that the trade union mark proposed would be no indication of the quality of the article. There is necessarily, in accordance with the requirements of the public, as much rubbish produced in Melbourne as there ever was. There is as much shoddy manufactured here as ever, though it may be that those engaged in its manufacture are employed under better conditions. Indeed, I have good reason for believing that they are.

Senator GIVENS.—Does the honorable senator object to labour legislation again?

Senator MULCAHY.—I am speaking of its bearing on this question. It would be better if honorable senators who are members of the Labour Party were more tolerant of the opinions of others, and were not so ready to assume that others are speaking against their views. So far as I know, the application of factories legislation to these industries has been beneficial; but I am speaking of the effect of putting a particular brand or trade mark on certain articles. The purpose of a trade mark is to disclose the identity of goods which have some special quality, and some reputation previously earned. That would not necessarily apply to goods manufactured even under the very best trade union conditions. Those goods would not necessarily be any better than they would be if they had not been manufactured by union labour. The trade union mark would only indicate that they were manufactured under conditions approved by the trade union. Whether it is a good or a bad thing, honorable members will have their own opinion, but there are not many trade unions in Tasmania. It may be that some goods of Tasmanian manufacture may find their way into Victorian and other Commonwealth markets, and this proposal—which, to my mind, is entirely foreign to the Bill—may have a very unfair effect in connexion with those goods. The fact that they will not be marked with the trade union brand will be an indication to the purchaser that they have not been made by union labour, and the implication will necessarily be that they are inferior to goods which are so branded, and ought not to be purchased. That may be exceedingly unfair.

Senator GIVENS.—The honorable senator will find that the second part of the proposed new clause shows that the mark is not intended to guarantee the quality of the goods.

Senator MULCAHY.—The trade union mark may be used in a variety of ways. The honorable senator who, with the best intention, has proposed this series of amendments, said yesterday that no trade union would deny the use of its trade mark to manufacturers employing trade unionists on trade union conditions of labour. It is not necessary to argue that a trade union would not deny the use of the trade mark to which it has the sole right to a majority of manufacturers, although it might refuse the mark to one manufacturer.

Senator CROFT.—It would not do so.

Senator MULCAHY.—How can the honorable senator know?

Senator CROFT.—Because I have had personal experience of the working of the system in Western Australia.

Senator MULCAHY.—I have heard Senator Trenwith speak in the same way, but I have also heard that honorable senators and other honorable senators, when the occasion suited them, say that it is extremely unlikely that frequently happens. No honorable senator can take it upon himself to say that the trade unions will do this or that. What the trade unions will do can only be revealed to us in the future; and the question whether we should give them the power to do something which may prove to be exceedingly unjust. In Tasmania we have relied on our export trade very largely. When we joined the Federation in the hope of having free-trade with the other States; and we are here asked to enact legislation which may handicap us in the freedom of trade intercourse with the other States, we cannot but view the matter seriously. It may be that we are not progressive, and that may be one of the consequences of our insularity; but that is no reason why our manufacturers should suffer through having the products of manufacture in the other States marked in some way which would stigmatize the products of our State as being inferior, or as being goods which for other reasons ought not to be purchased. I do not desire, as is often done by clergymen, to blame those of their congregations who are present for the absence of those who are away, but I think it is a pity that so important a matter should be dealt with when there is such a small attendance. It is my desire to encourage trade unionism as strong as is any labour senator. I have always approved of trade unionism. In my opinion the combination and cooperation of people for their mutual protection and advancement is a perfectly right principle, so long as they stop at that. But when it is proposed to furnish such combinations with a power which may be used to the prejudice of others, we should pause and consider what we are doing. It appears to me that possibly these provisions might be utilized as a weapon to the detriment of Tasmanian manufactures, and that would not be in accordance with the Federal spirit, on the strength of which we entered the Federation. As a State which has small representation in the ment, Tasmania is entitled ite different.

Senator MULCAHY.—The object of Senator Pearce is quite different from the object of the Bill.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Trade marks are used to indicate an infinite variety of facts. Some trade marks show that the articles are the production of a firm or are composed of certain materials; others that articles are produced in a certain country, and so forth; and I contend that Senator Pearce's proposal is perfectly reasonable in a measure of this character. I should like to point out to Senator Mulcahy that in the manufacture of English broadcloth, which is perhaps the best of the kind produced, the poorest paid labour in England is employed, while in the manufacture of inferior shoddy tweed from the north of England much higher paid labour under union conditions is employed.

Senator MULCAHY.—I have sold such cloths for a long time, and I am not aware that they have trade marks, though some of them may have.

Senator DE LARGIE.—There are very few manufacturers who have not a trade mark of some kind or another. These trade marks, however, do not indicate the kind of labour employed, but rather the quality or kind of article. These are all matters which we have to consider when discussing whether a trade union label or mark shall be legalized by this Bill. There is no doubt that if a trade union mark were used, say, in Melbourne, it might have some effect on the industries of Tasmania, where trade unionism is almost an unknown factor.
Senator Mulcahy may see in that view a danger to his State, the interests of which he is perfectly right in attempting to safeguard. But those who do believe in proper conditions of employment for men and women, have a right to see that safeguards are applied in that direction, and a trade union label is about the best guarantee that could be devised.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I am sorry these clauses are sought to be introduced in a measure of this kind, to the object and purposes of which they are quite foreign.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Why should not a worker, as well as a manufacturer, have the right to stamp his goods?

Senator FRASER.—Nobody desires to stop a worker from stamping his goods; most people, on the other hand, would rather encourage the practice. But why should we, by an Act of Parliament, give anybody the power to refuse to other persons the right to similarly stamp their goods? In this respect the clause appears to me unfair, proposing, as it does, to give a special right to a trade union.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Just as it is proposed to give a special right to a manufacturer.

Senator FRASER.—A manufacturer uses a trade mark to describe the quality or make of goods which can be bought and sold every day in the week. The clauses which Senator Pearce proposes will be used for the purposes of pressure, and under them, even an employer of union labour may be refused the right to use a label.

Senator O'KEEFE.—No; the object of the clause is to give that right to employers working under union conditions.

Senator CROFT.—Every one who works under union conditions may use the label.

Senator FRASER.—But I might form a union of four or five persons, and yet be refused the right to use a label.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It would not be the union, but the Registrar, who would then refuse the right. He would not register such a union.

Senator DE LARGIE.—We are not discussing preference to unionists.

Senator FRASER.—It is preference of a kind; otherwise why seek to force these clauses into a Trade Marks Bill?

Senator GIVENS.—Does a manufacturer not get a preference by means of his trade mark?

Senator FRASER.—But a manufacturer might be refused the right to use a trade union mark under these clauses.

Senator GIVENS.—Quite right, too, if he does not employ people under proper conditions.

Senator FRASER.—But the right to use the label might be refused owing to mere pique. These clauses will give the power to bring pressure in order to do a wrong to an individual, because, it may be, of some little dispute only indirectly connected with unionism. Such provisions have no right in this Bill.

Senator GUTHRIE.—In what Bill does the honorable senator suggest the provisions should be put?

Senator FRASER.—In a Bill specially dealing with the subject. As to the cheap and dear articles, referred to by Senator de Largie, prices vary from day to day, and from year to year. Articles which were dear ten years ago are cheap now, and vice versa; the cost of an article is no evidence as to proper conditions of production.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I tender regard certain honorable senators have for the well being of wealthy manufacturers or merchants is quite remarkable as is also the utter disregard they have for the welfare of the humble individual who is employed in the manufacture of goods.

Senator DOBSON.—That is an unfair grossly incorrect comment.

Senator GIVENS.—I think I shall endeavour to show that my comment is absolutely correct.

Senator MULCAHY.—There has been much of that talk altogether.

Senator GIVENS.—That may be so, but the estimation of some honorable senators is not correct.

Senator DOBSON.—And in the estimation of many people outside also.

Senator GIVENS.—There are people who do not like to hear the truth spoken. But it is time we had the truth. In the course of the legislation introduced by the course of legislation introduced this and almost every other civilized State the interests of the vast majority have been sacrificed to the interests of a misbegotten minority. The Senate was unanimously supporting the proposal to grant trade marks to individuals or firms, in order to protect them in the fullest possible element of exclusive rights, as against unscrupulous individuals. When we ask that the workmen shall have exactly the same rights, and be entitled to use a distinctive mark showing that articles have been produced under certain conditions, there is immediately a thunderous opposition raised by the very men who were most enthusiastic in extending the protection to the private manufacturer or merchant.

Senator DOBSON.—That is grossly wrong. Is this the sort of stuff that the honorable senator talks in Queensland? If it is a wonder that he was at or near the top of the poll.

Senator GIVENS.—The question is whether I am speaking the truth or not. It is within the knowledge of every honorable senator and other person who followed this debate, that my statements are absolutely correct, and cannot be denied by any one who has any regard for the truth.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator has heard some of us deny them.

Senator GIVENS.—The honorable senator will have to take the responsibility for the denial. The whole purpose of this Bill is to allow any person

Senator DOBSON.—That is a most unfair comment. Labour has nothing to do with a trade mark.

Senator GIVENS.—It will have if we can get our way, and we intend to make a hard fight. I hold the view that labour is entitled to all the protection which can be afforded to it, just as the manufacturers are. This is one means by which we can afford labour that protection to which it is justly entitled. It has been argued that this series of amendments is entirely foreign to the Bill, that even, although it might be desirable to have such provisions on the statute-book, yet they should be embodied in another Bill. I fail to see the necessity for placing these provisions in another Bill simply because a trade union mark is not on all fours with a trade mark. According to the Bill, a trade mark denotes that certain goods have been manufactured or put up by a person, or firm, or corporation.
That is quite right. All we ask on behalf of the workmen is that they shall be entitled to register a trade mark which shall denote that the goods manufactured by them have been made under trade union conditions. If the people are tired and sick of trade unions it will be a great loss to a trade union to have a trade mark, because the people will fight shy of any goods so marked. If, however, the vast majority of the people, even those who are not trade unionists, sympathize with the aspirations of labour, and prefer goods which have been produced under trade union conditions, the trade mark will be a very valuable factor indeed. It will wrong no one, nor will it throw a slur upon any one; it will merely record a solid fact. Is it not reasonable that trade unionists should be allowed to say that their goods have been produced under trade unions conditions? It has been argued by Senator Fraser and others that a great deal of injury might be done by the refusal of a trade union to allow a manufacturer to use its trade mark; and that that course might be taken, even though the manufacturer was producing his goods under trade union conditions and employing trade unionists. Could anything be more unlikely to occur than that?

Senator FRASER.—Can it occur?

Senator GIVENS.—It would be absolutely suicidal for a trade union to adopt that policy.

Senator FRASER.—If it can occur, it is wrong to give the power to the trade union.

Senator GIVENS.—Directly a trade union refused to give a manufacturer the right to use its distinctive trade union mark, he would immediately say, "I shall sack every one of your members whom I employ." What advantage would it be to him to employ trade unionists, if the trade union were so asinine as to refuse to allow him to use its trade union mark? Immediately his request was refused, every member of the trade union would be sacked, or at any rate, the manufacturer would have that remedy in his hands; and, furthermore, he could advertise from one end of the country to the other the fact that, although he was employing trade union labour, and complying with every demand of their trade union, they were so unjust as to refuse to allow him to use their trade union mark. By taking that course he would effectually damn that trade union, and advertise his goods in a manner which a trade union mark would not do. It is idle to go out of our way to imagine difficulties which could hardly occur in practical experience, and which, if they did occur, would provide the manufacturer with a more effective remedy than we could devise. Senator Fraser also urged that a trade union mark might be used for the purpose of pressure. I do not know how it could be used in that way. It could exercise no coercion over the public. I am not quite sure that the honorable senator used the argument in that connexion, but that is what I understood.

Senator FRASER.—That is not the connexion in which I used the word "pressure." What I meant was that a manufacturer employing similar labour under similar conditions might be refused the right.

Senator GIVENS.—Take the case of goods bearing a trade union mark. No pressure would be brought to bear on the public to buy those goods. They would be absolutely free to buy goods bearing a trade union mark, or not to buy them, as they pleased. If they preferred goods bearing the trade union mark, they would undoubtedly purchase them. But if they did not like the mark they would buy others. Senator Fraser's point, that the use of a trade union mark may bring pressure to bear upon an employer who is employing non-union men under fair conditions, is beside the question, because if the manufacturer found that the use of the mark was an advantage he would ply have to induce his men to join the union and use the mark himself. We have analogy in Victoria, which State I believe, led the way in legislation of this character. I am not acquainted with the details of the Victorian Factories Acts, but I understand that involves distinctive marks being put on certain goods which are manufactured by Chinese. Chinese goods are notoriously made by cheap labour under absolute sweating conditions, against which fairly labour, employed under decent conditions cannot hope to compete successfully. According to the Victorian law those goods have to be definitely marked as being manufactured by Chinese. We propose in the clauses to follow that example, and insure, as far as we possibly can, that goods manufactured under fair and proper conditions shall bear upon the face of the mark signifying to the general public that they have been manufactured under those conditions. That is an eminently fair position. If the public in any part of Australia choose to buy Chinese made furniture there is nothing to prevent them doing so. As a matter of fact, many people in Victoria, in buying furniture, notwithstanding the excellent intentions of the Victorian law, often have Chinese furniture palmed off on them, although they object to buy it. One argument that has been used against the clauses is, that in Victoria, where there are Wages Boards and Factories Acts, it is not necessary to have an enactment providing for trade union marks. But we are not legislating merely for Victoria. We are legislating for the whole Commonwealth. The fact that particular legislation may be necessary in one portion of the Commonwealth is no argument against not passing a law which may be urgently necessary in other portions of Australia. Again, although Wages Boards and Factories Acts may insure fair conditions in Victoria, it, nevertheless, is necessary to have trade union marks in this State, for the cause, although the goods may be manufactured in Victoria under fair conditions of which trade unions may approve, they come into competition with goods produced in other places where fair conditions do not prevail. It is, therefore, necessary to have distinctive marks to aid persons, when buying goods, to know whether they have been manufactured under fair conditions or not. For my part I am actuated by a desire to give ed to Tasmania, and his re-State which I have the esent, constitutes my principal reason for taking part in the debate.

I am very sorry to have to admit that in the State of Tasmania there are very few trade unions. Indeed, apart from the miners' unions, we have none in the ordinary acceptation of the term. But I should like Senator Mulcahy to point out how any great injury would be done to manufacturers in Tasmania if this provision were inserted in the Bill. In the first place, we have very few factories in Tasmania.

Senator FRASER.—There are very important ones, though.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I admit that the few manufactures that we have are very important, especially in regard to the fruit and jam-making industry.

Senator FRASER.—There is also the woollen industry, which will become more and more important.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Senator Fraser cannot know much about the woollen industry in Tasmania, or he would be aware that it employs very few hands. But that argument is rather in favour of the insertion of such clauses as these. Senator Mulcahy referred to the clauses as anti-Federal. If we are to look at this matter in a Federal spirit, would Senator Mulcahy say that goods manufactured in Tasmania, where there are no Factories Acts, should be allowed to come into competition with goods manufactured in Victoria, where there is beneficent factories legislation?
As a representative of Tasmania, I say at once that that is not fair, and I am surprised that my colleague should have said that it is un-Federal to insert these provisions because there are no trade unions in Tasmania. It seems to me that the un-Federal aspect of the question is on the part of Tasmania. I am hopeful —indeed I am fairly certain—that it will not be long before we have trade unions in Tasmania. The enormous advantages we have in respect to our water supply, which is unequalled in any part of Australia, are such that it may not be very long before we have large factories worked by the cheapest of all power—electric power. Trade unions will soon follow the establishment of industries. It has often been said that certain manufacturers in this State have removed their business to Tasmania in order to escape from factories legislation. The brush manufacturers have been mentioned in that connexion.
I do not think that there are many operatives in the Tasmania brush trade. It is a small industry. But if the manufacturers removed their business from Victoria to Tasmania in order to escape from factories legislation, it is a thing which should not be countenanced by any means. To use the argument that these clauses are un-Federal, because they would injure Tasmania, is to countenance the action of Victorian manufacturers who remove their business to Tasmania in order to escape from factories legislation, I am sorry to say that there are very few hands engaged in manufacturing industries in Tasmania, if we except those engaged in the preserving and jam-making industries.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Is there a brand put on Tasmanian jams?

Senator O'KEEFE.—Undoubtedly; and as a result Tasmanian jams bring a better price than do jams manufactured in other parts of the Commonwealth.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Does not Senator Mulcahy consider that an un-Federal action?

Senator O'KEEFE.—It would be a very good thing for the people employed in the industry if we had trade unions in Tasmania, able to put a trade union mark on the jam tins, to show that the jam had been manufactured under trade union conditions.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not believe there would be any more of the jam sold.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The difficulty raised by Senator Mulcahy could be very quickly got over if these provisions were adopted, with a result also that many injustices would be removed. The Tasmanian manufacturers would only have to say to their employés, "We wish you to form trade unions, that we may secure the advantage of a trade union mark, otherwise the products of our factories, upon which your wages depend, will have to compete unfairly with the products of factories of the mainland." Can honorable senators say that the employés would not jump at the chance of forming unions? Speaking generally, they do not form unions now, in many instances, because, as in other States, they are afraid of their employers. I submit that it is an un-Federal act for any one State in the Federation to allow manufactures to be carried on within it with an entire absence of proper conditions as to hours, wages, and general conditions of labour, and then to claim that the products of those manufactures should be brought into competition with the products of factories in other States worked under de conditions.

Senator FRASER.—That is left to States to decide.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Where such legislation comes within our province it is us to decide; and the sooner we pass legislation as this the sooner shall we compel States, which have not taken such action to carry factory legislation. I am using this argument because Senator Mulcahy said that if these provisions are agreed their operation may be prejudicial to the interests of manufacturers in Tasmania, will not be able to brand their goods with a trade union mark to indicate that they have been manufactured under trade union conditions. The honorable senator has suggested that people in this State will not buy those goods because they will not see the trade union mark upon them. That may be something in the honorable senator's argument, but I point out that it is the State which refuses to legislate in the same direction as the other States of the Commonwealth that displays an un-Federal spirit.

Senator DOBSON.—Does the honorable senator contend that a trade union mark could be used on Jones' jam as a trade mark?

Senator O'KEEFE.—Yes.

Senator DOBSON.—Has the honorable senator ever heard of two trade marks on the same goods? If a man has a trade mark, can he also have a label indicating the conditions under which the goods were made, and then call that a trade mark? I put it to the honorable senator's common sense.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I have seen goods with trade marks on certain articles. An instance of the kind was quoted in the paper some time ago. Honorable senators will recollect that we were told that Nestles' Milk is marked "Nestles' Milk" and in a different ink it is also marked "Made for export." Senator Dobson speaks of common sense, and I put it to his common sense to say what in the way there is to prevent a second mark being placed as a label on Jones' jam?

Senator DOBSON.—It is not a trade mark; it is a trade union label.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Very well, we do not wish to make it a trade mark.

Senator DOBSON.—Then it does not come within the scope of this Bill.

EEFE.—We wish to have label, a distinctive mark to indicate to the purchaser that it has been made by trade union conditions. There is no unfair in that if we have the label. I do not claim to be a trade unionist, and I insist that we have the label. We have it, I hope we shall have it.

PEARCE.—Suppose the label was the Factories Act of Victoria. Many trade unions would be able to get that label?

PEARCE.—Very nearly all.

DOBSON.—A hundred of them, and many senators wish to call that a trade union label.

EEFE.—I do not desire to have a trade union mark.

DOBSON.—Then, we cannot have a trade union mark.

EEFE.—I think that Senator Dobson is entirely justified in trying to get the provisions inserted in the Bill.

DOBSON.—We could not have a trade union mark, each having the same trade union mark.

EEFE.—We could have a trade union mark branding their goods "Made by trade union conditions." I am afraid Senator Dobson is using quibbles, which he does not much in. Does the honorable senator say there is any objection in a trade union registering a trade union mark, and having that mark on its goods, in addition to any other trade union mark?

DOBSON.—I say that it would be a trade union mark.

EEFE.—My reply is that it is not a trade union mark, but that it should be a trade union mark. We have to have a distinctive mark on goods that have been made under trade union conditions of labour. It does not matter whether Senator Dobson believes in trade unions or not.

DOBSON.—I have said a hundred times that I do not believe in them.

EEFE.—If the honorable senator does believe in trade unions, he should understand that in purchasing goods he would like to give preference to goods made under trade union conditions.

DOBSON.—Certainly.

EEFE.—Then, has not the honorable senator a right to get that article; and by what simpler method could he be given the information than that which is now proposed?

Senator DOBSON.—But we have not the power to do this.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator goes back to the legal question again, and I have admitted that I am not arguing the legal question. The question is whether an intending purchaser should be able to find out in the simplest possible way whether the goods he proposes to purchase have been made under trade union conditions. If he is against trade unionism he will look for an article that is not so branded; but if he is in favour of trade unionism he should be placed in a position, when purchasing goods, to know those which have been made under trade union conditions. That would do no injustice to any one, and I think the Committee will do right in accepting the new clauses proposed by Senator Pearce.

Senator CROFT (Western Australia).—I desire to support the proposals submitted by Senator Pearce, and I shall not occupy the time of the Committee for long, because much that I would have said has already been said by other honorable senators. For instance, I believe in a lot of the "stuff" which has emanated from Senator Givens. I may remind the honorable and learned senator who characterized it as "stuff," that it is more acceptable to the people of Australia than is the high-class politics and logic of that honorable and learned senator.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not think the honorable senator quite knows what I characterized as "stuff."

Senator CROFT. — Senator Dobson, speaking to Senator Givens, said, "Do you give them that stuff in Queensland?"

Senator DOBSON.—Does the honorable senator recollect what Senator Givens was saying at the time?

Senator CROFT.—I know the sense of what the honorable senator said, and I agree with him. I speak as one who knows exactly how unions use their label or trade mark in Western Australia. I was a member of the Western Australian Operative Bootmakers' Union, the trustees of which have registered a trade mark on behalf of the union. The mark consists of a design of clasped hands, and the words "Made by trade union labour." The union allowed employers in the boot trade who employed trade unionists to use their stamp, and, instead of trying to prevent a manufacturer from securing the use of the stamp, our main object—and I was a member of the executive at the time—was to get as many manufacturers as possible to use it. Obviously it was an advertisement for our union, and a means of organizing. After four years' experience in the union I think I can say that we allowed any employer who employed union labour to use our trade mark. Senator Mulcahy has said that these provisions might injure Tasmanian industries, because there are no trade unions in Tasmania, and goods coming from that State to Victoria would not bear a trade union brand. There cannot be many classes of goods manufactured in Tasmania, or else Senator Mulcahy cannot be as patriotic as he claims to be, when he tells the Committee that he has during the last twenty-five years been purchasing goods made in Victoria. I think we can fairly assume that if a trade union brand was stamped upon boots made in Victoria, and not upon boots made in Tasmania, Senator Fraser would always purchase Tasmanian boots.

Senator FRASER.—I do not ask where they come from. I buy a lot of Tasmanian blankets, and I have found them to be very good.

Senator CROFT.—The honorable senator said a good deal about coercion, but what coercion could be used, and who would use it, I am at a loss to understand. I cannot imagine by what means coercion could be used. The only advantage I can see is that manufacturers, by using this stamp, will encourage people to purchase their goods, and thus help to popularize the latter. I believe the average citizen will purchase, and even give a higher price for goods manufactured under proper conditions. I hope and believe that this and the subsequent clauses will be carried. I ask legal members of the Senate not to urge, as an argument, that such legislation has not hitherto been enacted, but to assist us in showing how, in accordance with the wish of the majority, provisions of the kind may be enacted and enforced.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I very much regret and deprecate the tone which has been assumed in this debate by Senator Givens. I have the greatest respect for the opinions of that honorable senator; but when he launches out at other senators, who are guilty of the audacity of differing from him, and charges them with legislating in the interests of the wealthy merchant, and disregarding the interests of the workmen—

Senator GIVENS.—It was only to rent.

Senator BEST.—When Senator Givens takes that line, he is, at least, doing himself a serious injustice. Certainly his attitude and his remarks are not in accordance with the best traditions of debate in this Chamber. I can assure the honorable senator that there are those who differ from him, but who are as honest, and equally anxious with him to conserve the best and the highest interests of the workers.

Senator GIVENS.—Then, all I want to say is, that those honorable senators who follow a very peculiar way of showing their regard.

Senator BEST.—If the honorable senator, in his immaculate attitude, thinks that there is only one way of arguing that end, and that that way is to attack himself, I must concede his argument. There are those of us who have, in the past, done something practical in the best interests of the community, in the enactment of humane legislation, as witness the Factories Act of Victoria, which he himself has passed, and which I had the honour to support. Yet, forsooth, because he does not see exactly with the honorable senator, he is to be most unworthily charged with being a guard for a section of the community, and with being so callous in the discharge of his duty, as simply to represent classes and masses. To speak frankly, I think of the honorable senator that, in my judgment, at all events, the proposals before the Senate do not prove of the value which he estimates.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Union marks have value without registration.

Senator BEST.—If such marks have value without registration, that value has not been demonstrated, at least in Victoria. Of course Victoria is only a limited part of Australia, but if there is any value attached to such marks, there is no reason to prevent any member of a trade union from the owner of any factory working under trade union conditions, branding all goods as manufactured under those conditions.

Senator GUTHRIE.—But the marks are being pirated, and the honorable and learned senator refuses to afford protection.

Senator BEST.—Persons who sell such marks are selling their goods under misrepresentation. By common law they are also under the terms of the Fr

Senator BEST.—It is competent for the executive of a trade union to say who shall have the use of a mark.

Senator HENDERSON.—Not a bit of it!

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable and learned member understand anything about trade unions?

Senator BEST.—I am only reading the words of the clause proposed by Senator Pearce.

Senator HENDERSON.—The honorable and learned member is reading between the lines; hundreds of unions may be affected.

Senator BEST.—In legislating we have to look at what is possible, to say nothing of what is probable; and, under these clauses, it would be perfectly possible, in certain circumstances, for the executive of a union to confine the use of a trade mark to certain traders in the community.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is possible that this building may fall in.

Senator BEST.—Under the clauses, as printed, it would be quite competent for the utmost tyranny to be exercised. Then we must not forget that there are men who, for various reasons, which I need not detail, do not deem it necessary to join trade unions, but who, in their employment, may enjoy exactly the same conditions as are enjoyed by trade unionists. Yet, by reason of the fact that a trade union is able to authorize the application of some particular mark, the necessary inference is that goods which do not bear that mark are made under unfair conditions. In some cases that inference might be true, but in other cases it might be grossly untrue.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Does the honorable and learned member not admit that if it had not been for trade unions those non-unionists would never have enjoyed fair conditions?

Senator BEST.—No one has a higher admiration for trade unions than I have;
and so long as they confine themselves to their legitimate functions, they are capable of doing enormous good, and shall have every encouragement, so far as I am concerned. I have no feeling in this matter, but simply want to show the view which I take. If Senator Pearce's object is to give a guarantee to the public that the goods they purchase are made under fair conditions, he does not carry out that object by these proposals. If the honorable senator would permit a trade unionist, or any body of trade unionists, to go to the executive of a union, and demand as a right the liberty to use a particular mark, that would be an advance. But, further, I am of opinion that if another factory is working under union or fair conditions, it should be competent for the proprietor of that factory, or the workers, to obtain the advantage of the union mark.

Senator GIVENS.—If workers are united, they are a union by that mere fact.

Senator BEST.—That may, or may not be so.

Senator HENDERSON.—Let such people have their own non-union mark.

Senator BEST.—Such a mark might be called a non-union mark if the honorable senator so desires.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Call it a "blackleg" mark.

Senator BEST.—It would be unfair to use the word "blackleg," because non-unionists may be as honest as unionists.

Senator MCGREGOR.—They cannot be.

Senator BEST.—I have yet to learn that honesty is confined to unionists.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I shall prove it to the honorable and learned senator.

Senator BEST.—The honorable senator is undertaking a big task. I am making no reflection on either unionists or non-unionists. I am arguing that if Senator Pearce's object is to give the public a guarantee that goods are manufactured under fair conditions, then, unless the liberty to use the mark is extended to all who manufacture under fair conditions, the object will not be attained, but that, on the other hand, there may be established a system of tyranny which we ought not to sanction.

Senator GIVENS.—How does the Lawyers' Union treat a non-member?

Senator BEST.—In the interests of the public an unqualified man is not permitted to practise.

Senator MCGREGOR.—This is exactly what we wish to provide for in the interest of labour.

Senator BEST.—In the case of law, medicine, and dentistry, it is open to any person to qualify himself for practice.

Senator MCGREGOR.—And so it is with a non-unionist.

Senator BEST.—It has been remarked by Senator Givens that we have been busily engaged in sanctioning the use of trade marks by wealthy merchants only. But that is a great mistake on his part.

Senator GIVENS.—By the merchant only.

Senator BEST.—Any individual in community who produces goods will be entitled to register a trade mark.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Why not give right to trade unionists?

Senator BEST.—Every trade unionist the community who produces an article be at liberty to denominate that article a trade mark if he chooses to apply for just in the same way as will the wealthy merchant.

Senator GIVENS.—It applies to only man who puts goods on the market.

Senator BEST.—It is not confined to any class. The producer of any goods will be at liberty under the Bill to have them denominated by a trade mark. It is incorrect for Senator Givens to suggest that the merchant has his trade mark simply for the purpose of showing the quality of goods. A merchant cannot get a trade mark which will display the quality of goods.

Senator GIVENS. — I did not say that. What I said was that if a merchant manufacturing or putting up any goods which he applied a trade mark, his trade mark would be sufficient to designate that they were of a certain quality.

Senator BEST.—I would draw the attention of the honorable senator to clause 15, which reads—

The essential particulars of a registrable mark shall be one or more of the following particulars:—

- (a) A word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods, and not being a geographical name usually likely to be understood in a geographical sense.

Consequently my honorable friend is wrong in his apprehension in that regard.

Senator MCGREGOR. — The honorable senator used the word "quality" in a different sense.

Senator BEST.—I do not know the sense in which the word was applied. A trade union mark, such as Senator Pearce proposes shall be granted, will not indicate any way the quality of the goods to which it is applied. It will not give a guarantee to the public as to the quality of the goods.

Senator PEARCE. — The honorable learned senator will admit that the quality of any goods is determined by two factors, namely, the labour and the material employed.

Senator BEST.—That is so. But the union labour may or may not be good.

goods which trade unionists have made, surely no injury can accrue to any one. If fair conditions of labour prevail amongst employers who employ non-unionists, they can adopt some kind of non-union mark, and place that upon their goods. They can declare to the world that the goods have been made by non-union labour, if they so desire. We have no objection to any such thing being done. But we contend that it is right that trade unionists should be able to put a mark upon goods which they make, in order that the whole world may know that those goods have been made under union conditions. Persons buying those goods will have the satisfaction of knowing that they have been made under such conditons as trade unionists usually seek to have applied to their calling. A question has been raised as to whether this is the correct Bill in which a provision of this character may, with propriety and decorum, be inserted. I venture to say that any proposition that was put forward on behalf of trade unionists would have to encounter the same kind of opposition.
Whatever Bill was before us, a doubt would be expressed as to whether anything in the interests of trade unionists could be inserted in it. I sincerely hope that the Committee will have no hesitation in saying that Senator Pearce's amendments will not constitute an interference with people who are engaged in the manufacture of goods by giving them the right to impress upon those goods the fact that they were manufactured by union labour.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania). — I should not care to refer to the remarks of Senator Givens were it not for the fact that Senator Henderson and Senator Croft both seem to have misunderstood me. I understood Senator Givens—it was unintentional I am sure—to impute to me and to others that we were very anxious to pass legislation to help the rich trader, but that we would not extend the same justice to the working man. All I have to say is that I hardly think my honorable friend meant it in that way. If he did, we have a right to repudiate the assertion. We are all here to do the best we can for the Commonwealth, and to pass legislation which is just to all classes. But this is not a question of morality or of justice. It is purely a question of constitutional law.
It is purely a question of whether we can legally incorporate these clauses in a Trade

Marks Bill. As I have already intimated to the Chairman, I intend to take his ruling upon two points—first that these clauses are outside the Constitution, and that we have no power whatever to pass them; and, secondly, I intend to argue that the clauses do not come within the purview of the title of the Bill. I contend that the marks for which the clauses provide are not trade marks, but are really trade union labels. It is sub-section XVIII. of section 51 of the Constitution which gives us power to deal with the question of trade marks. That power is simply conveyed in the two words "trade marks." Unless the symbols referred to in Senator Pearce's clauses are trade marks, I take it that we have no power with regard to them. I can find no other provision in the Constitution which enables us to deal with trade marks, with the exception of that which I have just mentioned. But my most important objection to the clauses arises under my second heading—that what Senator Pearce proposes would not be a trade mark within the purview of this Bill, and, therefore, cannot be incorporated in it. A trade mark, as defined in these clauses, means—a distinctive mark or device adopted by a trade union for the purpose of designating the products of the labour of the members thereof.

But I say, most unhesitatingly, that that definition cannot, and does not, apply to a trade mark. It means a trade union label. A trade mark is defined as—some distinctive thing which points out that the goods are the goods of A B.

Senator PEARCE.—Is that the constitutional meaning?

Senator DOBSON.—That is the definition given in Stroud's Judicial Dictionary. I take it that when the Constitution and when this Bill mentions a trade mark they mean a trade mark within the purview of English law and English understanding. Any person who adopts a trade mark has certain common law rights and certain statutory rights. When the Constitution was framed, the term trade mark was used in the ordinary legal sense which we all understand. We cannot, by altering the title of a Bill, or by calling a mark a trade union mark when it is only a trade union label, make such a provision come within the purview of the Constitution or of this Bill. The trade union mark is to be used—

For the purpose of designating the products of the labour of the members thereof.

What have we to do with labour? We all know perfectly well that to make known according to law that certain goods have been made on union conditions, but we cannot do that in this Bill. We have the law three things, first of all, marks, known in England and in other countries since we have had the Trade Mark Act of 1875. Then we have marks, under a Merchandise Marks Act, but no one can contend that a mark in Germany," or "Made by the Government," is a trade mark. It is a mark, and not a trade mark. We have a third class in trade union marks, these are three distinct things, two are creations of statutes, whilst the third is a creation both of common law and of statute. I contend that we cannot do these matters, as is proposed, in this Bill. Let me point out to honorable members how conflicting these clauses are, in the case of a trade mark. The proviso in clause 69c provides—

Union mark shall not be registered if cially identical with or so nearly re-to be likely to deceive a registered or a registered trade union mark.

earth can any trade union mark deceive? There are only about 100 such labels, for I cannot call them marks, that I can think of as such. We might have a label to the effect that these goods are made under fair conditions, or "These goods are made under the labor laws of Victoria," or of the United States, as the case might be. We

"These goods are made under conditions." We might also say, "These goods are made under conditions laid down by the Arbitration Board." I have indicated four possible union labels, and I should like to know how many other trade union labels could be suggested. Yet we have a proposed new clause which can only be re-surplusage, or waste paper, that a union mark is not to be so much as to be calculated to deceive. The proposed new clause 69d proposed admission from some of my hondreds opposite that a label, "Made factories law of Victoria," would apply to one hundred unions. Am

I to understand that the first union which registered that as a trade union label would have the exclusive right to the use of that label? That is exactly what the new clause I have quoted says, and my honorable friends opposite have admitted that there are a hundred unions in Victoria that would be entitled to use the same label.

Senator MCGREGOR.—They have not said anything of the kind.

Senator DOBSON.—I understood Senator Pearce, in reply to an interjection, to admit that there might be a hundred unions in Victoria entitled to the use of such a label, and yet the proposed new clause 69*d* provides that anybody who could find a Registrar fool enough to register a label, or so-called trade mark of that sort, would have the exclusive right to use that label.

Senator FRASER.—Would have a monopoly.

Senator DOBSON.—Of course, it would be a monopoly.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable and learned senator is a very young anti-monopolist.

Senator DOBSON.—Again, one of the essential elements of a trade mark is that certain rights are attached to it as property. It descends to executors, it passes with the goodwill of a business, or the goodwill of goods, and it can be assigned just as one can assign a mortgage or a house. Yet in the proposed new clauses we have these words used—

A trade union mark shall not be assigned so long as its registration continues.

So that the honorable senator actually takes away from the trade union mark which he suggests an essential element of a trade mark. I turn to another definition, which has been quoted before. Kerly on Trade Marks says—

A trade mark is a symbol which is applied or attached to goods offered for sale in the market so as to distinguish them from similar goods and to identify them with a particular trader or with his successors.

How can fifty, one hundred, or one thousand men, working in a factory, be considered a trader? How can we consider the employes of a factory as the manufacturers or inventors of particular goods, when we know perfectly well that their labour, however skilful it may be, is carried on entirely under the direction of their employer?

Senator PEARCE.—But this is intended to distinguish goods the product of their labour from goods which are the products of the labour of others.

Senator DOBSON.—We cannot have a trade mark of that description.

Senator PEARCE.—The quotation the honorable and learned senator has just read proves that we can.

Senator DOBSON.—I say that we cannot have a trade mark of that description. Senator O'Keefe regretted very much that there was no Trade Union Act and very few trade unions in Tasmania. Suppose the Government of Tasmania were to introduce an up-to-date Trade Union Bill, and were to incorporate in it just these proposed provisions, would not the State Parliament have the power to pass such a Bill?

Senator PEARCE.—It would be overruled by the Commonwealth Act.

Senator DOBSON.—The State Parliament of Tasmania has the power to regulate friendly societies, and the power to pass a law dealing with trade union labour, and I ask whether, in view of that fact, anything of this nature, which we introduced into this Bill, would not be ultra vires of the State Act? I venture to think that in dealing with trade union labour the State Parliament of Tasmania would be distinctly and absolutely in order, and if that be so, these provisions, if agreed to here, would be of no force or effect whatever.

Senator FRASER.—Under the Constitution we have no power to control a State.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator is perfectly right. We have to look to our Constitution, and we must admit that in this matter we are infringing the rights of the States? Although Senator McGregor laughs at the suggestion that there is nothing in this Bill, or in the new clauses proposed, to compel the Denton Hall Mill to put a trade union label on their goods, it seems to me a splendid argument to show that we are here getting out of our depth. A trade union under these provisions might rush to the Registrar, and say, "We desire to register this label. These goods were made under the Factories Act of Victoria." But if Victorian manufacturers refuse to have their goods branded in that way, they could do so. If, however, by a law passed by the State Parliament of Victoria, it was enacted that all goods sent out of factories in this State should be labelled, "These goods were made under the Factories Act of Victoria," that I would have to be obeyed. That is the possible argument to show that the Federal Parliament has no power in this matter whilst the State Parliament has the power and I believe it would be a right thing the State Parliament to do. I do not think a trade union mark, such as that suggested, would be of as much value as some of the honorable senators appear to imagine, because factories laws govern the manufacture of goods in almost all of the States.

Senator PEARCE.—I rise to a point of order. Senator Dobson has raised a point of order that these amendments are beyond the scope of the Bill, and are unconstitutional, whilst the whole of his speech directed to proving that it would not be advisable to agree to them. I have to refer to the honorable senator's last remarks, that it might be inadvisable to have a trade union label used in connexion with such an industry as the manufacture of iron. I submit that the honorable and learned senator is entitled at this stage only to state a point of order, and when we have no ruling upon it it may be competent for me to discuss the advisability of agreeing to the proposed new clauses. The honorable and learned senator is not entitled to discuss the clauses on a point of order.

Senator DOBSON.—I have not raised a point of order by interrupting another speaker; but, taking part in the debate on the clauses, I have incidentally during my speech raised two points of order, and now I intend to conclude. When I was interrupted by the honorable senator, I was using the best possible arguments in support of the points of order, by showing that it was for the States, and not for the Commonwealth, to pass laws dealing with trade unions and trade union labels. I gave an illustration to show that while the States have this power the Federal Parliament has not the power.

Senator DAWSON.—Why?

Senator DOBSON.—Because it is given to us by the Constitution.

Senator DAWSON.—Will the honorable and learned senator look at section 1 of section 51 of the Constitution?

Senator DOBSON.—I would ask how many hundred different unions can register a label "Made under the Factories Act."

ARCE.—I can quite understand the book on English law will be of the kind, because no law has never been passed by the United Kingdom. The book gives the meaning or definition of the legislation of the

Senator PEARCE.—So far as a trade union label is concerned, Senator Dobson seems to be arguing either with insufficient information as to what is meant by the clause, or with a deliberate attempt to misrepresent. He has put forward the proposition that there may be a hundred unions, for which only one label will be available. Such a proposition is ridiculous.

Senator DRAKE.—Does the honorable senator say that each union will have its own mark?

Senator PEARCE.—I say that each union will have an absolute right to apply for the registration of its own mark.

Senator DOBSON.—It will only be a label.

Senator PEARCE.—It may be a union of bootmakers, of tailors, or even of lawyers; and there are a thousand and one designations by which the unions can be differentiated. We can quite understand that Victorian unions might adopt the motto "Made under Wages Boards conditions."

Senator DOBSON.—There might be fifty of such mottoes.

Senator PEARCE.—Not necessarily; there might be only one in a particular trade.

Senator KEATING.—There need not be any words at all on a device.

Senator PEARCE.—That is so.

Senator DOBSON.—What would be the meaning of a trade mark without words?

Senator PEARCE.—There is as much room for diversity in trade union marks as in ordinary trade marks, to which Senator Dobson's objection could just as reasonably be applied. A trade mark for butter might indicate that the article was made from pure cream or from Dobson's dairy milk.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator has got hold of a bad argument. Could the man who milks the cows have a label showing that the cows were milked under fair conditions?

Senator PEARCE.—I can quite conceive, after what has appeared in the press to-day, that a trade mark for butter might read, "Guaranteed free from rats," or "native cats."

Senator DOBSON.—That would be the mark of the owner of the factory, and not of the men.

Senator PEARCE.—Who but the owner of the factory would stamp the goods?

Senator DOBSON.—But the honorable senator wishes to give the people who do the labour the right to use a mark.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable and learned senator might just as well argue that a maker of butter has no right to say that the article is produced from the milk of a particular dairy.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator is wrong there.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable learned senator might just as well contend that a trade mark should only designate the last person through whose hands an article passes, though we know that trade marks sometimes designate the whole process which the article has gone through in the hands of both manufacturers and agents.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator is talking about a butter factory owner and not about the labourers.

Senator PEARCE.—I am pointing out that the owner of a butter factory may have his trade mark designate the labour, the material—all that has been done by his predecessors in the course of manufacture and a trade union mark is precisely on the same plane. All that the honorable and learned senator has to say against trade union marks could be urged with equal force against ordinary trade marks. And he has altogether failed to prove that the clauses are unconstitutional, or that they do not come within the purview of the Bill. I am prepared to admit that so far as English law is concerned, a trade union label may not come within the definition of a trade mark: we have power to legislate, and we may make such a label a trade mark within the meaning of the Bill.

Senator KEATING.—In the instance, Senator Dobson contends that the new clause is unconstitutional, and, secondly, that even if it be constitutional it does not come within the purview of the Bill. These two objections really amount to one. The honorable and learned senator points out that we have no express power under the terms of the Constitution to legislate with regard to what is called by Senator Pearce trade union marks. We are told by the honorable and learned senator that under section 51, sub-section xv of the Constitution our powers are limited to "patents of inventions and designs, trade marks"—that there is no power included in that sub-section to legislate with regard to "trade union marks." That, in my opinion, is the whole of the honorable learned senator's argument, so that the exception is taken from the constitutional point of view. In order to substantiate the second objection that the new clause does not come within the purview of the Bill, he quoted from Kerly, or a book, the definition of trade marks asks you, Mr. Chairman, to legislate here, under the Constitution, we cannot define the present conception of "trade marks" held in England to-day. I point out that the law with regard to trade marks in Great Britain, and in every country in the world, has been of gradual growth. In the first instance there was nothing to regulate trade marks, what is known as the common law only in recent times that the State has stepped in, and, recognising the right of individuals to the property of marks which have been identified with their goods for a particular period, the law, provided certain restrictions and regulations with regard to the use of marks. Consequently, we have in England to-day an Act which has been passed in several States of the Commonwealth relating to patents of inventions, designs, and trade marks. Is Senator Dobson audacious enough to contend that the Parliament of Great Britain, with powers for the regulation of trade marks, did not to-morrow incorporate in the Trade Marks Bill provisions such as Senator Pearce has submitted?

DOBSON.—An absolute Parliament can do anything; but we have only powers under the Constitution.

KEATING. — A Parliament with full powers could do so.

FRASER.—Certainly it could, and it should.

KEATING.—Undoubtedly. But the power which is placed by Senator Dobson in the hands of this Parliament does not violate the Constitution, but on a definition by a text writer of what is the present-day concept of the term "trade marks."

DOBSON.—I did not rest my case on that.

KEATING.—If the honorable Senator had not absented himself from the chamber he would have pursued a line of argument, and known that the objections are reduced to one. I pointed out that, under sub-section 51 of the Constitution, we have no power to legislate in regard to—patents of inventions and designs, and trade marks.

definition of "trade marks"? Is it the definition of the term given in the Constitution, or in the English Act? The only definition of the term that we have is one given by a text-writer; and, as I have pointed out, the law in regard to trade marks has been of gradual growth. In the first instance, it was entirely common law. Then, as things developed, the Parliament of Great Britain stepped in, and proceeded to regulate and consolidate a lot of common law, which is the result of judicial decision and common usage, and to say, "These shall be the provisions regulating what are known as trade marks." But as society proceeds and the complications of trade relations increase, the conception of a trade mark may alter to this extent: that it will necessitate the Parliament of Great Britain to legislate in a Trade Marks Act in the very direction that Senator Pearce is asking us to do, and then Mr. Kerly, Mr. Sebastian, and all other text writers, would have to alter their expression of the then present-day conception of what a trade mark is. The Parliament of the Commonwealth is not bound by the definition which may be given by Mr. Kerly or Mr. Sebastian of what is the conception of a term applied to certain trade conditions which are altering with every day and every year. And that is where Senator Dobson's objections to these provisions from the points of view of constitutionality and of being without the purview of the Bill are reduced to one. What is a trade mark? What definition of a trade mark are we circumscribed by in our legislative action? There is no definition but the needs and requirements of the trade and commerce of the Commonwealth. These are the only circumstances which bind us in our legislative action, just as they bind the Parliament of Great Britain in its legislative action in regard to trade marks, and we can choose to regard what, according to our local conditions, would not apply in another country as a trade mark. In this Bill we have no definition of a trade mark. Senator Dobson has told us in effect by his two objections that we are bound by the definition given in a text-book. Very well. If we are bound by that definition of what is the ordinary present-day English common law concept of a trade mark, where is the necessity for clause 5 of the Bill?—

Subject to this Act or any Act of the Parliament, the common law of England relating to trade marks shall, after the commencement of this Act, apply throughout the Commonwealth.

That common law is made expressly by this Bill to apply to our law, but subject to its provisions. That shows that we are not absolutely bound by the common law of England, and that the Constitution, which is for all time, is not to be read, subject entirely to the present-day common law concept of trade marks in Great Britain. In opposing the insertion of these clauses last night, Senator Dobson rested his objection mainly on the fact that he would not allow any legislative assistance to the establishment of a label, containing the words, "These goods are made by fair labour," and he elaborated that as long as he possibly could, notwithstanding the fact that Senator Pearce and others informed him that they were not attempting to do anything which would mean the creation of such a specific device.

Senator MULCAHY.—Senator Pearce implied that they would.

Senator DOBSON.—"These goods are made under fair conditions."

Senator KEATING.—I understood Senator Pearce last night to say that he wished to see the organizations able to get a label or device that would indicate to the people that the goods had been made under fair conditions.

Senator MULCAHY.—The honorable and learned senator did not hear him, for he indicated that those words would be used on the device itself.

Senator KEATING.—If my honorable colleagues will possess their souls in patience I have not the slightest doubt but that a perusal of the Hansard report of Senator Pearce's speech will correct the impressions which they now entertain. What Senator Pearce said last night was that he wished to enable trade organizations to indicate to the public that certain goods, the product of certain manufacturers, were made under fair conditions. Senator Dobson seized that term, and wished to argue that the object of Senator Pearce was to have the goods branded with the words, "Made under fair conditions."

Senator DOBSON.—Did I not understand Senator Pearce to read the words from the American or Canadian Act? That was a distinctive label.

Senator PEARCE.—No.

Senator DOBSON.—What was the label then?

Senator PEARCE.—There was no label mentioned.

Senator KEATING.—If Senator Dot had consulted the law of New York, of which Senator Pearce read, he would have found that there is as much diversity as in the case of trade marks.

Senator PEARCE.—These clauses practically framed on the provisions of law.

Senator DOBSON.—But the honorable senator gave as an instance of a label the words, "These goods are made under conditions."

Senator KEATING.—Not to my knowledge. Last night Senator Dobson rested the whole of his opposition on those words.

Senator DOBSON.—No; that was part of my opposition.

Senator KEATING.—The honorable learned senator was constantly complaining that the object of Senator Pearce was to have those words printed on certain goods. But to-night he comes here, in opposition to the clause, and says, "I cannot see how the Registrar would register such a device." All he was afraid last night was that the Registrar would register such a device, and that certain people would get all the benefit of it. He has not got very much further out of darkness, because now he can only register six possible devices—"Made by Union labour"; "Made under—"

Senator DOBSON.—Can the honorable and learned senator give us a few of those?

Senator KEATING.—I can give the honorable and learned senator a thousand.

Senator DOBSON.—Give us two or three out of the thousand.

Senator KEATING.—The honorable learned senator will get quite enough before I have finished. We have been asked by an honorable senator who is to be judge of the persons to whom these labels should be issued, and we are told that the whole position will be that the particular organizations registering these labels, names, or marks will have a monopoly. I wish to show what Senator Dobson is responsible for having placed on the statute book of Tasmania. I have no hesitation in saying that it is quite competent for a trade union to carry out in Tasmania any object which Senator Pearce has in view. In the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, passed at the instance of Senator Dobson's Ministry in 1893, I find the definition in the interpretation section—

"Design" means any design applicable to an article of manufacture, or to any substance, a thing or partly artificial and partly natural the design is applicable for the patent the shape or configuration, or for the use thereof, or for any two or more of such uses by whatever means it is applicable, printing, painting, embroidering, carving, modelling, casting, embossing, staining, or any other means whatever, mechanical, or chemical, separate or combining a design for a sculpture or other work the protection of the Sculpture Copyright Act.

55 of the Act, I find this provision that any person claiming to be the proprietor of an original design not previously registered in Tasmania register the design under this Act.

DOBSON.—Is "Made under a design" a design, or is "Made in accordance with a trade mark" a design?

KEATING.—Undoubtedly it may be a design, and I venture to say that it is quite competent to register in such a design as Senator Pearce gave power to a trade organization to register in the Commonwealth.

DOBSON.—Would they put "Made in accordance with a trade mark" as a trade mark design?

KEATING.—I am not aware that Senator Pearce desires to put "Made in accordance with a design" or anything of the kind, as a design. If he wished to register an original design, he would not as a design give a map of Australia with a pair of trousers drawn on it.

DOBSON.—That would not show a design.

KEATING.—Would that not show a design?

PEARCE.—Certainly; any distinctive design would.

KEATING.—Any distinctive design would indicate to people generally that these articles were made under the conditions would effect his object.

DOBSON.—But how can you get a design unless you state it as a label?

KEATING.—That is the trouble with Senator Pearce, and not of my honored friend.

DOBSON.—That is the trouble with the Bill, and that goes to the root of the business.

KEATING.—If a copy of a design is advertised in a daily newspaper and it is stated that it will be used by a person or organization to indicate to the public that certain goods are the product of union labour, is not that sufficient for their purpose? Section 56 of the Tasmanian Act provides for drawings to be furnished on application, while section 57 provides for a certificate of registration. Section 58 reads—

When a design is registered the registered proprietor of the design shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, have copyright in the design during five years from the date of registration.

Senator DOBSON.—Would the honorable and learned senator call the device "Made by Chinese labour" a design?

Senator KEATING.—I am not responsible for the form of the design. I do not suppose that any of the trade unions would turn to the fertile brain of Senator Dobson for a design for a mark. I come now to section 66, and I venture to bring it to the notice of Senator Fraser, Senator Dobson, Senator Millen, and others who are so dreadfully afraid that a monopoly is to be given to trades unions by this provision. It says—

During the existence of copyright in any design—

1. It shall not be lawful for any person without the licence or written consent of the registered proprietor to apply, or cause to be applied, such design or any fraudulent or obvious imitation thereof, in the class or classes of goods in which such design registered, for purposes of sale to any article or manufacture or to any substance, artificial or natural, or partly artificial and partly natural; and

2. It shall not be lawful for any person to publish or expose for sale any article of manufacture or any substance to which such design or any fraudulent or obvious imitation thereof is so applied, knowing that the same has been so applied without the consent of the registered proprietor.

According to Senator Dobson, when he had light, as he provided by this statute, it would be competent for a person to register an industrial design. Having registered it, that person alone had the sole power to monopolize the design. He could license whom he chose to use it. He could refuse to license whom he chose. Yet to-day Senator Dobson stands here, and, when a similar power is asked for on behalf of an organization, he says that it is entirely outside the purview of this Bill, and that we are going to create a monopoly. He said, in addition, that if we pass this legislation, and designs are adopted by trade unions, and the use of a design is offered to the Denton Hat Mill, a union could not compel the mill to use it.

Senator DOBSON.—How could they?

Senator KEATING.—No one wishes to do so.

Senator DOBSON.—Then how is the trade union label to be put upon goods?

Senator KEATING.—Manufacturers need not put the label upon their goods unless they choose. If a union registered a particular device, and could not get any one to use it, that would be the union's trouble, not Senator Dobson's. If any union chooses to take advantage of these clauses, and afterwards finds that no manufacturer is prepared to use its design or mark, that is not our trouble. In many instances there will be people who will take advantage of the clauses as long as they consider that it is to their interest to do so.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable and learned senator is ignoring the whole law of trade marks.

Senator KEATING.—Senator Dobson has forgotten what I said a few minutes ago. How difficult it is to argue under such circumstances! I told him that, in my opinion, we have the fullest possible power under the Constitution with regard to trade marks.

Senator DOBSON.—I say that we have not.

Senator KEATING.—I will take the honorable and learned senator step by step. I hope that the Committee will excuse my repeating myself, but it seems to be necessary to do so. I say that we have the fullest possible power to legislate with regard to trade marks. What are trade marks? There is no definition of trade marks in the Constitution. Our powers are determined not by what is the present day concept, according to the common law of England, of what a trade mark is, but by nothing more nor less than the needs and requirements of the trade and commerce of the Commonwealth.

Senator DOBSON.—We have heard every word of this before.

Senator KEATING.—But Senator Dobson said just now that I had ignored the whole law of trade marks. I hope that he will endeavour to collect his thoughts on this question, and that he will ultimately recognise that we have the fullest power in this regard. If we choose to legislate with regard to a particular class of trade marks, and to make special provision for them, and to take those particular trade marks out of the operation of the remainder of the Bill, it is perfectly competent for us, and within our legislative power, to do so. Senator Dobson has told us, more than once, that the States have the power to compel trade unions to take out marks of this kind, and to compel the application of those marks to union-made goods. Yet this Parliament according to Senator Dobson, has not power to pass even permissive legislative enable an organization or trade union take out a particular mark to be applied to goods. The very fact that, at the present time, the States have the power to pass compulsory legislation, deprives us, Senator Dobson says, of the power to pass permissive legislation. I would again remind him, in order to enable him to see that we are not tied down to the ordinary present day common law conception of a trade mark, that clause 5 of this Bill says—

Subject to this Act or any Act of the Parliament the common law of England relating to trade marks shall, after the commencement of this Act, apply throughout the Commonwealth.

From the debate which has taken place I gather that Senator Drake's objection to the clauses is that we are not dealing with designs. It is not a question of trade designs. There is not in this Bill nor in the Constitution a definition of what a trade mark is.

Senator PEARCE.—Or of what it is not.

Senator KEATING.—We have no definition of a trade mark of any kind; rightly so, I think, because it is for us to leave the development of our trade commerce to prescribe for us from time to time what particular marks in connection with goods shall be regarded as trade marks within the terms of the Constitution. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that with regard to the constitutional point you will rule in favour of Senator Dobson. Senator Dobson has raised an objection which I shall not say is frivolous, but which you are not prepared to entertain.

Senator BEST.—I propose to say only a few words, because the matter has been so fully dealt with by Senator Keating. In dealing with a subject of this kind we have to look to fundamental principles. We have to look to the Constitution itself, which in section 51 enumerates subjects in the shortest possible language. It merely prescribes a skeleton, and it is for Parliament, and subsequently for the High Court, to develop the Constitution in regard to those particular subjects. That remark applies not only to the subjects mentioned in section 51, but generally we have also the inherent power to make laws which are necessary or proper for the purpose of carrying out our terminations in connexion with those particular subjects. Indeed, that is more an inherent power, because it is mentioned in the subsequent portion of section 51, that we have all the incidental powers considered necessary for the dethe subjects enumerated in the

EST.—That is so. Section 51 enumerates the subjects. Of the Constitution had attempted to mention the various powers that were included, or were to be given to the Parliament in regard to the subjects mentioned in section 51, treaties and volumes of unlimited extent would have been required.

It would have been impossible to do it.
But nothing is more interesting than the American Constitution in this regard, where the Courts have clothed these various subjects with meaning, and have developed them. Now each subject in itself has a voluminous literature attached to it, showing the case law already decided in connexion with it, and the various powers incidental to it. The last subsection of section 51 is as follows:—

Matters incidental to the execution of any power vested by this Constitution in the Parliament or in either House thereof or in the Government of the Commonwealth or in the Federal Judicature or in any Department or Officer of the Commonwealth.

So that it will be observed that the duty is cast upon us to develop the powers intrusted to us. Therefore, if I start from the proposition that the fundamental meaning of a trade mark is that it is to distinguish one set of goods from another, then I have to inquire whether under the proposals now before the Committee, the intention is to distinguish goods, which are sold under trade marks registered under these clauses, from other goods. What does the definition clause say? It says that—

"Trade union mark" means a distinctive mark or device for the purpose of designating the products of the labour of the members thereof.

The products, of course, are the goods of the members of a particular union. Consequently I say that where a differentiation takes place with regard to those particular goods, which are the product of the members of a union, the mark of that union may be placed upon the goods. A fundamental distinction is thus created. We are asked now to say that the word "trade mark" shall be taken to include a trade union mark, because a trade union mark is a distinctive mark or device adopted by a trade union for the purpose of designating the products of the labour of the members thereof. On all rules of interpretation it would be most unwise for us to attempt to limit our powers in this direction. I conceive that a proper interpretation would bring a trade union mark within the term
"trade mark," as used in the Constitution, and I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion we have a constitutional right to enact these provisions. That deals with the first point raised by Senator Dobson. The other point as to the proposed provisions not being within the scope of the Bill is practically involved in the first. If this is a Bill intended to deal with the subject of trade marks, and if we are agreed that a trade union mark comes within a proper interpretation of the term "trade mark," necessarily it comes within the scope of the Bill. I could refer to many authorities in this connexion, but I shall content myself with the quotation of this passage from Story on the American Constitution—

But the most important rule in cases of this nature is that a constitution of government does not, and cannot from its nature, depend in any great degree upon mere verbal criticism or upon the import of single words. Such criticism may not be wholly without use; it may sometimes illustrate or unfold the appropriate sense; but unless it stands well with the context and subject-matter it must yield to the latter. While then we may well resort to the meaning of single words to assist our inquiries, we should never forget that it is an instrument of government that we are to construe; and as has already been stated, that must be the truest exposition which best harmonizes with its design, its objects, and its general structure.

I say that the design, object, and general structure of our Constitution is to give us the fullest and widest power in dealing with the subject of trade marks.

Senator KEATING.—Otherwise we should require a new Constitution periodically.

Senator BEST.—Otherwise the necessity for a new Constitution every few years would be involved.

The CHAIRMAN.—With regard to Senator Dobson's first point of order, I must decline to give a ruling. I have an opinion thereon, but it is not my duty as Chairman of Committees to decide a legal point of that kind. It is not the duty of the Chairman of Committees to interpret any Act of Parliament or the Constitution. We have already had a ruling from the President of the Senate on that point, and I also direct the attention of honorable senators to the practice of the House of Commons. In Blackmore's Speakers' Decisions, page 295, I find the following:—

Mr. Speaker does not answer questions on matters which members are equally able to answer. e.g., construction of Acts.

An honorable member asking Mr. Speaker a question relative to a proposed Bill, whether its introduction would not be an "abuse of the privileges of this House such as ought not to be permitted."

Mr. Speaker replied that "the honorable member, and indeed every other honorable member of the House, is equally competent with myself to construe such Acts, and I must leave it to the honorable member to form his own opinion on the matter."

With regard to the other point as to whether the proposed new clauses are within the scope of the Bill, I must say that, in my opinion, they are. The Bill is "a Bill for an Act relating to trade marks." As honorable senators who have already spoken have said, the question is what is a trade mark? We have already decided in the Bill before us, under Clause III., "Registrable trade marks," clause 14—

A registrable trade mark shall consist of essential particulars with or without additional marks. Clause 16 states that the additional matter which may be added to the essential particulars of a registrable trade mark shall be—

(a) Any letters, words, or figures, or any combination of words or figures or of any of them.

I think it is perfectly within the scope and powers of this Committee and of the Senate if it chooses to restrict the use of a trade mark to any particular trade or occupation. I consider also that it is within the scope and power of the Committee of the Senate to include in the Bill a clause which will permit to a registrable trade union the right to use a distinctive label, such as a trade union name, which would be. We may get some light as to what is the intention of the Senate by reference to the Fraudulent Trade Marks Bill, to which the Bill before us is a companion measure. If honorable senators will turn to the definition clause of the Fraudulent Trade Marks Bill, they will see there that a trade mark includes a trade description; and a trade description in relation to any goods is defined to mean "a description, statement, indication, or suggestion direct or indirect," amongst other things, "as to the class of labour by which the goods are made." An infringement of the law carries with it a penalty of £100. There is provided a penalty of fine or imprisonment, and also a forfeiture of goods. I therefore take it that the clauses proposed to be moved by Senator Pearce are distinctly within the scope of the Bill.

Senator DOBSON. — I respectfully agree with your ruling, and I hand in my objection.

In the Senate:

 I agree with the ruling of the Chairman of Committees, and I am of opinion that if the Committee think fit these amendments may be inserted in the Bill.

In Committee:

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).

—I should like briefly to reply to some of the points which have been raised during the debate. It has been said that trade unions will make use of these provisions as an instrument of tyranny. Anyone who views the matter in a reasonable light, and who has listened to the speech made by Senator Trenwith, must agree that for a union to attempt to use these provisions in order to tyrannise over an employer, would be to defeat the object of the trade union mark. The object of providing a trade union mark is to induce the public to buy goods made under trade union conditions.
 If the members of a trade union were to use the power of these provisions in a tyrannical fashion, the employer concerned would make that known, and public opinion, instead of being in favour of a trade union mark, would be against it. The sale of goods so marked would be limited, and that would deter other employers from using the mark. That should dispose of the objection which Senator Dobson brought forward under that heading. I think that was the only important point raised.

Senator DRAKE.—What about the point
 I raised, that it might assist the sale of shoddy?

Senator PEARCE.—In answer to that objection, I have but to say that the public will recognise that a trade union mark is not a guarantee of the materials from which goods are manufactured, but of the labour employed in their manufacture. Any employer who wishes to identify goods with his name, and also with the labour employed in their manufacture, will be able to put his name on the goods, as well as the trade union mark. If the public find that goods marked with a trade union mark, and also with the mark of the manufacturer, are good in material and labour, they will continue to purchase them.
 But if they find that goods marked with the trade union mark are not of good quality they will very soon know whose goods to patronize. The objection is thus met by the remark that the kind of thing feared will work its own cure.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—Having dealt with the matter from the legal aspect, I should like to say that I am going to support Senator Pearce in his endeavour to get those clauses inserted in the Bill. When Senator Pearce previously introduced this question, he desired on the interpretation clause to submit an amendment making "applicant" include any organization. I pointed out then that if the honorable senator succeeded in carrying his amendment, he would not effect the object he had in view—that most of the provisions of the Bill would be found inconsistent with the proposed amendments, and I expressed the opinion that the proper place for such a provision was in an Industrial Designs Bill. At that time the amendments were not circulated, but simply read to us; and now, after more careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the term "trade mark" in the Constitution is a term to receive an interpretation according to the varying conditions and requirements of the time as we progress. If we were bound by the interpretation put on the term by ordinary common law—that is by the common law of to-day—we should need a new Constitution every few years. I think the marks referred to in the proposed clause come within the term "trade mark" in the Constitution, and that it is perfectly competent to insert those clauses in the Bill. As to the merits of the case, I point out to those who are opposed to enabling unions to register marks, that, under present conditions—I particularly draw the attention of Senators Dobson and Best, in order that they may see there is no fear of tyranny—where there is no registration by a union or organization, it is perfectly competent for those organizations in a voluntary way to take out marks and issue them to different traders. The object of these clauses is simply to give those unions who choose to take that step, some property in their own designs, so that nobody else may pirate them—to enable them, as organizations, to own the particular designs or devices, which at present must be taken out in the name of individuals, who may afterwards prove dishonest. The whole object of the clause is to enable organizations to adopt those marks with security to themselves, and to afford certain amount of guarantee to the public. That seems to sum up the whole of the merits of the case. If Senator Dobson, any other honorable senator, fears a monopoly on the part of an organization who registers one of those devices—

Senator DOBSON.—I never mentioned word about monopoly, or used that argument once.

Senator KEATING.—The honorable learned senator used that argument no less than to-night. If the honorable learned senator is afraid of this registration being used as an engine of tyranny—

Senator DOBSON.—I never used such word.

Senator KEATING.—Perhaps the honorable and learned senator did not use words so expressive, but he conveyed the idea that the unions would use the registration to coerce certain employers. That is the fear of Senator Dobson, I suggest that he should add a further amendment to enable the Court, Law Officer Registrar, in certain cases and under certain conditions, where the registered device has been improperly used, to strike the proprietors off the register.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—May I ask Senator Pearce whether he thinks the definition of a trade union mark is clear enough for the Court to determine? The clause says that a trade union mark means a distinctive mark or device "for the purpose of designating the products of labour of the members thereof." To come more refer to the Denton Hat Mills, I ask whether the goods which leave those mills are not the product of the owner? Surely we cannot possibly say that goods manufactured for the owners of a factory are the products of the skilled workmen in the factory.

Senator PEARCE.—Is the honorable learned senator not confusing the term "product" with the term "property"? The goods are the property of the owner, and are the product of the labour of the men.

Senator DOBSON.—The owner of a factory may say that the goods are the product of his skill and capital, and that he employed men to make them.

Senator TRENWITH.—In that case the owner would not use the mark.

Senator DOBSON.—But what I have read is an essential part of the interpretation

DOBSON (Tasmania). — I ask Senator Pearce what is the case I cited before, when
, by registering, is entitled to the exclusive use of a mark? We all agreed,

I think, that, as there is a factories law in Victoria, a label issued under such law might be used again and again. The meaning of the clause, as I understand it, reading it literally, is that the first trade union which gets the right to register the mark will have the exclusive use of it. Does the clause not require modifying so as to enable all union members who carry on business under the factories law to take advantage of the label? If they choose to have different designs, let them do so. How Senator Keating proposes to cause a design of a horse, cow, or a pair of trousers, to inform the world that it means goods made under labour conditions or factories laws, I do not know.

Senator KEATING.—The designs can be advertised.

Senator DOBSON.—It is certain that there cannot be many designs or labels which will be used by trade unions, and it would be a great mistake to legislate so that the first who registered could obtain exclusive use of a label which might be applicable to a dozen other trade unions.

Senator TRENWITH (Victoria).—It is not necessary to have exactly the same design or the same words to convey the same idea. In Victoria, and, I think, in New South Wales also, most unions have a central council—a form of amalgamation—so that probably there will be one design for all the unions. That design might be put on furniture, clothing, boots, hats, and every possible conceivable form of production.

Senator DOBSON.—There would have to be a union of all the unions.

Senator GUTHRIE.—So there is.

Senator TRENWITH.—The central or amalgamated executive, if I may so express it, will simply act for the unions, at the instance of the latter, and the design will probably be used by a hundred distinct organizations, the use being regulated by the executive. I see no difficulty in the matter. If more marks were wanted, they could be arranged for, but, as I say,
the probability is that one mark will serve, at any rate, for each State, and in some instances for the whole Commonwealth, some trade unions being not only amalgamated, but federated. If there was any danger in the arrangement, it ought to be welcome to Senator Dobson, because it would tend to break the system down by its own weight. I know that sometimes the most clear-headed laymen are altogether wrong in reference to legal matters, but it seems to me that no difficulty will arise. This is not a Bill to provide that there shall be a label showing that goods are manufactured in conformity with the provisions of the Factories Act, but merely a Bill giving power to declare to the public that goods are manufactured under certain conditions. But even if it were a Bill to provide for the registration of labels showing that goods have been manufactured in conformity with the provisions of the Factories Act, I am not aware that it would not be possible for even a dozen trade marks to have, in some part, words which are used in other trade marks. If it were not so, it would not be possible to have any great variety of marks. I understand that the validity of a trade mark is not decided by any particular part, but by the whole—by its distinctiveness from any other mark. A trade mark might, three-fourths of it, be similar to some other mark, and yet be completely distinctive, and, if it is sufficiently distinctive to be free from the danger of piracy, it satisfies the requirements of the law.

Senator DRAKE.—Under the Bill an applicant has to disclaim all words that are common.

Senator TRENWITH.—Supposing that the Bootmakers' Union desired to register as a mark—"Boots made under the provisions of the Factories Act," could not the Hatmakers' Union register "Hats made under the provisions of the Factories Act," and so on ad infinitum? It seems to me that that would be sufficiently distinctive.

Senator DRAKE.—I think that these are all trade descriptions.

Senator TRENWITH.—There does not seem to me to be any objection to some words which might be considered advantageous being used by quite a number of persons in connexion with distinctive trade marks. But in this instance it is highly improbable that there would be more than one trade union mark. I believe that one trade union mark would serve for all the unions in most of the States—at any rate, in two of them—and in some respects one trade union mark would serve for the whole Commonwealth.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—The clear-headed layman who has just resumed his seat has thrown considerable light on the point, but he has not quite answered my objection. I can understand that the hat or boot factories might form one union.

But, supposing that one up-to-date factory desiring to take advantage of the Act, to come along and register the words "No 1" under the Factories Act of Victoria." And the other unions came along to register a trade union mark under this provision the Registrar would have to say "No; that provision gives to the first union an exclusive right to the use of that label."

Senator PEARCE.—Has the honorable learned senator observed in sub-clause the words "as long as it is not likely to deceive"?

Senator DOBSON.—Will it allow the same label to be registered over and over again?

Senator PEARCE.—As long as it is likely to deceive.

Senator DOBSON.—I have not discussed this question before, although Senator Keating thinks that I have. All I did to insure is that we shall not give to a trade union an exclusive right to register a label which is really the property of a trade union working under the Factories Act of this or any other State.

Senator TRENWITH (Victoria).—I am reminded by Senator Guthrie of a fact which bears out the argument which I have made. In 1891 a Trades Union Congress was held at Ballarat, and the question of a trade union mark was discussed. There was adopted for the whole of the trades of Australia one design—"888."

Senator DOBSON.—But supposing another union were to go to the Registrar first and ask him to register the mark?

Senator TRENWITH.—My honorable and learned friend is supposing something which could not happen.

Senator DOBSON.—It seems to me that a most ordinary thing that a trade union should wish to get the benefit of the law.

Senator TRENWITH.—Supposing for argument's sake, that a trade union did in and register a mark which was desired by the whole of the trade unions thereby prevented them from using it. What would happen? All the trade unions would say, "That is not our trade mark and the object in taking out that trade mark would be entirely frustrated." For immediately a new trade mark would be desired for the trade unions which respected the wishes of their comrades.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator has not quite caught the point yet. Supposing that it were done in the ordinary course of business. The Registrar from giving the right of user se.

TRENWITH.—What the honorable senator suggests might be about as probable as that we will have some sunshine to-morrow.
The new clause agreed to.

DRAKE (Queensland).—A bill drafted by Senator Walker to the views of those who have expressed an opinion very strongly that these new clauses is to include shall be made under trade unions, as to labour and other clauses, as it is drafted, is in accord with some of the clauses are being moved by Senator Walker not in accord with some clauses have been carried; but as a view which has been expressed by many speakers, it is right that it be submitted to the Committee.
The question is that there shall be no right to prevent an employer from having a trade union mark if his employees are unionists, or if he pays the union rate and complies with other conditions—

Following new clause be inserted—"Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, no trade union shall refuse to authorize any person or employer who adopts the trade union and the hours of employment fixed by the trade of such trade union of the Commonwealth or of a State so desires its union trade mark of the labour of the members employed by him or to the same kind of labour of any employees not members of the union employed by him."
The new clause is in the following terms:

That wherever the trade mark is on goods it shall be an assurance of the conditions of employment and the rate of wages shall be the same as those which are prevailing in the trade union.

TUTHRIE.—Yes, but there are a number of other conditions.

PEARCE.—Apprentices and boy

LAWSON.—And girl labour.

TRENWITH.—The trade unions are in favour of more. The whole question of conditions of employment is included in the trade union conditions"—including conditions of apprenticeship.

DRAKE.—I understood from Senator Walker that the rate of wages and conditions of employment were certainly the same.

Senator BEST.—The question of boy and girl labour is not involved.

Senator TRENWITH.—I beg the honorable and learned senator's pardon.

Senator DRAKE.—All that Senator
Walker asks in the first part of this provision is that where any manufacturer is employing union labour only, he shall have the right of insisting that this trade labour mark shall be put on his goods. I apprehend that no honorable senator, who has said that there will be nothing like a discriminating use of this trade mark, can object to that part of the provision. In the second part of his proposal, Senator Walker wishes to give the same right to a manufacturer who is employing men who are not unionists, provided, of course, that he is complying with the law of the State with regard to the rate of wages and the hours of employment.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I wish to point out the very serious objections to the proposed new clause. A manufacturer may employ in the same factory fifty unionists and fifty non-unionists. He may put the trade union label on goods which have been produced by the fifty non-unionists. In fact the proposal complicates the question so much that it should not be entertained for a minute. Senator Drake himself seems to be ashamed of the next portion of the clause, which says that a manufacturer shall be entitled to use the trade union mark if he pays the same wages and observes the same conditions as apply in the case of unionists. A number of honorable senators say that a non-unionist is as good a man as the unionist. A non-unionist may, in some cases, be as religious, as strong, or as good looking as a unionist. But still there is something which distinguishes a unionist from a non-unionist, and that is that the non-unionist is prepared to take wages and enjoy conditions of work which have been fought for by the members of unions.
That is where the non-unionist fails. I am very sorry when I hear gentlemen like Senator Dobson and Senator Fraser say that they are in favour of trade unions. I know that Senator Dobson believes in unionism in the interests of the legal fraternity. But the moment trade unionists commence to do anything, these same gentlemen object to them. So long as unionists do not attempt to get butter at least on one side of their bread—so long as they are prepared to live on the meanest fare, to reside in the humblest conditions, and to crawl through life like insects or beasts—they are all right, and unions composed of such individuals would at once be taken by the hand by Senator Dobson and his friends. But so soon as these men combine and endeavour to improve their condition—endeavour to get higher wages, shorter hours, and to live under more civilized conditions—these gentlemen lose all sympathy with them. The Russians would love the Japanese if they came with the rifles loaded with sawdust and pea soup. The Japanese would love the Russians on the same conditions. In the same way the gentlemen to whom I have referred love trades unionists so long as they remain docile. They have the same love for trade unionists as they have for their "coloured brethren." So long as the Chinese reside in Little Bourke-street, and Senator Dobson resides in Toorak, the "coloured brethren" are all right. I hope that the clause will be rejected first, because it will create complication; secondly, because it will be unfair to those unions which go to the trouble to register their trade marks for the purpose of protecting their members; and thirdly, because it is in conflict with the clauses which we have already carried.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—This unfortunate infant which was abandoned in its youth by Senator Walker has been foster-mothered by Senator Drake. It is somewhat difficult to understand it. First of all it seems to me to be open to objection on the score of its youth. It has just been placed in our hands, and we are expected immediately to grasp its meaning. It is a very complicated amendment, and we ought not to be expected to indorse its principles without having an opportunity to test their application. It proposes that no trade union shall refuse to authorize the issue of its trade mark to an employer—who adopts the rate of wages and the hours of employment fixed in reference to the rate of such trade union under any law of the Commonwealth or of a State.

That is to say, where that employer is compelled by the law of the Commonwealth or of a State to observe trade union conditions, he may make use of a trade union mark and a trade union is compelled to allow him to do so. But there is nothing to prevent that individual from getting a trade mark of his own. In that trade mark he could point out that his goods were being made under conditions that he was compelled to observe by Commonwealth law. There is nothing to any manufacturer from doing. The clause does not specify in which portions the goods may have been manufactured by trade unionists or by non-unionists. It goes on to say that a manufacturer, if he so desires, apply a trade union mark to the products of the labour of the members thereof employed by him or to the same products of the labour of any employees not members of such union employed by him.

That is practically a negation of the effect of the provisions which we have passed regarding trade union marks. If a trade union mark is to be a trade union mark, it must be applied to goods which are the product of trade unionists. If it is to be a non-union mark, let us say so. It seems to me that the clause is unnecessary, complicated, and not in accordance with the principle which we have agreed to.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I want to point out a discrepancy which is sufficient to kill this clause forthwith. Section 69A says that a trade union mark shall be a distinctive mark or device, adopted by a trade union for the purpose of distinguishing goods the product of the members thereof. But this proposed new clause provides that an employer may apply the trade union mark to goods which are the product of the labour—of the members thereof employed by him, or to the same kind of products of the same kind of labour of any employees not members of such union. So that this new clause would destroy the effect of the clause already done.

Senator DRAKE.—That is often done by the Committee.

Senator GIVENS.—It is often done for the purpose of emasculating a Bill, but to make a Bill effective, or to carry out its objects. We have decided that a trade union mark shall only be used for the purpose of designating goods made by the members of the trade union. Now we are asked to go behind that, and say that a trade union mark may be used to designate goods made by non-unionists. It is not necessary to argue on so ridiculous a proposal. I am sure the Committee adopted it they would not have agreed to a little while ago.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I think it is just as well that we should understand what this clause means. The object of it is to prevent the exclusive use of trade marks unionists. In his remarks this afternoon Senator Pearce told us that a trade union mark would necessarily be the purchaser of goods bearing it that they were manufactured under such conditions. But what has been the course of the debate is not how fair the conditions of goods have been manufactured, but that may be the rate of wages of employes, or the hours of employment, and no matter about the exclusion of boys. It may have been in the case of the goods that have been manufactured that the one essential condition is that the manufacturer does not belong to the union, every honorable senator of these clauses is prepared to say that these goods the stigma that is put on them when this preference is given to goods manufactured by trade unionists is that admitted?

Senator DAWSON.—It is not.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why have not honorable senators opposite the courage to actually propose? They will say that because they are afraid to do so. I cannot fool me or the general public with the idea that what they are doing is that all goods shall be manufactured under fair conditions. I repeat that no matter how fair the conditions may be, how rigidly an employer may be bound to trade union rules, if he is not in the trade union honorable senators opposite are prepared to deny to goods the stigma supposed to be attached to goods that use the trade union mark.

Senator LARGIE.—There is nothing to be said about having a non-union mark.

Senator CLEMONS.—Yes; but honorable senators are giving the public to understand that goods bearing the trade union mark are specially good. I am prepared to say that the rules of trade unions guarantee good wages, fair employment, and the proper exclusion of child and boy labour. But why do honorable senators by these clauses say that employers who belong to trade unions should have the right to use the trade union mark?

Senator DAWSON.—We do not say that Senator MUTHRIE.—We want the employment in the unions, not the employers.

Senator CLEMONS.—That is just the result desired. The intention is to use these provisions as a lever to compel employers to employ only trade union men, because if they do not the goods which they manufacture will be beaten in competition by reason of the value attached to the trade union mark. The real object of these provisions is to get men into the trade unions. I have no objection to honorable senators enforcing their views as strongly as they please, but I have an utter contempt for their cowardice in not admitting their real reasons.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable and learned senator is starting de novo. He does not know what has been said during the debate.

Senator CLEMONS.—No honorable senator will object to a mark which will place a stigma upon goods made under bad conditions. We absolutely prevent the importation of anything made by prison labour, and that is no doubt a good thing to do. But the result is, that similar goods, which have not the prison label, are given an advantage. Here we are adopting the converse practice, and I say that it will be necessarily unfair to many employers and their employes. This practice is being adopted for one reason, and for no other, and that is, to compel men to join trade unions. Will any honorable senator contend that an employer cannot be a fair and an honest man, and that an employe cannot be a man with a proper regard for the interests of his own class unless he joins a union? Yet that contention is the necessary corollary to the exclusive use proposed for these trade union marks.

Senator PEARCE.—We have dealt with these points all the afternoon. The honorable and learned senator has been absent, and he expects us to go over them again.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable senator is not entitled to make a personal reference to me, and to say whether I have been absent or not. I have no wish to refer to private conversations, but when such a personal reference is made, I am bound to say that I was not present, because the Vice-President of the Executive Council assured me officially that the Senate would not be sitting after dinner.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I said if this Bill were carried.

Senator CLEMONS.—There was no condition whatever mentioned. There is no reason why this measure should be rushed through. Has the Senate been so busy of late that the moment something which is of interest to honorable senators is submitted, it should be rushed through with undue haste? Has the Senate, under the leadership of the present Vice-President of the Executive Council, been so conspicuous for work, or enhanced its reputation so much, by doing anything worth doing this session, that when such amendments as these are submitted, which individual senators can debate, and in connexion with which we may possibly suggest to the outside public that the Senate is doing something to justify its existence, they should be rushed through.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I rise to a point of order. Is the honorable and learned senator in order in discussing the work of the Senate in the way in which he is discussing it at the present time?

The CHAIRMAN.—I do not think the honorable and learned senator is out of order. A statement has been made concerning himself, and I think he is entitled to reply to it.

Senator CLEMONS.—I point out that the first part of the proposed amendment practically suggests the state of things I have indicated. It is aimed against the exclusive use of the right to these trade union marks by trade unions, and the reason urged is that it is conceivable that fair conditions, which are demanded by, and which it is asserted exist in, trade unions, may be complied with by other people.

Senator GIVENS.—Has not the proprietor of a private trade mark the right to the exclusive use of it?

Senator CLEMONS.—Yes, but honorable senators opposite are arguing that a union should have the right to the exclusive use of a trade mark.

Senator TRENWITH.—Why should it not as well as the proprietor of "Warner's Safe Cure," or "Pink Pills"?

Senator CLEMONS.—I do not agree that a trade union should have the exclusive right to this mark on the ground that it gives a guarantee that the goods to which it is attached have been produced under conditions of good wages and proper hours of employment.

Senator GIVENS.—It is a guarantee that they have been made by the members of the union.

Senator CLEMONS.—At last I have got an admission.

Senator PEARCE.—That has been said all the afternoon.

Senator CLEMONS.—I have said just now that honorable senators opposite are afraid to admit their real intention. It is now admitted by Senator GIVENS, who may I suppose, speak for other honorable senators of the Labour Party, that the real object of these provisions is to give this exclusive right to trade unions, because they are trade unions.

Senator GIVENS.—The right to use a trade union mark in the same way that a private manufacturer is entitled to the exclusive use of his private trade mark.

Senator CLEMONS.—Let me point out what this implies. It implies that even one must be necessarily satisfied with the trade unions. There is no appeal from the allowed.

Senator PEARCE.—The public have the remedy in their own hands if they do not like it.

Senator CLEMONS.—The public have no remedy.

Senator PEARCE.—The public are compelled to buy these goods; they cannot do what they like.

Senator CLEMONS.—If that is so, what is the value of these provisions, and would honorable senators desire to have the trade union marks?

Senator GIVENS.—Why is the honorable and learned senator afraid of it?

Senator CLEMONS.—I am not afraid of it, but I am protesting against the proposal, because it represents class privilege. The contention of honorable senators opposite is still that the monopoly of good conditions of labour is enjoyed only by trade unionists. What can the object of these provisions be, but to induce even one to join a trade union? Honorable senators object to the use of the trade union mark by other persons because they do not comply with their conditions in every respect. If it were proved to the satisfaction of Senator Guthrie that the goods submitted for sale by a certain manufacturer were, as regards the conditions of labour employed in their manufacture, made in every respect under trade union conditions, would the honorable senator give such a manufacturer equal rights with the one which he now claims for trade unions?

Senator GUTHRIE.—Certainly not; because this refers to trade unions.

Senator CLEMONS.—That bears out my contention that the claim that the object of these clauses is to insure that goods should be manufactured under fair conditions must be withdrawn. They have real Senator TRENWITH.—Such an applicant is debarred from no privilege which the law gives. There will probably be thousands of trade marks registered, each of which will be the property of some individual, or some corporation; and it would be obviously unfair and illogical to ask that a corporation, which had registered and become a proprietor, should, for some reason, be compelled to give the advantages of their property to some persons who had no right to it.

Senator GIVENS.—The other side are advocating confiscation.

Senator TRENWITH.—They are advocating spoliation. The object of a trade mark can only be to indicate a certain quality. If that quality of trades unionism has no special virtue in the public mind, then a trade union mark will not secure any advantage to the user; but if it is a fact—however stupid or illogical it may appear—that the public mind is fixed upon obtaining this particular quality of trade unionism in the products purchased, the public have a right, when they see the trade union mark to know that they get what they want. If we compel or allow the application of a trade union mark to goods not made by trades unions, we shall by legislation be proceeding to deceive the public. I feel that the proposal to give an exclusive right in a trade union mark commends itself so completely to the majority of honorable senators, that there is no reason to doubt its adoption; and I should not have risen at this stage had I not felt that the remarks of Senator Clemons were uncalled for and in extremely bad taste.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I regret having used the terms I did towards Senator Clemons. I used those terms, however, under the great provocation that after we had devoted time to dealing with the clauses one by one, Senator Clemons, to my mind, showed a disposition to re-open the whole question.

Senator CLEMONS.—I specially asked about this clause coming on. I quite understand that Senator Pearce was under a misapprehension.

Amendment (by Senator PEARCE) proposed—

That the following new clause be inserted:

"69E.—1. No person shall wilfully infringe the rights of the proprietor of a registered trade union mark.

Penalty: Fifty pounds.

2. No person shall knowingly sell or expose for sale or have in his possession for sale or for a purpose of trade or manufacture any goods which any mark is applied in infringement of the rights of the proprietor of a registered trade union mark.

Penalty: Fifty pounds.

3. For the purposes of this section a mark shall be deemed to be applied to goods if—

- (a) it is applied to the goods themselves, or
- (b) it is applied to any covering label reel thing in or with which the goods are sold or exposed or had in possession for a purpose of trade or manufacture, or
- (c) it is used in any manner likely to lead to the belief that it describes or designates the goods.

4. Nothing in this section shall affect any remedy for the infringement of the rights of the proprietor of a registered trade mark."

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I thought that every member of the Senate would have voted for the clause which has just been rejected. All who spoke on it admitted that there was something in the point raised, but contended that it was not likely a label would be refused. Do Senator McGregor intend to submit a clause to cure the defect which I think is admitted?

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not think there is any defect.

Senator DOBSON.—May I ask the Vice-President of the Executive Council when he intends to report progress?

Senator MCGREGOR.—I have intimated to almost every honorable senator the reason why we are sitting late to-night. Had it not been for unnecessary discussion, the Senate might have risen before dinner. My idea is to get through the Bill and have it at we may have a clean possible, and there ought to be very rarely a necessity for recommitment. I would suggest that as it is half-past 10 o'clock, and it is still early in the session, Senator

McGregor should consent to report progress.
I would point out to him that it is not wise at this stage in the session, when we have still three or four months before us, to so rush measures as to irritate or necessitate an honorable senator to leave the Chamber, because he must get home, although he would like to take part in the legislation. We ought to do our work generally in the session before 11 o'clock at night.

Senator CLEMONS.—I desire to know, sir, whether the honorable senator is in order in discussing on this clause the desirability of adjourning?

Senator DOBSON.—I was allowed to ask a question on the subject.

Senator TRENWITH.—My remarks arose out of a statement by Senator McGregor that he intended to go on until the Bill was reported. It seems to me we are entitled to discuss that question.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Nearly all the contentious part of the Bill has been passed. I have agreed to a number of amendments, and the remaining clauses can be passed in ten minutes. I propose to move for an adjournment over next week, so that honorable senators may see a fresh print of the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN.—The remarks of Senator Trenwith arose out of a question asked by Senator Dobson as to the wisdom of adjourning the discussion on the Bill, and I allowed that subject to be discussed, because I thought it was the wish of the majority of the Committee, but I propose now to ask honorable senators to confine their remarks strictly to the question before the Chair.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I do not think that Senator McGregor has any right to say that we are going to stop here until the Bill is put through. He might mention an hour when he is willing to adjourn. If he still adheres to the idea of stopping here until the Bill is passed—

Senator PEARCE.—I submit that the honorable and learned senator is not in order in discussing the question of our stopping here.

The CHAIRMAN. — The honorable senator is not in order in discussing any question but the proposed new clause 69e.

Motion (by Senator MULCAHY) negatived.

That the Chairman do now leave the Chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—Will Senator McGregor be good enough to explain in what manner a trade mark or, as I prefer to call it, a trade label, of this description could be infringed? Can he give the Committee an illustration of an infringement?

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable and learned senator ought to know that if a trade mark be used by an individual without the sanction of a trade union by which it was registered, that will be an infringement.

Proposed new clause agreed to.

Amendment (by Senator PEARCE) agreed to—

That the following new clause be inserted—

“69F.—1. A trade union mark may be removed from the register for the causes and in the manner and by the person prescribed.

2. Subject to this section the registration of a trade union mark shall continue for fourteen years, at the expiration of which it shall cease, unless renewed in the manner prescribed.

3. A trade union mark shall not be assigned so long as its registration continues.”

Clauses 70 to 89 agreed to.

Clause 90—

1. If the King is pleased to apply to the Commonwealth any law of the United Kingdom for carrying into effect any arrangement made with the Government of any foreign State for the mutual protection of trade marks, then any person who has applied for protection for any trade mark in the United Kingdom or the Isle of Man, or in any foreign State with which the arrangement has been made, shall be entitled to registration of his trade mark under this Act in priority to other applicants, and such registration shall have the same date as the date of the original application in the United Kingdom or the Isle of Man or such foreign State as the case may be: Provided that such application shall be made within four months from such person applying for protection in the United Kingdom or the Isle of Man or the foreign State with which the arrangement is in force.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I move—

That the word “four,” line 16, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word “six.”

This amendment is not very important. The object of it is that a person in the United Kingdom wishing to apply for a trade mark in the Commonwealth may have sufficient time in which to make his application. The Government approve of the amendment.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I should like to have a further reason for alteration of four months to six. Senator Pearce knows very well that it does take six months for a letter to come to England to any part of Australia.

Senator PEARCE.—The time allowed under the State law is three months.

Senator CLEMONS.—I have no particular objection to the alteration, but I would that the Vice-President of the Executive Council should agree to it, when it is evident that four months would be quite sufficient.

Senator MCGREGOR.—In other provisions of the Bill it was considered desirable to extend the time. It is only that a merchant or manufacturer residing in England, wishing to register in Australia, should have an opportunity to do so, though a letter might come in five weeks might be necessary for the merchant to get an answer from Australia, and then to write back again. There can be no harm in an extension of the time. An occurrence like the seizure of the steamer Malacca might delay the receipt of a letter.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—If I give an explanation which the Vice-President of the Executive Council gives is a good one, it is obvious that the extension of the time to six months is not sufficient. If it is insisted that there shall be time for a letter to come from England to Australia, for a reply to be sent, and for another answer to a letter to be despatched, it is cutting it too short to allow only six months. Inquiry cannot be answered at once in many cases. I wish to make it certain that the time allowed is ample.

Senator MULCAHY (Tasmania).—It is understood that it was agreed that the remaining clauses of the Bill should be passed without amendment, and that there should subsequently be a recommittal.

Senator PEARCE.—Can the honorable member discuss the adjournment on this amendment before the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN.—It is not in order for the honorable member to discuss the adjournment on this amendment.

Senator MULCAHY.—With due deference to you, sir, I think that I am in order. Senator DAWSON.—I wish to know whether the honorable senator is in order in disputing your ruling without moving a motion?

The CHAIRMAN.—No; the honorable senator is not in order in disputing ut putting his objection in MULCAHY.—I was merely

E: POSTAL EMPLOYES.

UGER.—Is the Postmasterared with a reply to the quesy the honorable member for ight?

ON.—The honorable member st night, on the motion for the of the House, asked a question ertime paid in the Post Office g of a certain publication. I ned from a copy now in my at it is entitled to registration aper, to circulation through the Post Office as a newspaper under the provisions of the Post and Telegraph Act, and to the benefit of the nominal rate of postage for newspapers as determined by the Post and Telegraph Rates Act. With respect to the statement that no overtime is paid to the sorters for the additional work which they are required to perform in connexion with the large number of the newspaper referred to that is posted, it can only be said that the payment of overtime is governed by the regulations made by the Public Service Commissioner under the provisions of the Public Service Act. If the sorters work more than the stipulated number of hours per fortnight, namely, ninety-three hours for those who have regular hours, and eighty-four for broken or irregular hours, they will be entitled to payment for overtime.

NORTHERN TERRITORY.

Mr. CROUCH asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

In reference to the statement of Major-General Hutton in the Perth Town Hall, as reported in the West Australian newspaper of the 2nd instant, to the following effect:—

“As to the probability of any nation wishing to invade Australia, he would remind them of the extracts from Chinese and Japanese newspapers which had been appearing in the Australian press, and from which it could be seen that the people of China and Japan were casting longing eyes upon the rich Northern Territory of Australia.
 Further, he had it from no less an authority than the Japanese Admiral who visited Australia some twelve months or so ago that such was the case.”

1. Has any report of this intimation from the visiting Admiral (Admiral Kamimura) been made by General Hutton to the Minister of Defence, or to other official authority?
2. If so, has the Prime Minister any objection to placing such report on the Library table?
3. If not, will he cause General Hutton to make a full and complete report of the Japanese warning, and its surrounding circumstances?
4. Will he cause representations to be made to the British Government and to the Japanese Government as to the implied threat on the part of the latter in its Admiral's statement?
5. Will he ask the presumably friendly Japanese Government to make a distinct repudiation of the statement of its Admiral, who, during his visit, officially represented his nation?

Mr. WATSON.—The answers to the honorable and learned member's questions are as follows:—

1. No.
2. Answered by 1.
3. Major-General Sir Edward Hutton will be asked for an explanation of his statement.

4 and 5. It will not be desirable to make any representations as suggested. The mere fact of a foreign power being said to cast "longing eyes" upon our territory can scarcely be construed into a threat; and no good could result from taking official notice of such informal remarks, even if made.

QUEENSLAND MILITARY ALLOWANCES.

Mr. WILKINSON asked the Minister representing the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. What allowance, if any, was made during the past year to members of the Defence Force in the State of Queensland, to provide uniforms?
2. What is the cause of delay in providing uniforms to the above-mentioned branch of the Force?
3. What allowance, if any, is made to members of the Light Horse for the use of their horses, saddles, and bridles; and is there any difference between the amount allowed to officers and that allowed to privates?

Mr. WATSON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follows:—

1. In the case of the Militia, Commanding Officers received 40s. per head of the establishment, for clothing and corps contingent allowance.

In the case of Volunteers, Commanding Officers received 30s. per head of establishment, and 20s. for each effective member, for clothing and corps contingent allowance.

2. The General Officer Commanding reports that there has not been any delay.

3. The following is the scale of extra pay granted for provision of a horse, as set forth in paragraph 85 of the Financial and Allowance Regulations for the Military Forces:—

Rank.	Extra pay for provision of horse (other than recruits).

BOTTLING OF IMPORTED SPIRITS.

Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Minister of Trade and Customs, upon notice—

Whether anything has been done with regard to the matter of imported spirits, which are bottled in Australia without purchasers being notified the fact, about which subject it is understood the South Australian Government made representations to the Commonwealth Government?

Mr. FISHER.—The answer to honorable member's question is as follows:—

The statement was made in December last spirit was being imported, bottled, and lab in a manner contrary to the provisions of the of the State of South Australia. In January this year, the Premier of that State was informed that, as the spirit in question had been imported through the Customs, the latter had power in the matter. The Customs officers sent all labels imported for the consideration of local authorities, and for such action as they may desire to take. It is not considered that the Department can do more in this matter.

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table following papers:—

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS.

POLICY AND ADMINISTRATION OF GOVERNMENT: ATTITUDE OF THE OPPOSITION.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I desire move—

The the Standing Orders be suspended to discuss a matter of urgent necessity, namely, the policy and administration of the Government also the attitude of the Opposition in relation to the conduct of the business of Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Standing Order requires—

In cases of urgent necessity, any Standing Sessional Order, or Orders of the House, may be suspended for the day's sitting, on motion duly made and seconded, without notice: provided that such motion is carried by an absolute majority of the whole number of the members of the House.

Does the honorable member claim that the question he desires to discuss is one of urgent necessity?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I maintain that the question is urgent, because the Opposition in refusing to allow the Government to recommmit Clause 48 of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill for its full consideration in Committee, have in view the defeat of the Administration, and their action deprives those who support the Government of the opportunity to justify that support while it at the same time prevents the members from giving their reasoning to the Government. The action of the Opposition is intended to deprive honorable members of their inalienable right to defend their attitude, not to take a particular measure of action in regard to the general conduct of the Government during its session.

MR. WEBSTER.—I am not sure as to what may be disclosed by the honorable member in the course of his speech, but I expect that those who follow him, and that the matter is one of absolute right. If I find it necessary later on I shall take the opportunity of doing so. For the present the honorable member may proceed.

MR. SPEAKER.—I maintain that the Government, because, should the recommendations of the Government be debated in this House would be deprived of the opportunity of discussing the question. They would be denied their right to explain why they support the Government their support in the House why they have religiously opposed the Government in connexion with its administration. I maintain a course of conduct which has been followed by the Opposition, with a view to bring upon the Government, has prevented honorable members from coming before the electors, whom they will face in the immediate future, for justification for the attitude taken up, not only on the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, but on questions of whole policy and administration. I wish to ask what any member of this House has done of those who has great credit cast upon him, or be he the leading member of the Chamber—forward, and by means of a course of procedure which has been followed, endeavour, while debating the Government, to rob honorable members of their right to exercise their country in general, and to take in particular, their reasons for the action they have assumed, and their reasons for their conduct, whether as supporters or opponents of the Ministry? If honorable members wish to have decent, I should like to say—why deprive an honorable member like the honorable and learned member for Bendigo of his constituents, depriving him

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Oh!

MR. WEBSTER.—Depriving him of the opportunity—

MR. REID.—I rise to order. I wish to take your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as to whether the expression which has been used by the honorable member for Gwydir was in order, when he asked why we should send the honorable and learned member for Bendigo to his constituents? I wish to ask you whether the prerogative of dissolution, which is vested in the Governor-General, can be referred to as if the Governor-General had made some intimation—

MR. WATSON.—Which he has not.

MR. REID.—Which he has not, I am sure, to the head of the Government, that such a contingency is involved in the exercise by honorable members of their independence in this House.

MR. SPEAKER.—The question of the dissolution of Parliament, or otherwise, is, of course, within the prerogative of the Governor-General, and must not be debated in this House. I am sure that the honorable member for Gwydir will not transgress the rule.

MR. WEBSTER.—I was not discussing the question of a dissolution. I was discussing the probabilities—as to what might occur in consequence of the action that has been taken by the Opposition. I maintain that honorable members of this House, before any practical legislation can again be put before the House, may possibly have to face those who sent us here. For that reason, I wish honorable members—as every Britisher would wish—not to adopt, or support that course of procedure which has been pursued by the Opposition.

MR. GLYNN.—I should like to take your ruling, sir, as to whether the honorable member is in order, under cover of a motion of this kind, in impugning the motives, attacking the independence of judgment of honorable members, and anticipating debate upon a matter which is not yet decided by the House.

MR. SPEAKER.—In no case can an honorable member anticipate debate on a motion which is upon the notice paper. Therefore, it will not be competent for him to refer in any way to any debate which is or may be pending—upon the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, for example. I am quite sure that the House would desire that in the case of every speech reference to a debate now pending should be specifically avoided, and that we should debate not the personalities of members themselves, but the question of policy which may be under consideration.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I have not transgressed the rule which you have laid down, Mr. Speaker. I have not endeavoured to impugn the motives of any honorable member on account of the opposition which he has given to the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, which is now before the House. Nor do I intend to do so. I have sufficient knowledge of the Standing Orders to be aware that an honorable member cannot anticipate debate on another question which is upon the notice paper. But I have also the knowledge that whenever a Government is threatened with defeat, whether directly or indirectly, honorable members, whether they be victims of that defeat, or whether they may benefit from it, have a right to defend their attitude. Because every defeat of a Government may involve a dissolution. Since that is possible, I appeal for a right to discuss the question which I have brought forward. I am appealing for a right which would have been granted by any Opposition hitherto existing. No Parliamentary Opposition, of which I have ever heard, would have made it necessary for me to advance such a claim, nor would it have made any attempt to refuse to a Government the right to recommit a Bill.

Mr. CONROY. — I understand that the first reason given by the honorable member for Gwydir for the motion which he has submitted is, to discuss as a matter of urgent necessity, the policy and administration of the Government. At the present time, one question under the consideration of the House is the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. The honorable member is now referring to what is likely to happen in case of the defeat of the Government. I submit that he is not entitled to do that. I go further. He also advances, as a reason for bringing forward this motion, the attitude of the Opposition in relation to the conduct of the business of Parliament. When a Government seeks to have certain clauses of a Bill re-committed, it is quite competent for the Opposition to object to the motion, without violating the Standing Orders. Therefore the honorable member is now criticising not the conduct of the Opposition, but virtually the Standing Orders of this House. This is my point of order—the honorable member is not entitled, by means of a motion of this kind, to discuss the Standing Orders which have been adopted by the House submit that the honorable member is tired out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have looked at the notice which the honorable member for Gwydir has handed to me. I find in it no reference to discussing the Standing Orders of the House. I am not certain that if the honorable member had intended to include that matter, to do so would not have made the motion irregular. The honorable member has brought forward the motion in order to discuss a matter of urgent necessity, namely, the policy and administration of the Government, and also the attitude of the Opposition in relation to the conduct of the business of Parliament. The honorable member, so far as I know, has not transgressed the rules. I may point out that when there are frequent interruptions by points of order, I am not able to listen so closely to the honorable member as I should otherwise do.

Mr. CONROY.—I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to confine the honorable member to the particular purpose of his motion.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have already dealt with that matter. The question now under discussion is, whether, or not, the Standing Orders shall be suspended, and the honorable member has the right to use any reasonable arguments upon that point, for the consideration of the House.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I marvel at the spirit which is being manifested by honorable members who are raising these points of order. They seem to have as many points as has the proverbial porcupine. I am merely asking for a British constitutional right, namely, that every representative of this Chamber shall have an opportunity to lay before his constituents, through Hansard—the only medium we have—his reasons for the attitude he is taking up. I was referring to the unjustifiable conduct of the Opposition. If honorable members of the Opposition had submitted a direct vote of censure upon which honorable members could have discussed the general policy of the Government, there would have been no necessity for me to take my present action; but because we have been hobbled and gagged by the methods adopted by the Opposition, that we, as Britishers, feel called upon to raise our voices in protest.

AKER.—The honorable member referring to another debate.

STER.—I am referring to the one taken up by the Opposition with regard to the conduct of the business of the House.

AKER.—The honorable member referring to another debate.

STER.—It is necessary for me to take the action of the Opposition with regard to the conduct of the business of the House as illustrated by recent events, to show why the Standing Orders have been suspended, and why we should not take that right of discussion of the Opposition have sought to deprive the Government of that facilities should be to discuss the general administration of the Government. I ask what has been advanced by honorable members against the policy of the Government. The charge has been laid at the door of the Ministry which would justify its removal from office?

AKER.—I would ask if the honorable member's statements can fairly be taken as arguments in favour of the suspension of the Standing Orders?

AKER.—I take it that the honorable member is now stating one of the points which he indicated when I asked the honorable member to show the urgency of the question.

STER.—In spite of the opposition by the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, which is thoroughly in favour of him, I have a duty to perform to myself, but to the whole House, and I intend to discharge that duty. All attacks on the part of those who are seeking to burk discussion. I ask what portion of the policy of the Government has induced the Opposition to their present remarkable attitude? Is it opposed to the policy of Ministers to succeed in placing upon our agenda a measure dealing with a matter which has been dangled before the electors of the Commonwealth ever since the House was established? Do they think the Government because they have not previously settled for all time as to where we are to go "sweet by-and-by"? Are they seeking indirectly to deprive the Government of office and power because of their regard to the Seat of Government? Do they wish to revert to the old system of affairs which existed before we passed an Act to bring about a White Australia? Do those honorable gentlemen who are seeking to conduct the business of this Chamber in the manner which the notice paper indicates, hope that they may reverse that legislation that has been so well administered by the Government in the interests of a White Australia? Are these members prepared to stake their political existence on the attitude which they are now taking up? I realize that there is only one explanation for the conduct of those who are seeking by these indirect methods to attain something which they have not the courage to achieve by direct means. Are honorable members opposite cognizant of the fact that all the political leanings and all the public utterances of their present leader indicate that he is opposed to a White Australia?

Mr. REID.—I have been looking at the standing order 407, and I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the honorable member is in order in obtruding his speech upon the House, out of its due order, and before the preliminary question has been decided whether or not we shall suspend the Standing Orders. In connexion with a proposal to suspend the Standing Orders, and to interrupt the ordinary course of public business, the honorable member is making a speech which he ought not to deliver until we have determined to throw our Standing Orders to the winds to enable him to do as he desires.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I intend to deliver another speech afterwards.

Mr. REID.—I submit, sir, that the honorable member must be confined to a statement of his reasons for asking that the Standing Orders shall be suspended, and that he must not indulge in a speech on the general question until the House has by an absolute majority determined that the ordinary course of business shall be interrupted.

Mr. WATSON.—I submit that in the first place the standing order referred to by the right honorable gentleman does not provide that under these circumstances the question as to the suspension of the Standing Orders must be submitted without debate. In giving his reasons for the suspension of the Standing Orders the honorable member surely has the right to refer incidentally to the conduct of the right honorable gentleman and those associated with him in this crisis. It seems to me that the honorable member for Gwydir is quite within our rules in giving reasons why the Standing Orders should be suspended. Even in an ordinary set of circumstances, if it were proposed to suspend the Standing Orders merely in order to pass a Bill through all its stages hurriedly, it would be open to honorable members to debate the proposal. They could show reasons why it was not a matter of urgency, and conversely in this instance the honorable member for Gwydir can advance reasons why it is a matter of urgency that his views should be placed before the country.

Mr. McDONALD.—I desire to point out that upon a previous occasion—I cannot recall the exact date—when Sir Edmund Barton filled the position of Prime Minister, I took exception to a motion to suspend the Standing Orders in connexion with the despatch of certain Australian troops. If my recollection serves me accurately, my attitude then was opposed by a very strong section now upon the Opposition side of the House, and the action of the Prime Minister was upheld. The point which I then raised was whether the Prime Minister was in order in discussing the question which he desired to debate before the Standing Orders had been suspended. I believe that a ruling was given against me, and I claim that that ruling established a precedent in this Chamber. Consequently, any honorable member who seeks the suspension of the Standing Orders is perfectly entitled to furnish reasons why that course should be adopted. In this particular instance the honorable member for Gwydir wishes the Standing Orders to be suspended, and the House cannot possibly know whether or not that course ought to be followed until he has advanced reasons in support of his motion. To my mind the grounds which he has already advanced amply warrant the suspension of the Standing Orders. He is perfectly in order in adopting the line of argument which he is pursuing.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I wish to raise the question of whether, in the whole of the statements of the honorable member for Gwydir, there is a scintilla of evidence of the character contemplated by the Standing Orders? He has informed the House that he has submitted this proposal because some honorable members of the Opposition have adopted an unusual course.

Mr. McDONALD.—That does not appear in the motion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am speaking of the honorable member's argument, and of the motion. There is nothing in statements to indicate that the matter which he desires to discuss is one of urgency.

Mr. WATSON.—Oh, yes.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The motion merely indicates that in this House there is an Opposition, and that there is also a Government which is pursuing its ordinary purposes of policy and administration. Consequently we require to look at the reasons advanced by the honorable member to ascertain whether any urgency exists in connexion with this matter.

Mr. WATSON.—Why not allow him to state his reasons?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I submit that he has already sufficiently stated the case. After all the tumultuous cheering which occurred in the caucus room this morning I should have thought that honorable members opposite had quite pumped themselves out.

Mr. WATSON.—Was that the caucus which was held in the Opposition room?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No, in the Labor Party's room.

Mr. WATSON.—There was no caucus meeting there.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the meeting of that party continue to be so boisterous, I am not quite certain whether a third partition than already exists will not be required between the room in which the Government assemble and the Opposition room. The gravamen of the statements by the honorable member for Gwydir is that the Opposition yesterday adopted a course of which the Government did not approve. To argue that that is a matter the discussion of which urgently requires this motion is a travesty upon the Standing Orders.

Mr. WATSON.—That is for the House to decide.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is for the Speaker to say whether the matter is one of urgency, and whether he will permit the discussion upon the motion to suspend the Standing Orders to proceed. I contend that there is nothing to indicate that the slightest urgency exists in connexion with this matter. Upon that ground, as well as upon the other, I submit that the honorable member ought not to be allowed to proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Two points of order have been put before me. The right honorable member for East Sydney has called the fact that the first matter to be decided by the House is, whether or not to suspend the Standing Orders, determines to suspend them, and then proceed upon the subject in the motion. That is so. The question which honorable members can raise is whether or not the Standing Orders should be suspended. Some honorable members called the attention of the hon. member for Gwydir to the fact that the question to which he must consent is not the suspension of the Standing Orders. The honorable member for Gwydir says that no urgency has been shown. I am endeavouring, as I said, when I am not entertaining these points of order, to ascertain whether the honorable member for Gwydir is making out a case for the suspension. He claims that there is some danger of the Government losing its majority on the Treasury benches, and that before that event takes place it is necessary to enable honorable members to make certain statements. I am quite willing to listen to him further, reserving my right—which I indicated half-an-hour ago—to prevent a continuance of the discussion if urgency is not proved.

MR. WEBSTER.—During my Parliamentary career, I have never been so much in Opposition as I have been on this occasion. It is, indeed, the duty of every part of honorable members to bring forward such frequent intervals to bring out fresh points. I do not care whether I occupy a Ministerial side of the House, an Opposition side, or upon the cross benches, seeing that there is a probability of the Government being defeated, and the Opposition being adopted by the House. I am without a precedent in this matter in Australia, I contend that the Standing Orders afforded an opportunity of discussion, if we think fit, of supporting the policy of the Government. It is more urgent than the right of honorable members to defend themselves, which are made upon them, in a constitutional way, but in a manner not shown in any other Parliament in the Commonwealth? I wish to oblige the House of the Standing Orders by the use of discussing the policy of the Government, considering the attitude that has been adopted by the Opposition in the conduct of the public business. I do not resort to such tactics it is a matter of extreme urgency that the Standing Orders be suspended in order that we may exercise the British right of free speech. When the right honorable member for East Sydney smiles, as he is now doing, I know that he does not relish the arguments that are being adduced. I think I have clearly shown that this is a matter of extreme urgency.

MR. JOHNSON.—The honorable member has not yet said a word in support of his motion.

MR. WEBSTER.—Even if I availed myself of every word in the dictionary, I do not imagine that I should be able to convince the honorable member. Some honorable members are so full of their own self-importance that it is impossible to convince them that they hold erroneous views on any subject, and therefore I shall not attempt to perform impossibilities. We have a right, as free men, representing a free people, to give full expression to our views on an all-important question of this kind. We have a right to protest against the tactics pursued by the Opposition during the last day or two. What are the planks in the Government policy to which the Opposition object?

MR. JOHNSON.—I submit, Mr. Speaker, that while it is perfectly competent for the honorable member to show that it is a matter of urgency that the Standing Orders should be suspended, he is not in order in discussing the general question.

MR. SPEAKER.—While the honorable member for Gwydir was speaking, I was looking up the precedent mentioned a little earlier in the proceedings by the honorable member for Kennedy, so that I was not closely following his remarks. If the honorable member was distinctly going beyond the question of whether it is desirable to suspend the Standing Orders, he was certainly out of order.

MR. WEBSTER.—As I am only a novice, I feel inclined to accept the kindly advice offered by honorable members opposite. As a tribute to their high intellectual attainments, to their wide knowledge of constitutional law, and to their intimate acquaintance with the rules of procedure, I should perhaps express my gratitude—

MR. SPEAKER.—Will the honorable member discuss the question?

MR. WEBSTER.—I have already shown that it is a matter of urgency that the Standing Orders should be suspended. I shall now discuss those features in the policy of the present Government to which the Opposition are opposed:

Mr. SPEAKER.—In discussing that matter the honorable member would go beyond the scope of the motion.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I wish to show that by the action of the Opposition we are deprived of the right to freely discuss their tactics.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Not at all.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I am surprised that the honorable member, in whose veracity I have always had the greatest confidence, should hold that opinion. He knows that the Opposition are anxious to burke discussion—to gag honorable members on this side of the House—and to prevent us from putting before the people of Australia our reasons for objecting to their attempt to follow a course of procedure which has never been adopted in any other Parliament in the Commonwealth.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The question is whether honorable members are going back on the vote which they gave in favour of the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella. It is the Ministry who say they will resign if the clause is not recommitted.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I admire the honorable member's friendly interest in me, but do not welcome his interposition. By the action of the Opposition we have been deprived of the right, which we should otherwise have enjoyed, to discuss the general question on a direct motion of want of confidence. Do those who are supporting the Opposition tactics fully realize that they are allowing the impression to go forth to the public that they are not prepared to support the policy of this Government?

Mr. REID.—I rise to a point of order. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the honorable member is not discussing the motion for the suspension of the Standing Orders, and that he is out of order from first to last. I hold that he must absolutely confine himself to the giving of reasons in support of his contention that it is urgently necessary that the Standing Orders should be suspended.

Mr. WATSON.—Having had time to look up the precedent referred to by the honorable member for Kennedy—

Mr. REID.—If this is a Government move, I do not wish to object to it.

Mr. WATSON.—I hold that it is one of the duties of a Government to protect the rights of honorable members in regard to our methods of procedure.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear.

Mr. WATSON.—I have had an opportunity to look up the point referred to by the honorable member for Kennedy, and shall briefly put it before the House. On the 14th January, 1901, the then Prime Minister, Sir Edmund Barton, wished to make a statement to the House relative to the South African war and the part which he proposed, on behalf of the Government, that the Commonwealth should play in it. The proposal to make that statement was objected to, on the ground that it would give honorable members no opportunity to reply, and the Prime Minister then proceeded to deal with the subject on a motion to suspend the Standing Orders. On that occasion, Mr. Speaker, you ruled that—

The objection of the honorable member for Kennedy is fatal to the Prime Minister on the occasion making any statement to the House except in the way which he proposes—a speech which will conclude with a motion such as for the suspension of the Standing Orders.

The Prime Minister adopted that form, and concluded with a motion for the suspension of the Standing Orders. Debate then ensued, and the discussion, which is reported in Hansard at pages 8741 to 8800, covers the whole question of the South African war.

Mr. GLYNN.—I should like to take your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on the point whether the matter to which the honorable member wishes to refer can be discussed by the House even if he obtains the suspension of the Standing Orders. Is it not a matter which is already under discussion?

Mr. WATSON.—He wishes to discuss the general policy of the Government.

Mr. GLYNN.—He wishes to refer to the action of the Opposition during the last two days in endeavouring to prevent the discussion of a certain matter.

Mr. MAHON.—And to the policy of the Government.

Mr. GLYNN.—In support of the point which I have raised, I should like you to refer, sir, to the following passage on page 264 of May's Parliamentary Practice—

Nor can a motion be brought forward which is the same in substance as a question which, during the current session, has been decided in the affirmative or negative, nor which anticipates a matter already set down or appointed for consideration by the House.

I respectfully ask you to decide, Mr. Speaker, that the object of the honorable member ir, in asking for the suspension of Standing Orders, is to refer to already under the discussion of and to interfere with the right of members to continue that discussion.

KER.—I will deal first with the objection raised by the honorable member for Angas. So far as I, have any knowledge, the question in the debate to which the honorable and learned member refers is a certain clause of a certain Bill which is not to be recommitted. Whether the Government is, or is not, in discussion is a question in which I cannot assume to have any voice. It is not for me to say whether or is not. Therefore, so long as the honorable member for Gwydir does not move the motion relating to the Arbitration Bill on the notice-paper, and without omitting clause 48 from the Bill, or any other matter, the House has been given, he will be at the point which the honorable member for Angas has raised in his application. The honorable member, however, will be out of order in attempting to debate any motion on the notice-paper. So far as the point of order of the honorable and learned member for Gwydir is concerned, the House is at the line between that which the honorable member for Gwydir may discuss and that which he may not discuss is a fine line. He cannot discuss on the subject of the suspension of the Standing Orders the object which he wishes to discuss, but he may give as fully as he likes the reasons why he thinks the Standing Orders should be suspended. At the attention was called to his objection the right honorable and learned member for East Sydney, he was told him, arguing that possibly the members of the Opposition might have arguments being advanced, which he thought ought to be considered and was thereby proving the suspension of the Standing Orders.

—Another day or two.

—Contemptible minds have no ideas.

—I have every reason to believe of the wonderful unanimity amongst honorable members opposite in the desire to discuss the question on this question.

Mr. KELLY.—Is the honorable member in order in saying that the members of the Opposition are unanimous in the desire to discuss the question?

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the remark is objected to by any honorable member, it must be withdrawn.

Mr. WEBSTER.—If it is objected to by any honorable member opposite, I withdraw it; but, knowing the marvellous abilities of the honorable member for Wentworth, I did not intend to convey the impression that he is capable of discussing the question. It is very difficult for a man to speak connectedly when he is being continually badgered. I remember being called to order very quickly on one occasion for objecting to an honorable member expressing his opinions when he desired to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Will the honorable member discuss the question before the House?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I feel sure that in discussing the wisdom of suspending the Standing Orders to allow honorable members who, during the last nine months, have taken an attitude which seems to me more incomprehensible and more inexplicable—

Mr. REID.—Have we anything to do with what has happened during the last nine months?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The purpose for which the honorable member desires the suspension of the Standing Orders is to enable him to discuss "the policy and administration of the Government, also the attitude of the Opposition in relation to the conduct of the business of Parliament." So far as I can see, that covers all that the honorable member can say in regard to the whole life of this Parliament.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I am delighted that the right honorable member for East Sydney raised the point of order, because your ruling, Mr. Speaker, has given me an opportunity for which I am grateful. It considerably enlarges the scope of my observations. We have the right, on whichever side of the chamber we may sit, to explain our actions during the existence of this Parliament, which is not yet twelve months old, in order that later on we may, if possible, obtain the approval of our constituents in regard to what we have done. I am acting as the friend of honorable members on the Opposition side of the House, who, I feel certain, are just as anxious as I am to be able to place on record the reasons why they have taken the course which they have adopted during the existence of this Parliament. I maintain that it is only fair that we should have an opportunity to do so since it is probable that that opportunity may not occur again on account of the action of the Opposition in connexion with a motion which has recently been put before the Chamber. Each and every one of us should have the opportunity to defend his attitude towards the Government, and the vote which he intends to give, thereby once and for all giving to the people whom he represents an honest outline of his reasons for the faith that is in him. Honorable members opposite have the same right to be heard as have the supporters of the Government.

Mr. HUGHES.—Does the honorable member say that they should be compelled to explain?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I do not believe in compulsion except in connexion with arbitration. In a matter of this kind I feel sure that they will not need to be compelled. I am certain that they are only too anxious to have an opportunity to do so. The methods adopted by the Opposition in relation to the conduct of public business have engaged even their own supporters. But the leader of the Government is prepared to extend to them that which their own party would refuse. What have honorable members to object to in the policy of the Government?

Mr. SPEAKER.—That question has no relation to the suspension of the Standing Orders.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Owing to certain occurrences which may eventuate, and which are well known to honorable members, we shall have no opportunity to discuss the question at a later stage.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member may say that, but he must not discuss the policy of the Government.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I am giving my reasons for thinking that we should have an opportunity to discuss the important questions that are now pending. I am rather sorry that no other point of order has been raised, because it would have given me time to mature my thoughts. Is it not right, in the interests of good Government, that honorable members opposite should have an opportunity to explain why, in connexion with certain legislation, they have opposed the Government, and why they intend to vote in a particular direction in connexion with an event which is likely to occur during the next day or so?

Mr. GLYNN.—I ask your ruling, sir, to whether the honorable member is now referring to the pending vote on Conciliation and Arbitration Bill?

Mr. SPEAKER.—At the moment when the honorable and learned member for Glasgow rose to a point of order, I was speaking to the honorable member for Merionethshire with reference to the debate; but the honorable member for Gwydir is now doing what the honorable and learned member for Angas says he was doing, he is transgressing the rule. I ask him not to do that.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I certainly have no desire to transgress the rule. I have always endeavoured to keep within the four corners of the law of Parliament. I admit at once that I have to exercise my right to speak within a barbed wire fence, which has been erected for the purpose of preventing me from explaining my position. But, sir, I did not as the honorable and learned member for Angas stated, transgress the rule.

Mr. GLYNN.—What was the "pending vote" to which the honorable member referred?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I was not referring to the vote which is to be taken on the Arbitration Bill. I contend that I did not transgress by referring to a subject which is undoubtedly is hurtful to honorable members opposite. Why are these constant objections raised to the exercise of my constitutional right to debate a question when we are otherwise prevented from debating by reason of the attitude assumed by the Opposition? Do honorable members realize that as the outcome of this method of conducting public business it is possible that they will have to give an explanation of their opposition to the Government and its policy? There is one thing that it is absolutely essential that honorable members should consider, and that is that in the efforts of the Opposition to replace the Government by means hitherto never adopted by a Parliament in Australia—

Mr. GLYNN.—To what means is the honorable member referring?

Mr. REID.—I rise to a point of order. This is quite a new point. I should like to have the benefit of your ruling with regard to it. I have just observed the terms of the motion which the honorable ydin has sprung on us, and your ruling as to whether, Standing Orders, the honorable include more than one motion for the suspension of Standing Orders. Because, if that, he can include a submit to you, sir, that there is mentioned in this motion and administration of the that is one thing; and the at Opposition in relation to the business of Parliament. absolutely different things, that this standing order is not feel that it would be convenient in the future, if we had the opinion as to whether, upon suspend the Standing Orders, subject can be included.

ER.—I distinctly heard orable member was saying, ing that some opportunity should be afforded to honorable members to discuss the policy of the Government, which includes the maintenance of a White Australia.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I know that this subject is a sore point with the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member has now a loose rein; the White Australia question is very urgent.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I desire to impress upon honorable members who are following the right honorable member that they will probably have to explain to their constituents their attitude upon this question. They are leaving in the lurch a Government which has fought tooth and nail to safeguard a principle which is among the most sacred to Australia, namely, the maintenance of a White Australia. Are they prepared to assist into office those who have asserted that if they can secure the reins of Government they will do everything they can by maladministration to defeat the objects of the Immigration Restriction Act, and to go back on the grand principle of a White Australia? Will honorable members also be able to explain the position which they have taken up with regard to the proposal of the Government embodied in the Bonuses for Manufactures Bill now before this Chamber? Will those honorable members who profess to desire to encourage Australian industry, who have shed bitter tears of sympathy with the unfortunate unemployed, and who are pledged to their constituents to legislate, and to administer our laws, upon such lines that our industries will be established upon a sound basis and provide work for our citizens, be able to show that their present action is justified?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Upon a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would direct your attention to the fact that the honorable member is now submitting as matters of urgent necessity some possible attitude of members of the Opposition at some time or other, with regard to the Bonuses for Manufactures Bill, the White Australian question, the provision of employment for the people, and other items which make up the general programme of the Government, or have relation to their administration. I ask you to rule that none of these are matters of urgent necessity, and that, therefore, they furnish no reason for the suspension of the Standing Orders. They may be matters of great importance, but they have already been discussed and voted upon within the recent past. I submit that there is not a scintilla of proof of urgency in connexion with any of these matters, and that the course which the honorable member is taking constitutes a grave abuse of our Parliamentary privileges and procedure. If this kind of argumentation is to be regarded as a matter of necessity, we may as well set aside all our Parliamentary rules, and allow you, sir, to govern the House without reference to them. What would hinder any honorable member from taking a similar course every day of the year, and so render it impossible to transact any business?

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—What is the point of order?

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—The point of order is that the honorable member is indulging in a grave abuse of the Standing Orders.

MR. SPEAKER.—Order. Will the honorable member state his point of order?

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—My point of order is that the honorable member has shown no urgent necessity to adopt the course which he desires to follow.

MR. THOMAS.—That is the honorable member's opinion. It is not a point of order.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—Of course it is my opinion, and I am asking Mr. Speaker to rule upon the matter.

MR. HUGHES.—He has already given a ruling upon it.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—Since Mr. Speaker gave his ruling the honorable member has introduced two or three fresh matters of the most ordinary character—matters which do not relate to the Government programme. For example he mentioned the Bonuses for Manufactures Bill. I submit, therefore, that his conduct amounts to a grave abuse of the Standing Orders. May points out that such a motion should refer only to some matter of grave importance, which arises suddenly, and which requires the immediate attention of the House.

MR. SPEAKER.—Is the honorable member giving a ruling or is he asking for my ruling?

MR. REID.—Labour cheers again.

MR. SPEAKER.—Order.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—I respectfully submit that I was supporting my point of order, but I do not think that I need proceed further.

SIR WILLIAM LYNE.—I submit that the honorable member for Gwydir was perfectly in order in making the remark to which exception has been taken. The spect of our existing legislation in respect of a White Australia being repealed. matter of urgency, and I happen to know that it has given rise to very grave concern in the minds of a large number of persons.

MR. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Parramatta has asked me whether the course followed by the honorable member for Gwydir is not an abuse of constitutional practice. Of course, I have to rule under such Standing Orders. I should prefer, or under such Standing Orders as are in force in some other Parliaments, but under those which are operative in this Parliament. I should prefer that our Standing Orders should require a motion for their suspension to be put without debate. But under those Standing Orders there is no such requirement, and therefore I cannot uphold the course which is being taken by the honorable member for Gwydir is an abuse of parliamentary privilege. The honorable member has distinctly asserted that it is probable that, even to-night the Government may have to vacate their position on the Treasury benches, and has argued before that event takes place, time should be afforded for a certain discussion. From his point of view, that matter is certainly arguable, and I am prepared to hear debate it still further.

MR. WEBSTER.—When I was interrupted I was seeking to discover how honorable members opposite could justify their position before the workers, who would benefit by the granting of a bonus for production of iron in Australia. It is to them that they should be afforded opportunity of telling their constituents so many words why they have sunk a fiscal question, upon which they were elected to this Parliament. The right honorable member for East Sydney, who has assumed the position of leader of the Opposition, who is such an adept in the art of making personal explanations, that he can explain the various and conflicting attitudes adopted by him upon any question, should be afforded an opportunity of stating why he pulled down the fiscal flag, which he raised to the mast at the last election. He should perform his duty in this House, and not seek to evade responsibility for his conduct by endeavouring to obtain a snatch vote.

MR. JOHNSON.—Upon a point of order I submit that the honorable member is transgressing the rules of Parliament, that he is discussing the subject which discuss when the Standing Order is suspended.

—Seeing that you, sir, have ruled upon the same point, I am able member for Lang guilty of misconduct in again raising it?

MR.—The point of order is that the honorable member has not pre-empted. It relates to a sentence of the honorable member which had not been uttered. The point of order was raised, and objection could not then be made to dismiss the point of order, and the member for Gwydir to Labour cheers again.

MR.—I sympathize with the members opposite, who feel that they are able to justify the votes they have given, and I am seeking to do so.

I sympathize with the Opposition; with that demoralized honorable member for Parry; with the father of the Labour Party; with the honorable member for Lang, who is self-righteous and lecturing the Government as the honorable member opposite. I desire to secure an opportunity to explain their attitude, and to show their constituents the reasons why they oppose the Government. I have the honorable and learned member for Darling—Mr. Callaghan—who has been conspicuous in his absence from the Chamber of Deputies—and those who followed the banner of Protection at the time they were prepared now to lower it. They should have an opportunity to explain why they are consenting to the sacrifice of their sacred rights and attempting to burke legitimate discussion. I have done

MR.—Go on.

MR.—All the fighting qualities of the Government are not confined to the Chamber of Deputies, and I may go on too far for the convenience of the honorable member for Wannon. A man who when he will wish that I had not spoken. I have done my duty in speaking of the forms of the House of Representatives, and on the part of the Government, which will stand out prominently in the history of Commonwealth of Australia as one of the most despicable attacks on the right of discussion that has ever

Mr. REID.—That is outrageous.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! The honorable member must not charge the House, or any section of it, with resorting to methods which are despicable in their character.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Then, I shall withdraw the word "despicable," and shall say that the action of the Opposition is unfair, unmanly, and un-British. Their methods would not be followed by statesmen of the type of Gladstone, Disraeli, or Chamberlain. Such men would never stoop to the tactics of which the Opposition have been guilty, in order to secure a temporary victory over their opponents. Unlike the Opposition, they would not gag them and rob them of their political liberty. I have on a previous occasion spoken of certain honorable members as being political highwaymen, and I say, without hesitation, that those who are supporting the Opposition tactics may fairly be described in that way. They are political highwaymen, seeking to rob the Government of their political rights. I trust that my protest will be remembered. It certainly will be recorded on the pages of the history of this Parliament. I do not think that any Labour Government would ever descend to the use of such weapons as the Opposition have employed to defeat their political opponents; but, if they did, I for one should vigorously protest. I have heard the right honorable member for East Sydney say that he likes a fair fight. He invariably cries out for fair play, and yet he is now the first to shelter himself behind a political hedge and pull the trigger of the revolver which another man holds at the head of the Government. He has spoken of what has occurred in New South Wales, but, as a matter of fact, he is pointing a pistol at the head of the Government, and, without giving them any opportunity to defend themselves, is demanding their political lives. It is his desire that the hands of the Government shall be tied behind them, and that a gag shall be placed in their mouths, so that they may have no opportunity to defend themselves from an attack which is unprecedented in the annals of Australian Parliaments.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy). — I heartily congratulate the honorable member for Gwydir on his honest, straightforward, and manly attempt to secure the fullest and freest discussion of the question which is really at issue. I do not know whether the right honorable member for East Sydney is the leader of the Opposition or whether that position is held by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

Mr. MALONEY.—He is the tail of the Opposition.

Mr. REID.—That is polite.

Mr. McDONALD.—The leader of the Opposition, whoever he may be, and those behind him, are endeavouring to prevent honorable members from dealing with the policy of the Government in a straightforward and manly way. I care not on which side of the House I sit.

Mr. WATSON.—There is more fun on the other side.

Mr. McDONALD.—We shall have a great deal more fun over there.

Mr. REID.—Then, why are the Government so slow in leaving the Treasury benches?

Mr. WATSON.—When we fight we desire the Marquis of Queensberry rules to be observed.

Mr. McDONALD.—I challenge any one to point to one act of maladministration on the part of the Government. As a matter of fact, honorable members opposite are pledged to the policy to which the Ministry are seeking to give effect; but apparently they are ready to displace them merely because of a desire to gain possession of the Treasury benches. They have nothing whatever to say against the administration of the Government, and that is probably the reason why the right honorable member for East Sydney has not submitted a straight-out want of confidence motion.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is what he told the people of Australia he would do.

Mr. McDONALD.—The people of the Commonwealth have a right to know the ground on which it is proposed to displace the Government.

Mr. REID.—Clause 48.

Mr. McDONALD.—The right honorable member is afraid to submit a straight-out want of confidence motion, because he knows that it is impossible to say that the Government have in any respect violated the trust reposed in them. He has told the House and the country a dozen times that he would come down with a no-confidence motion, and yet we now find him prepared to attain his ends by means of a snatch vote. The House ought to compliment the honorable member for Gwydir upon the action which he has taken. If he had not moved this motion, honorable members would not have had an opportunity to say whether they approve or disapprove of the actions of the Government, and all that the country would have known would have been that the Government had been defeated on a clause of a Bill. That, to many people, would appear a mere question of detail, though the Government regard it as being a vital principle.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Was not the Government in the same case?

Mr. McDONALD.—No. We are straightforwardly.

Mr. REID.—The last Government tried their gruel like men.

Mr. McDONALD.—The members of the Opposition are not taking their gruel like men this afternoon. I think that proper course for them to have followed was to try to defeat the Government on a direct motion. In spite of all his actions, the right honorable member has had the pluck to move a motion of want of confidence. There is a great deal of talk about him, but that is about all. There is no "Yes-no" policy about him, however. Everyone knows what my question is; but I question if one member of the Chamber can say what the position of the right honorable member is.

Mr. CAMERON.—He is in Opposition to-day, and will be on the Government benches to-morrow.

Mr. McDONALD.—There is still an opportunity to discuss this matter, and I challenge the leader of the Opposition to take a course which will enable it to be properly discussed.

Mr. REID (East Sydney). — I should like to be allowed to say a few words—

Mr. McDONALD.—The right honorable member has a quarter of an hour.

Mr. HUGHES. — The right honorable member ought not to sit down before 4 past 4 o'clock.

Mr. REID.—I hope that I shall be continually interrupted during my remarks. I wish, if I may be allowed to do so, to say a few words in reply to imputations which, even coming from a quarter, must cause one a certain amount of concern. Honorable members who have spoken upon this extraordinary motion have uttered a number of statements as reasons for suspending our ordinary rules which must, to any man of parliamentary experience, appear absolutely absurd. They should know that it is not for this House when dealing with a particular Bill which it has recorded its opinions, to say

Mr. HUGHES.—Honorable members have been coerced into making the position significant.

Mr. REID.—Attempts have been made to induce some honorable members to change their votes on a solemn question of principle, in order to save the Government.

Mr. HUGHES.—What about the right honorable member for Balaclava?

Mr. REID.—The Government have succeeded in three or four instances in inducing honorable members to change their votes. The trouble in connexion with the present situation is that they cannot get five or six honorable members to do so.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—What about the right honorable member's own supporters?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, what about the honorable member for Dalley?

Mr. REID.—He can answer for himself.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—So can the others.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member for Dalley has withstood the animosity of the Labour Party for fifteen years, and has beaten them every time. He had a singular success at Balmain the other day in "downing" one or two of them.

Mr. MAHON.—What has the Balmain election to do with this question?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The right honorable member, in referring to the Balmain election, was transgressing the rules of debate.

Mr. REID.—I was referring to the sacred principle of the right of the people to choose the men they wish to represent them, as the honorable member for Gwydir would say. I had had some little experience of the rules of Parliament before the present Government was heard of. These rules are old. They have been established for many years. It is the most common thing in the world for the House, sometimes on the invitation of the Government, and sometimes against their wish, to vote against the recommitment of a Bill to secure the reconsideration of some provision in it.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—This is an attempt to take the business of the House out of the hands of the Government.

Mr. REID.—No one who was a supporter of the Government would take part in such an attempt. But surely those who oppose the Government are entitled to try to take the business of the House out of their hands? This is a new style of administration that honorable members desire. What do we care whether our action does or does not take the business of the House out of the hands of the Government? Are we here to keep the Government in office? Are we here to save them, by building bridges for them at the sacrifice of our own principles? We are not here for that purpose. All the bridges that could be built have been built, and the grievance of honorable members opposite is that they cannot go into the building yard and get another bridge built. That is the only trouble of these valiant heroes, to whom principle is everything, and who have sold the trades unionists of Australia on their own principles.

Mr. WATSON.—That is a good gag; but the trades unionists of Australia know the right honorable gentleman. They have been sold by him too often.

Mr. REID.—I do not profess to live on them, as other people do.

Mr. WATSON.—No one else lives on them. The right honorable member knows better than that.

Mr. REID.—I have taken a straightforward course, and have dealt with them as favorably and as fairly as I have dealt with other members of the community.

Mr. WATSON.—It comes well from the right honorable member to talk about selling.

Mr. MAHON.—The right honorable member would sell himself to anybody.

Mr. HUGHES.—He has sold every party to which he has belonged.

Mr. WATSON.—He has sold the free-traders.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Has he not sold himself to the protectionists?

Mr. REID.—Poor fellows! Is it so sad to leave?

Mr. WATSON.—I shall not be as sad about leaving office as the right honorable member was in 1898. I have not crawled round other honorable members, as the right honorable gentleman did.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I ask Ministers to help me in securing the observance of the rules of debate.

Mr. WATSON.—I am quite prepared to assist in every way in the maintenance of order in this Chamber, but in my view, the right honorable member has no right to suggest improper conduct to Ministers. If he does so, I shall certainly reply to him.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is perfectly within the rights of any honorable member who has not spoken to reply to anything said by any other honorable member.

Mr. WATSON.—Time will not permit of my doing so. The right honorable member knows that.

Mr. REID.—The honorable gentleman has had plenty of time.

Mr. WATSON.—I have not had a minute.

Mr. SPEAKER.—As honorable members know, the rules of the House require them to remain silent while the Speaker addressing the Chamber. Every honorable member who has not yet spoken has the right to subsequently reply to the remarks made by other honorable members but it is disorderly to interrupt by interjection whoever is addressing the Chair.

Mr. REID.—I am sorry if I have said anything offensive, but honorable members have been hurling most offensive epithets at me, five or six at a time, and, like them I am hit I feel inclined to hit back.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member a great fighter.

Mr. REID.—I have been a pretty good fighter in my time.

Mr. HUGHES.—That is why the right honorable member is pursuing his pretactics.

Mr. REID.—I am pursuing tact. This absurd motion has been sprung on the House by the honorable member for Gairdrie, who went nearly mad in a speech lasting an hour and a half, and was followed by another gentleman, who was in a similar state of hysteria. But honorable members who profess to believe in every one having fair play are grumbling because I wish to occupy a quarter of an hour in replying to the avalanche of abuse which has been poured upon me during the last two hours.

Mr. WATSON.—I am not grumbling.

Mr. REID.—I wish to protest against this unprecedented attempt to anticipate the vote of this House upon a matter of public importance. When the fate of the Government was at stake in connexion with a certain amendment having regard to inclusion of railway servants within the scope of this very Bill, did the Government crawl round to get a man's vote?

Mr. WATSON.—Has any one else done that? Why does not the honorable member say straight out what he means?

Mr. REID.—I am not talking about the Ministry, but of the whole Parliament.

Mr. HUGHES.—We did not crawl to a caucus for a penny on tea. The right honorable gentleman has a monopoly in matters of that kind.

Mr. REID.—It is not the penny that is worrying you; it is something more than that.

KER.—I must ask the right member not to address Ministers to address the Chair.

—Like the honorable member, I am rather a novice, and attacks lead me from the side. The very same situation this very Parliament two or three years ago. The same Bill was introduced, and a vote was approached, which the Government made announcement. Did the Deakin Government—I suppose that the Minister will admit that the present Government countenanced the action of the honorable member for Gwydir—supporters getting up to make a speech in abuse of the Government in anticipation of the vote that day? Did any such abuse of parliamentary life take place at the time? Did the Prime Minister and his colleagues get out of office without a vote?

N.—They were treated fairly. —They were engaged upon a question of great magnitude, and when a principle arose, upon which the honorable members differed they submitted themselves to the decision of the House.

N.—No one would have recommended the Bill.

—What! in order to change the Bill?

N.—No one would have recommended it if the Government had not.

—I am sure that the honorable member for Ballarat would have been asked for a recommendation in order that the Government might change its principle on a point which has created a great deal of trouble, or which has warranted the honorable member for Gwydir in addressing the House for an hour and a half—the result of his action—and it is well known that it was——The right honorable member for Gwydir.

—Surely we have arrived at a point of affairs when an honorable member should adhere to the vote which he has given on an important matter without being accused of anything but that is the effect of the honorable member for Gwydir; we have made up our minds on principle, and that we do not intend to change them, and that we wish to let the Government know it at the earliest possible moment. That is the situation.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Will the honorable member kindly take his seat?

Debate interrupted. Business of the day called on under Standing Order 119.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WATSON (Bland—Treasurer).—In view of the importance of the issue before the House at the present time, I think it is only proper that I should ask honorable members to forego their rights with regard to private business for to-day. Therefore, I move—

That the consideration of general business be postponed until after the consideration of Order of the Day No. 1, Government business.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION BILL.

Debate resumed from 10th August (vide page 4083), on motion by Mr. WATSON—

That the Bill be now recommitted to a Committee of the whole House for the reconsideration of clauses 4, 37, 38, 39, 46, 48, 52, 67, 68, and 90 and schedule B, and the consideration of proposed new clauses 52A and 95A—

Upon which Mr. McCAY had moved by way of amendment—

That clause 48 be omitted from the clauses proposed to be recommitted.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey).—I think I might appropriately refer to the principal amendments that have been made in the Bill. The measure was not the creation of the present Ministry, but was left on the stocks by the Deakin Administration. It then contained a clause which provided for preference to unionists, and the exercise of untrammelled discretion by the Judge. Some honorable members have stumped the country, and have denounced the present Administration for attempting to ruin the primary industries of the Commonwealth. They have never had the manliness to say that the preference clause originated with the Deakin Ministry, and that it was left as a legacy to the present Administration. I have always considered that the Bill does not go far enough, but I am anxious to carry out the pledge which I gave to my constituents, and to place upon the statute-book a measure which, although it may not be perfect, will, at least, form the groundwork of the legislation that is desired for the peaceful settlement of industrial disputes. I venture to say that, at the last general election, the great majority of the electors expressed themselves in favour of conciliation and arbitration. The honorable member for Dalley told me that I should vote against the Bill, because it did not entirely meet with my approval; but I am anxious to do all I can to bring about the reform which every honorable member professes to desire. The honorable and learned member for Corinella succeeded in securing the adoption of an amendment which, I venture to say, would prove absolutely unworkable. Under the common rule an award might apply to the whole of the workmen in a particular industry in the Commonwealth, and it would be impracticable to furnish the Court with information that would satisfy it that an application for preference was indorsed by a majority of those affected. Take the case of the shearers. What man could tell how many shearers would be affected by an award of the Court? Any one with a practical knowledge of shearing work knows that during seasons when the harvests fail, many hundreds or thousands of men resort to shearing work, who, at other times, would find employment in the agricultural districts. Men may go out as shearers one year, and not shear the next. Still they would be affected by the award of the Court, because they might obtain a run of sheds for the following season. Therefore, no one could tell how many men would be affected by an award of the Court. Then, in the case of miners, a man may follow mining for a time, and then resort to other means of livelihood; but he may return to work as a miner at any time. No one knows better than does the honorable and learned member for Corinella that it would be impossible to demonstrate to the Court that the majority of the persons affected by an award approved of the application for preference.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not know it. I think that the proviso is workable, or I should not support it.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable and learned member failed to produce any evidence in proof of the soundness of his view. When I asked him to afford such proof he sneered at me.

Mr. McCAY.—I did not.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable and learned member seemed to think that, because he knew a little about Castlemaine, he was fully acquainted with the conditions of the mining industry. I might tell him, however, that I was working down a mine before he was born. I think, therefore, that I can claim to know something about mine.

Mr. McCAY.—I admit that freely.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member for Wentworth professed to know everything about the aspirations and requirements of the working classes, and he treated my interjections with contempt. Let me tell the honorable member that it is fortunate for him that he has never been under the necessity of making himself acquainted with the wants of the working classes.

He came into the world with a silver spoon in his mouth, and his path in life has been made so easy that it is impossible for him to understand the difficulties that would be experienced in complying with the conditions laid down in the proviso adopted at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. The honorable member for Dalley has declared that he will vote against the clause in the Bill which intended to confer a preference upon unionists, on the ground that it does not go far enough. There is an old saying, that an excuse is better than none; and I certainly think that that remark is applicable to the lamentable attempt of the honorable member to justify his action in this connection. He even refuses to allow the Bill to be taken into Committee, with a view to securing an amendment of the clause in the direction which he desires. He affirms that he sees no distinction between the proposal of the Government and the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. Can his chief see no difference between the two? Does the honorable learned member for Corinella see no difference? Is there not a vast distinction between requiring an organization to secure the approval of a majority of those affected by an award, and requiring it to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Court that it substantially represents the interests of those engaged in any particular industry?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The honorable member has said that there is a difference, but he has not explained what it is.

Mr. POYNTON.—In quite a number of cases an organization might be able to satisfy the Arbitration Court that it substantially represents the interests of the employees engaged in any industry.

EDWARDS.—But the Prime Minister says that the words “substantiation” are equivalent to saying that the organization consists of a major-ity of workers in a particular industry.

POYNTON.—They do not mean a

MR. SMITH.—What do they POYNTON.—If the members of the organization were required to represent a certain number of electors, very few could do so. If the individuals who are engaged to-morrow, are to be bound by the award of the Court. But the trades unionists gave effect to that award. I congratulate the Government upon making an honest effort to secure an Arbitration Bill, which would at least be workable. It would be a standing disgrace to them if, for the purpose of remaining upon the Treasury benches, they allowed this Bill to pass in its present form—a disgrace which no time could obliterate. They wish to obtain a recommitment of certain clauses, in order that we may secure a measure, which, if not perfect, will at least be of some utility. I commend them for their action in staking their Ministerial existence upon this particular provision. Personally, I am indifferent as to where I sit in this Chamber, but I am anxious that those engaged in industrial pursuits in the Commonwealth shall secure a workable measure in connexion with the important question of conciliation and arbitration. In my judgment, even the proposal of the Government does not go far enough, but I believe that under its operation there is a possibility of an organization being able to satisfy the Court that it substantially represents the employes in the particular industry affected by an award. That, however, would be quite impossible under the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. I cannot help remarking that since the present Government assumed office, there has been continuous underground engineering.

POYNTON.—This is not a question of working.

POYNTON.—It has been said, during the debate upon this Bill, that only a limited number of workers exist in Australia. We have to be bound by the award of the Court. But the trades unionists gave effect to that award. I congratulate the Government upon making an honest effort to secure an Arbitration Bill, which would at least be workable. It would be a standing disgrace to them if, for the purpose of remaining upon the Treasury benches, they allowed this Bill to pass in its present form—a disgrace which no time could obliterate. They wish to obtain a recommitment of certain clauses, in order that we may secure a measure, which, if not perfect, will at least be of some utility. That, however, would be quite impossible under the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. I cannot help remarking that since the present Government assumed office, there has been continuous underground engineering.

POYNTON.—We ought to consider the case of those who cannot afford to employ a representative to represent them before the Court.

POYNTON.—I have as much to say for those individuals who are not members of unions—with the exception of those who are resident in places where such unions do not exist—as has the honorable member. I would remind him of the fact that since the present Government assumed office, there has been continuous underground engineering.

MR. FORREST.—In the Western Australian Bill no preference is given to POYNTON.—In the first place, the Bill does not recognise individuals. It is based upon organizations, in preference to individuals. It was not intended to be introduced in these lines for the express purpose of enabling the Court to give effect to an award. The organizations are intended to assist in giving effect to the awards of the Court. The individual is not considered at all. A strike occurred in New South Wales recently. The unionists did not strike, although the press of Australia endeavoured to convey the impression that they did. As a matter of fact, however, it was only the non-unionists—the members engaged in that particular industry who did not belong to organizations—who struck. They refused to be bound by the award of the Court. But the trades unionists gave effect to that award. I congratulate the Government upon making an honest effort to secure an Arbitration Bill, which would at least be workable. It would be a standing disgrace to them if, for the purpose of remaining upon the Treasury benches, they allowed this Bill to pass in its present form—a disgrace which no time could obliterate. MR. HENRY WILLIS.—Because they have not a majority behind them.

MR. POYNTON.—A continuous attempt has been made to overthrow them. Why? They do not occupy their present positions as the result of self-seeking? Will any honorable member assert that they attempted to secure possession of the Treasury benches by underground tactics?

MR. SPEAKER.—I would remind the honorable member that the proposal before the Chair has reference to the recommittal of clause 48.

Mr. POYNTON.—I was coming to that matter. I unhesitatingly declare that the action of honorable members of the Opposition is prompted by a desire to place certain of their number upon the Treasury benches. It is a piece of utter cant and hypocrisy for them to claim that it is prompted by a desire to study the best interests of the country. One cannot close his eyes to the fact that in politics we see strange bed-fellows. We have now presented to us the spectacle of certain honorable members, in their endeavour to gain the Ministerial benches, falling upon the necks of others, whose names, if mentioned in their presence only a month or two ago, would have produced the same effect as would a red rag upon a bull. It has been asserted on a public platform that the Commonwealth ship of State is being "steered from the steerage." Where is the right honorable member who made that statement? Where was he yesterday when this contemptible method was adopted to secure the defeat of the Government? He was probably in the vaults of the House, or in the sewer. We have had an exhibition of something that is more like sewerage politics—

Mr. KENNEDY.—I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, whether the honorable member is in order in referring to a course of procedure permissible under the Standing Orders as being contemptible?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the honorable member not only said that a certain method of procedure was contemptible, but that we were being treated to an exhibition of sewerage politics.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He said that the right honorable member was probably in the sewer.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is a remark that should not be applied to any honorable member.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I shall ask the honorable member to withdraw the statements to which objection has been taken. At the same time, I would again impress upon him that it is necessary that he should confine his remarks to the question of whether clause 48 shall or shall not be recommitted. The general question of the position of the Government is not under consideration.

Mr. POYNTON.—I was not aware, Mr. Speaker, that it was a breach of the rules of this House to—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member withdraw the words objected to?

Mr. POYNTON.—Withdraw the words "contemptible"?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The two remarks to which objection has been taken.

Mr. POYNTON.—I shall withdraw them, Mr. Speaker, and say that we are being treated to an exhibition, not of sewerage, but of underground, politics. The "steerage politics" has become famous since its use by the main conspirator in the plot that has been hatched to defeat the Government.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What has this to do with the question under consideration?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have on two occasions called the honorable member's attention to the fact that the question under consideration is whether or not clause 48 shall be recommitted. I must ask him to confine himself to the matter under debate or I shall have to ask him not to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. POYNTON.—I shall endeavour, Mr. Speaker, to obey your ruling, but will point out that there is no occasion for anxiety on the part of the honorable member for Macquarie. The little time that he shall occupy in placing my views before the House will not materially delay his securing a seat on the Treasury benches.

Mr. MAHON.—The honorable member does not mean that.

Mr. POYNTON.—I do. I am ashamed of the party with which I was associated for several years. I believe in fair play and certainly do not look with favour upon any exhibition of hypocrisy or cant.
